"Sec. 4. No person beneficially interested in a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of lands can dispose of such interest, unless the right to make disposition thereof is conferred by the instrument creating the trust." Laws 1858, p. 402, § 4; Comp. Laws 1862, 897, § 4.

Now, this law was in force when Wilkinson Turpin, as trustee, purchased the land in controversy; it was in force when Anderson Turpin made said quitclaim deed to his children; and it was in force when his children made said quitclaim deeds to Collier; and we suppose it will be admitted that Anderson Turpin was beneficially interested in the receipt of the rents and profits of said land. And will it be contended that a trust in lands in Kansas can be created and the trust not be governed by the laws of Kansas?

It is not necessary to discuss any of the other questions supposed to be involved in this case.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

CENTRAL BRANCH U. P. R. CO. v. NANCY J. WILCOX.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

Trusts and Trustees: What Facts Create a Trust: Trustee to Convey to Equitable Owner. Under the Kickapoo treaty of 1862 (13 U. S. St. at Large, 623) the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, otherwise known as the Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company, purchased from the government of the United States all the surplus lands belonging to the Kickapoo Indian reservation, and obtained certificates of purchase therefor from the secretary of the interior; and, before the railroad company obtained patents for said land, one S. C. P., who was the president and attorney in fact for said railroad company, and duly authorized, did, by an assignment written and printed on the same *260 piece of paper on which one of said certificates of purchase was written and printed, "transfer and assign to N. J. W. all the right, title, and interest of the said Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company" to a certain quarter section of said land, "and require the issue of a patent to N. J. W., as assignee of said company, in accordance with the terms of said certificate," and the said N. J. W. afterwards took possession of said land under said certificate, and the assignment thereof, and made valuable improvements thereon; and afterwards the said railroad company caused the patent for said land to be issued to itself, and now refuses to transfer the legal title to said land to said N. J. W. Held, that the railroad company holds the legal title to said land in trust for said N. J. W., and that the company may be compelled to transfer the same by deed to said N. J. W.

Error from Atchison district court.

Nancy J. Wilcox, as plaintiff, filed her petition against the railroad company as defendant, alleging that on the second of January, 1866, the then secretary of the interior executed and issued to said railroad company two certain certificates of purchase, copies of which are set forth in the opinion, and that afterwards, on the tenth of August, 1866, the said defendant, "by S. C. Pomeroy, its president, agent, and attorney in fact, in that behalf by it thereunto duly appointed and authorized," for value received, made, executed, and delivered to said plaintiff certain instruments of writing, transferring and assigning to said plaintiff all the right, title, and interest of the said railroad company in and to the lands mentioned in said two certificates of purchase, and requiring "the issue of a patent to Nancy J. Wilcox, as assignee of said company, in accordance with the terms of said certificate." Trial at the June term, 1873, of the district court. Separate findings of fact and conclusions of law were made. The eighth finding of fact is as follows: "(8) That Samuel C. Pomeroy did not receive said certificates from the defendant in blank, and thereafter execute the same in blank with the name of grantee left out; that the same were never delivered to L. C. Challiss, nor any other person except the defendant; and that G. L. Gaylord never sold the same *261 to plaintiff upon any terms or conditions what*ever, and never had anything to do with the same; but that they were regularly transferred, for a valuable consideration, from defendant to plaintiff, as is particularly described in exhibits attached to plaintiff's petition." As a conclusion of law the court found that "the plaintiff is entitled to judgment as prayed for in her said petition, and to an order that defendant make and execute a deed to plaintiff of the said two tracts of land, within sixty days from the rising of the court, and that in default thereof the sheriff of Atchison county be ordered to make such conveyance to plaintiff;" and judgment was entered accordingly.

A. G. Otis and O. S. Everest, for plaintiff in error.

Admitting all the facts of the petition, the written instruments set forth as executed by S. C. Pomeroy, as president and attorney in fact of plaintiff in error, are mere quitclaim deeds. They release and convey only the right, title, and interest the railroad company had on the tenth of August, 1866, in the two tracts of land. At this date it had no title, legal or equitable, therein, under the terms of the Kickapoo treaty. It is neither averred nor assumed by plaintiff that it had any. Its road was then unconstructed; and the terms of the treaty—the conditions precedent—wholly unperformed on its part. Its after-acquired title did not inure to the benefit of the defendant in error. Simpson v. Greeley, 8 Kan. *597; Bruce v. Luke, 9 Kan. *201.

The court erred in sustaining objection to the question asked the witness Wilcox. The question asked was, "Are these the two certificates sued on?" The defendant had a right, on cross-examination, after the certificates were formally in evidence by plaintiff's consent, to ask any question identifying them, and to call the attention of the witness to the two certificates produced. The court also erred in overruling the written objections of defendant to the deposition of S. C. Pomeroy, and allowing the same to be read. Six of the questions were leading, irrelevant, and not proof of any fact within the *262 issue, and the *objection to them should have been sustained.

Question No. 7 is this: "Were these assignments, when made and delivered by the company, so far as the papers themselves are concerned, intended to convey the title to the land itself, or only the right to purchase the land provided for embraced in the treaty with the Kickapoos?" The question is leading, and also asks the opinion of the witness as to the legal effect of these certificates, and the written instruments attached thereto. The intention of the company is to be gathered from the instruments themselves, and they are to be construed, as to their legal effect, by the court, not by the witness. Their plain legal interpretation cannot be thus construed away, changed, altered, or modified. Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Curran, 8

Kan. *18; Tefft v. Wilcox, 6 Kan. *46, *55, *59; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 275, 277, 440, 441.

The court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's evidence. The evidence of witness Wilcox clearly showed that plaintiff was not a bona fide purchaser, but bought with full notice of the defects of title. She took Gaylord's guaranty to refund her the purchase money she had paid him if she did not succeed in getting her patent from the government. The whole testimony establishes these facts: That the plaintiff was not put in possession by defendant, or with its consent; that the improvements she made were merely nominal, of the value of $85 only; that plaintiff bought of one G. L. Gaylord, in March, 1870, and took possession thereafter, and paid him therefor, taking his guaranty to refund the purchase money if she failed to get her patent; that plaintiff dealt only with Gaylord, and paid him alone, and utterly fails to show that defendant knew of or recognized her entry, or that defendant ever received one dollar of consideration from anybody for these lands. Her entry, March 8, 1870, was not under the deeds of release or written instruments purporting to be of date August 10, 1866, four years before, but under her purchase from Gaylord, and under his guaranty of indemnity. And no demand was ever made on the railroad company by plaintiff for a deed, nor was a deed tendered to it for execution. *No fraud on the part of the railroad company is established, or even sought to be. And article 6 of the treaty required the railroad company to pay for all these lands, including these tracts, before it could get title to any, or its patent.

Findings of fact and conclusions of law are erroneous. Finding of fact No. 8 is wholly unsupported by evidence, and directly contrary to it. The court could only find its conclusions of fact upon and in accordance with the evidence, and not directly contrary to such evidence, and against all the evidence. The second conclusion of law, "that the writing signed S. C. Pomeroy on said certificates was an assignment thereof from the defendant to the plaintiff," is contradicted by the writing itself. It is no more an assignment of this certificate sued on than of any other certificate. It is not an assignment of any certificate, but a quitclaim deed of the land. There was no authority given by the treaty to the railroad company to assign the certificates.

The written instruments themselves do not purport to be executed by the railroad company, but by S. C. Pomeroy. The addenda, "President of and Attorney in Fact for the Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Co.," may well be considered words of descriptio personæ. No seal of the company is affixed. We may well hold that these are not the conveyances of the railroad company at all. The case of Hatch v. Barr, 1 Ohio, 390, is in point directly, where such a signature was held to convey no title from the corporation. See, also, Thayer v. Payne, 2 Cush. 329; Savings Bank v. Davis, 8 Conn. 192;

Hills v. Bannister, 8 Cow. 32; McClure v. Bennett, 1 Blackf. 189; Mears v. Graham, 8 Blackf. 144.

Clough & Wheat, for defendant in error.

The answer in this case, not being sworn to as required by the Code, § 108, admits all the substantial allegations of the petition. It admits the proper execution and delivery of the certificates of purchase set forth in the petition, and the proper assignment and delivery of said certificates to the *plaintiff, Nancy J. Wilcox.

It admits also the execution and delivery of the patent by the United States to the plaintiff in error, a copy of which is set forth in the petition, and which includes the lands in controversy, and the court also finds such to be the facts. The real defense in this case is that these certificates, with the assignments and transfers thereof, do not, by their terms, entitle the plaintiff to a conveyance as prayed for in the petition, but that the assignment of the certificates conveyed only the right to Nancy J. Wilcox to receive patents from the United States for the lands mentioned in said certificates, upon payment by said Nancy to the government of the United States, or to said railroad company, of $1.25 per acre, with interest from the date of purchase by the railroad company, (see 13 U. S. St. at Large, 625, § 5,) in addition to the $2,400 paid by said Nancy to the railroad company when she obtained the transfer of the certificate. That this is the only real point in the case is shown by the second paragraph of the answer, and by the action of plaintiff in error in objecting to the giving or receiving of any evidence under the petition in said case, and by his interposing a demurrer to the evidence after plaintiff had closed her testimony.

By the provisions of the Kickapoo treaty aforesaid, there is no apportionment of the purchase money of the lands thereby disposed of. Neither the government nor the Kickapoos sold, nor did the railroad company purchase, any one 160 acres of land at $1.25 per acre. On the contrary, section 5 of the treaty says distinctly, "provided said railroad company purchase the whole of such surplus lands at the rate of $1.25 per acre." When the contract of purchase was completed, and the patent issued, the title, by relation, commenced at the time when that contract was made. The case of Parker v. Winsor, 5 Kan. *362, *373, does not militate at all with our views in this case, because, when this suit was brought, both the legal and equitable title had passed from the Kickapoos and the United States to the *265 railroad company. When the case of Parker v. Winsor was brought, neither title had so passed; and this is referred to by the court in its opinion, (page 373,) and made, as we think, the basis of its decision in that case. Both the legal and equitable title having passed when this suit was commenced, (because it is found by the court that the patent had issued, that the lands had been paid for, and the road built in accordance with the provisions of the treaty,) both titles related back to the date of the original purchase, in accordance with the doctrine so fully laid down by the supreme court of the United States, in Landes v. Brant, 10 How. 373.

Nor does the general doctrine, relied upon in the court below by counsel for plaintiff in error, apply,—“that a quitclaim deed does not convey an after-acquired title,”—because this patent conveyed no new title, but was only the consummation and perfecting of the title contracted for in the original purchase by the railroad company when they elected to take all the surplus Kickapoo lands. Stark v. Starrs, 6 Wall. 402; Crews v. Burcham, 1 Black, 352; Doe v. Wilson, 23 How. 457; Fackler v. Ford, 24 How. 323. The plaintiff in error, after receiving the patent, was shown to be a trustee, holding the title to the lands in controversy in trust for defendant in error; and upon the introduction of evidence of a demand upon and refusal by plaintiff in error to make a deed to said lands to said Nancy, she was entitled to the decree she obtained in the court below. And it makes no difference what evidence was admitted or rejected; and any exceptions taken thereto need not be noticed by us, or this court. Code, §§ 140, 304; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Pointer, 9 Kan. *626; Seibert v. True, 8 Kan. *53.

With reference to the assignment of error that the findings of fact are not sustained by sufficient evidence, we would state that the first, second, third, fourth, eighth, and ninth findings are admitted by the pleadings, and are found from the pleadings, and neither party could have been permitted to show the contrary. We suppose that the eighth finding of fact is the only one that plaintiff in error really objects to, and the whole of this finding, except the last four lines, has nothing whatever to do with the case; and that portion of said finding was made solely, as is apparent upon its face, at the *266 solicitation of plain*tiff in error. Yet in view of the provisions of section 108 of the Code, and of the allegations of the petition, and of the failure of plaintiff in error to deny any of said allegations or averments under oath, the district court or any other court could not find otherwise.

The entire deposition of Pomeroy might be stricken out, and it could not affect the case in the least. As to the objection made that certain questions were leading, we would state that we believe it is conceded law that no such objection to questions asked a witness, and not objected to at the time as leading, can afterwards be raised on the trial. Luke v. Johnnycake, 9 Kan. *511; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Pointer, Id. *627.

We claim, further, that the wording of the treaty itself, quite as much as the wording of the certificates, shows that the government and the railroad company both intended that the $1.25 per acre should be paid by the railroad company, and not by its grantees. We think, too, that the treaty contemplated the issue of patents to the railroad company, or its assigns, but that the payment should be made in bulk, for the whole lands, by the railroad company alone; and for the purpose of securing such payment, according to the terms of the treaty, the railroad company was required to issue its bonds in double the amount of the entire purchase money.

VALENTINE, J. Suit was brought in the court below, by defendant in error, to compel a conveyance to her from plaintiff in error of two certain specified tracts of land, being part and parcel of the Kickapoo reservation, in Atchison county. The plaintiff below bases her case upon two certificates of purchase issued by the United States government to the defendant below, of date January 2, 1866, which had passed into plaintiff's possession, and upon two written instruments written upon the same pieces of paper with said certificates, executed by S. C. Pomeroy, president of and attorney in fact for the defendant railroad company, and purporting to have been so executed to plaintiff at the date thereof, August 10, *1866. The plaintiff further averred in her petition that the defendant obtained a patent from the United States for these tracts of land September 5, 1871; that it obtained the same fraudulently, as against the plaintiff, and with intent to convert said lands to its own use; that she, the plaintiff, had entered into possession of said lands, and made improvements thereon, and praying for a decree for conveyance from defendant. The defendant answered—First, a general denial; second, a specific denial that said certificates and written instruments conferred on plaintiff any right or interest in said tracts of land, and averred that it, the defendant, was the sole owner of the same. This answer was not verified by affidavit. The plaintiff replied by filing a general denial. Trial was had by the court, without a jury. Defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence under the petition, as not stating a cause of action. Objection overruled, and exception taken. After plaintiff's evidence was in, defendant filed a demurrer to the evidence, which was also overruled, and exceptions taken. After the evidence closed, all of which appears in and is made a part of the record here, the court found its conclusions of fact upon the evidence, and its conclusions of law, and rendered judgment that defendant make and execute to plaintiff a deed of the tracts of land named.

On behalf of the plaintiff in error counsel submit in this court that the court below erred in overruling defendant's objection to the introduction of evidence under plaintiff's petition. This is the principal, and about the only substantial, question in the case. The question really is whether the petition below states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We think it does. It is not necessary to plead the public laws or treaties of the United States. They will be taken notice of judicially, without pleading or proving them. Hence all the provisions of the Kickapoo treaty of 1862 (13 U. S. St. at Large, 623) will be taken notice of judicially, although some of the provisions thereof may not have been specifically mentioned in the petition.

This proposition does not seem to be controverted by counsel on

Although it was provided in the fifth article of the said treaty, as it was originally drawn, that "such certificates" as those sued on in this case "shall be deemed and held in all courts as evidence of title and possession in said railroad company," yet the said words "title and" were stricken out of said article before it was ratified, and the words "the right of" inserted in their place, by way of amendment, so that said provision now reads that "such certificates shall be deemed and held in all courts as evidence of the right of possession" only. 13 U. S. St. 629. But, although the railroad company had no title to said land at the time said certificates were assigned, yet they had a valid contract with the government under which they had the exclusive power to obtain title, and this title they could obtain either for themselves or for their assignees; and at the very time said certificates were assigned the railroad company had the right of possession to said land, to the exclusion of all others. They had a right to assign all their interest in the land, including their right to obtain title, and their right of possession; or, in other words, they had a right to make a valid contract for the sale of the land. And such a contract the government would undoubtedly recognize as valid under said treaty. See articles 5 and 6 of the treaty.

The plaintiff in error seems to claim that said assignments amount only to quitclaim deeds. Now, although they read in some respects like quitclaim deeds, yet in fact they are not deeds at all. They were not intended to perform the office of deeds. They were *269 not intended to convey any present *estate or title in or to the land. But they are merely simple contracts, intended to transfer the inchoate interest of the railroad company in and to said land, and to transfer their right to obtain said title at some future time from the government. They sold their right to have the patent from the government for the land issue to themselves, and required by their agreement that it should issue to Nancy J. Wilcox. The two certificates are alike except as to the description of the land, and the two assignments are also alike, with the same exception. Below we give a copy of one of said certificates, with the assignment thereof, which reads as follows:

"No. 700.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, January 2, 1866.

"Whereas, it is provided by the fifth article of the treaty between the United States and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians, concluded June 28, 1862, as afterwards amended and proclaimed on the twenty-eighth day of May, 1863, that, after certain portions of the lands belonging to said tribe of Indians shall have been allotted and set apart for the use and benefit of the members of said tribe, the Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company shall have the privilege of becoming the purchaser of the remainder of the lands not so set apart and allotted, upon certain conditions therein prescribed; and whereas, the said lands have been allotted and set apart to the members of said tribe, as prescribed by said treaty, and the said railroad company has elected to become the purchaser of the remainder thereof, and by its president, the Honorable Samuel C. Pomeroy, has executed and delivered to the secretary of the interior its bond in the penal sum of three hundred and ten thousand dollars, being double the value of such remainder or surplus of said lands, estimated at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, conditioned as by the terms and provisions of said treaty is required, which said bond has been accepted and approved by the secretary of the interior:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby certified that under and by virtue of the provisions and terms of the said treaty, as amended, the Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company has become the purchaser, and is entitled to the possession of 160 acres; being the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of

M., the same being parcel of the said surplus or remainder of said lands; subject, however, to all the terms and conditions, considerations and stipulations, in said treaty in that behalf mentioned and set forth.

"It is also hereby further certified that in case the said Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company shall well and truly do and perform all things required to be done and performed on its part, in the time and manner prescribed by said treaty, and shall well and truly pay for said surplus or remainder of said lands, as by said treaty stipulated, then and in that case the said Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company, or the assignee hereof, will be entitled to demand and receive from the United States of America a patent in fee-simple for the premises above described.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of said department to be hereunto affixed, this second day of January, 1866.

"JAS. HARLAN, Secretary."

"For value received, I, S. C. Pomeroy, president of and as the duly authorized attorney in fact of the Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company, for said company, do hereby transfer and assign to Nancy

J. Wilcox all the right, title, and interest of the said Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Company to the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section nineteen, (19,) township five (5) south, range seventeen (17) east of 6th P. M., and require the issue of a patent to Nancy J. Wilcox, as assignee of said company, in accordance with the terms of said certificate.

"Witness my hand and seal this tenth day of August, 1866.

"Attest:

S. C. POMEROY, [L. s.]

"President of and Attorney in Fact for the Atchison & Pike's Peak Railroad Co."

"State of New York, County of New York: On this tenth day of August, 1866, before me personally came S. C. Pomeroy, president of and atty. in fact for A. & P. P. Railroad Co., to me well known: and acknowledged the foregoing assignment to be his voluntary act and deed, and the voluntary act and deed of the said A. & P. P. Railroad Company.

CHAS. V. WARE,

[L. s.]

"Notary Public, New York City."

It will be noticed that the railroad company agreed to "require the issue of the patent to Nancy J. Wilcox, as assignee of said company, in accordance with the terms of said certificate."

This was a valid contract. If not authorized by the treaty in direct terms, it is certainly authorized by it by necessary and unavoidable implication. The assignment was on the same piece of paper as the certificate, and was printed thereon in blank, under the supervision of the secretary of the interior, which shows what the opinion of the secretary of the interior was. Now, as the company did not allow the patent to issue to Mrs. Wilcox, as they agreed, but took the patent to the company, we think the company ought to convey the title to the land to Mrs. Wilcox. Under the provisions of said treaty and said certificate and said assignment, we think it should be inferred that the railroad company should have done all that was necessary to be done so that they could require the patent to be issued to the plaintiff, and the evidence in the case amply shows that this was the understanding of the parties. It is claimed by plaintiff in error that said assignment was made in the name of S. C. Pomeroy, and not in the name of the company. Admitting, for the purposes of the case, that said assignment was so made, and still it makes no difference. It is not a deed conveying title. It is only a simple contract providing for a conveyance of title. It is not necessary that such a contract be made in the name of the principal. Butler v. Kaulback, 8 Kan. *668, and cases there cited; Welsh v. Usher, 2 Hill, Ch. (S. C.) 167. This contract, however, shows who the principal was, and who the agent was. It shows that Pomeroy acted merely as the agent of and for the railroad company.

We now come to the supposed errors in admitting and excluding evidence. The most of the evidence complained of which was either admitted or excluded, was wholly immaterial to the issues in the case, but was of such a character that the action of the court certainly did not tend to prejudice any of the substantial rights of either of the parties. That the defendant was a corporation, as alleged in the petition, was expressly admitted by the pleadings; and that said certificates, said assignments, and said patent were all duly executed, was impliedly admitted by the pleadings. The plaintiff in *272 *error did not put their execution in issue by denying their execution by a pleading verified by affidavit, and hence the statements of the petition, alleging their due execution, must be taken as true. Code, § 108; Gulf R. Co. v. Wilson, 10 Kan. *105, *111, *112; School-district v. Carter, 11 Kan. *445.

Under the pleadings the question asked the witness Wilcox, and nearly all of the deposition of Pomeroy, were wholly immaterial, and neither their admission nor exclusion could have materially affected the case. In those portions of Pomeroy's deposition material to the case, and read in evidence, we do not see any question sufficiently leading to require a reversal of the case.

We do not think the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained, for the allegations of the petition were amply proved. We take no notice of the evidence which was merely immaterial, or which did not tend to prove any issue in the case, and which did not tend to prejudice the substantial rights of the plaintiff in error. There was some of this kind of evidence introduced. The most of the facts found by the court were facts admitted by the pleadings. Whether the eighth finding of fact was warranted by the testimony outside of the pleadings, or not, is wholly immaterial. The pleadings impliedly admit the due execution of said certificates and said assignments, and evidence could not properly have been admitted to show that they were not duly executed. It makes but very little difference whether the court below was technically correct in all its conclusions of law or not, provided the pleadings, and the evidence thereunder, and the facts found from such evidence, sustain the judgment. And we think the pleadings, the evidence thereunder, and the facts found therefrom, amply sustain the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

1. Continuance: Diligence in Procuring Testimony. Where a witness whose testimony is material could be procured by the exercise of reasonable diligence, but the witness tells the party wanting his testimony that he will be present at the trial of the case so that his testimony may be used, and such party uses no diligence to procure the testimony of said witness, held, that such party is not entitled to a continuance for the want of the testimony of such witness. [Wilkins v. Moore, 20 Kan. 538.]<sup>1</sup>
2. ———: Motion for: Materiality of Testimony. Before a judgment of the district court can be reversed because such court overruled a motion for a continuance to procure the testimony of an absent witness, it must appear somewhere from the record that such testimony was material and competent in the case. This should really appear from the affidavit itself filed for the purpose of procuring the continuance; but, beyond all doubt, it should appear from the record, or some part thereof.
3. Principal and Agent: Declarations of Agent: Authority to Bind Principal. It is a general rule that the declarations of an agent, in order to bind his principal, must not only come within the scope of the agent's authority, but they must also be made by the agent while he is transacting his principal's business, and be connected therewith as a part of the res gestæ.<sup>2</sup>
4. Continuance: Discretion of Court. Continuances are to some extent within the discretion of the trial court; and unless it is shown that the trial court abused its discretion in granting or refusing a continuance, the appellate court will not declare the rulings of the trial court in such a case erroneous. obtained fraudulently. When the case was called for trial she asked for a continuance of the same until the next term of the court, and filed two affidavits in support of her motion for a continuance. The court overruled said motion, the defendants excepted, and this is the sole ground for error in this case.

The first affidavit was filed for the purpose of obtaining a continuance so as to procure the testimony of one William Stafford. The affidavit, however, does not show that any legal diligence was used to get the testimony of said Stafford. Although it appears that Stafford resided in the same county where this suit was brought and tried, at and after the time it was brought, yet no subpoena was ever issued to procure his attendance. And although he afterwards removed from said county to Chicago, Illinois, yet no attempt was ever made to procure his deposition. Stafford told the defendants that he would be present at the trial, but that does not excuse the defendants' want of diligence in not attempting to procure his testimony. Educational Ass'n v. Hitchcock, 4 Kan. *36. The witness' testimony could have been procured by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Hence we think the court below did not err in refusing to grant a continuance for the want of the testimony of such witness.

The other affidavit was filed for the purpose of getting a continuance to procure the testimony of one Charles H. Purinton. We think this affidavit is sufficient to procure a continuance, provided the alleged testimony of said Purinton is competent and material in this case. The said alleged testimony is as follows: "The said Purinton, if present, would swear and prove that he was present in Junction City, Kansas, on the twenty-sixth of February, 1872, the date of the execution of the note and mortgage by Mrs. Samuli O. Swenson, wife of affiant, John P. Swenson, and that at that time one Rhodes, the then general agent of the said plaintiffs, told him that all he wanted was to induce Mrs. Swenson to give her note and mortgage upon her own individual property to secure the payment of the money due to them from John P. Swenson, to-wit, the sum of $4,087.06, and then John P. Swenson might go to the devil; and immediately after securing said note and mortgage he, the said Rhodes, as such general agent, told the witness Purinton that he had come it over Swenson (meaning John P. Swenson) at last, and that by the assurance that he, as the duly-authorized agent of the said plaintiffs, would constitute the said John P. Swenson their agent for the counties of Davis, Morris, Dickinson, Clay, and Cloud, in the state of Kansas, for the term and period of five years from that date. Witness will also swear that the agency of said plaintiffs aforesaid would have been worth at least $1,500 per year, and that, after the procurement of said note and mortgage as aforesaid, the said Rhodes, as the duly-authorized agent, and acting for the said plaintiffs, disregarding the promises and agreement aforesaid, gave the agency aforesaid to other parties in Junction City."

Now, before we can reverse the judgment of the district court because it overruled said motion for a continuance, it must appear somewhere from the record of the case that this evidence was material and competent. This should really appear from the affidavit itself. Gen. St. 689; Code, § 317. But, beyond all doubt, it should appear from the record, or some portion thereof. In the present case it does not appear from anything brought to this court that said evidence, or any portion thereof, was material and competent. The evidence is, in substance—First, what an agent of the plaintiffs said to a third person prior to the time of the execution of said note and mortgage as to what the agent intended to do; second, what said agent said to this same third person after said note and mortgage were *276 *executed as to what the agent had done, and what he intended to do; third, what the opinion of said witness was as to the value of a certain agency which said agent agreed to confer upon John P. Swenson. It is not claimed in this court that the last-mentioned evidence was competent and material; and it was not competent and material, for there is nothing in the whole record that tends to show that said witness had any knowledge or intelligent opinion as to what was the value of said agency which said agent agreed to confer upon Swenson.

It is a general rule that the declarations of an agent, in order to bind his principal, must not only come within the scope of the agent's authority, but they must also be made by the agent while he is transacting his principal's business, and be connected therewith as a part of the res gesta. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 113; Story, Ag. §§ 134–136; Paley, Ag. 256, 257; U. S. Exp. Co. v. Anthony, 5 Kan. *490. Now, the declarations in the present case were not made while the agent was transacting his principal's business, and they formed no part of the res gesta. A part of said declarations was made before the agent commenced to transact his principal's business, and the other part was made afterwards. No portion of said declarations was made during the time the agent was negotiating with the defendants, and no portion thereof formed any part of the transaction had with the defendants. These declarations should have been made during the transaction, and as a part thereof, in order to constitute any portion of the res gesta. State v. Montgomery, 8 Kan. *351, *360, et seq.; Luby v. Hudson R. R. Co., 17 N. Y. 131; Sweatland v. Illinois & M. T. Co., 27 Iowa, 433; Osgood v. Bringolf, 32 Iowa, 265. But if said declarations had been so made, Swenson and wife would have known it, and they would not now be claiming that they were defrauded in consequence of them. All that these declarations tend to prove is that the agent did not intend to appoint Swenson as an agent of the plaintiff at the time when said agent agreed to do so.
 *277 Does this *make any difference? If the agent made a contract for his principal to appoint said Swenson an agent, and then neglected or refused to do so, would not his principal be just as liable if the agent made the contract in good faith as though he acted in the worst of faith, and never intended to appoint Swenson to said agency? Does not the question depend upon whether there was a breach of any valid contract, without reference to what the intention of the agent were? This question, however, is not in the case. The only question is whether the declarations of an agent, when not in the performance of any business for his principal, can be used as evidence against his principal. We do not think they can. It does not seem from the record that the agent himself was examined as a witness on the trial. Continuances are, to some extent, within the discretion of the trial court; and unless it is shown that the trial court abused its discretion in granting or refusing a continuance, the appellate court will not declare the ruling of the trial court in such a case erroneous. Hottenstein v. Conrad, 9 Kan. *486; Davis v. Wilson, 1 Kan. *74.

AARON A. BELL v. CHARLES H. TAYLOR.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

1. Judicial Sales: Sales in Gross of Separate Tracts. A sheriff's sale of separate lots, made in gross, is irregular and voidable, and may be set aside on motion of the judgment debtor.
2. ———. The rule is the same though the debtor has but an undivided interest in the separate lots.
3. ———. This is not an arbitrary and inflexible rule. Circumstances may exist which show that more can be realized by a sale in gross, and the sale in gross, such a sale will be upheld.

*278 *Error from Mitchell district court.

Taylor recovered a judgment against Bell and two others. In June, 1873, he sued out a writ of execution on his judgment, directed to the sheriff of Mitchell county. The sheriff, finding no goods and chattels of any kind of the defendants, levied said writ on "the undivided one-third of block 16; and the undivided one-third of lots 1, 2, 9, 10, 11, and 12, in block 18; the undivided one-third of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, in block 34; and the undivided one-third of lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, in block 35,—in the town of Beloit," as the property of Bell and sold the same "to Charles H. Taylor for the sum of $238.85, the same being the highest and best bid," etc. At the November term, 1873, of the district court, Bell filed his motion to set said sale aside "for the reason that said lots were not sold separately, but in bulk." The court overruled this motion, and, on motion of Taylor, confirmed said sale.

Horton & Waggener, for plaintiff in error, contended that a sheriff's sale of separate lots in gross was irregular, and should be set aside on motion of the judgment debtor, and cited Johnson v. Hovey, 9 Kan. *61.

H. & S. Cooper, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. The question in this case arises on the confirmation of a sale. The property sold was an undivided third interest in certain lots in the town of Beloit, which, from the numbers, were apparently separate, but which were sold in gross. A motion to set the sale aside on this account was overruled, and the sale confirmed. Such a sale has been decided by this court to be irregular and voidable, and on that account may be set aside on motion of the judgment debtor. Johnson v. Hovey, 9 Kan. *61. Counsel for defendant *279 in error claims that this is not an arbitrary rule; that hence *the reason of the rule, and therefore the rule itself, fails. The reason is that when sold separately the property will probably realize more than when sold in mass. This it is claimed may be true when the debtor owns the entire interest in the lots, but is not true when he only owns a small undivided interest therein. In such a case it is said no man would care to buy unless he bought an interest in enough lots to give him, on partition with the owners of the other interests therein, an entire lot. Hence he would not care to purchase an interest in a single lot for fear he would be compelled to pay unduly for an interest in the succeeding lot or lots. This reasoning, we think, is unsound. It assumes a state of facts which is as likely not to exist as to exist, and of whose existence or non-existence in this case we are not advised,—that is, that the remaining interests in all the lots are owned by the same parties; for if the other interest in each lot is owned by a different party, each lot would have to be partitioned separately. So, also, in such case, the most interested bidders would be little encouraged to bid. A man who owned two-thirds of one lot might be very anxious to buy the other third if he could buy that separately, and at the same time very unwilling to buy the undivided third of a dozen other lots in order to secure the third of that one. We do not mean to hold that the rule is arbitrary, and to be enforced in every case. Circumstances may often exist to make it for the interest of the debtor, and to justify and uphold a sale in bulk of separate lots. But nothing appears here outside of the record, and prima facie every such sale is irregular, and may be set aside by the debtor on motion, if such motion be made before the confirmation.

The order of the court will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to set aside the sale.

*JOHN R. BOYD v. AMOS SANFORD.

January Term, 1875.

1. Bill of Exceptions: Insufficient Record. Where the certificate to the bill of exceptions only shows that "it presents nearly all of the testimony introduced by the parties," it is impossible for this court to say that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence.
2. New Trial: Newly-Discovered Evidence: Affidavit. On a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, an assertion in the affidavit of the moving party that he had used due diligence to obtain such evidence is not sufficient. The facts showing such diligence must be disclosed. [State v. Kellerman, ante, *135; Wilkes v. Wolback, 30 Kan. 375; S. C. 2 Pac. Rep. 508; Carson v. Henderson, 8 Pac. Rep. 728.]
3. —: Misconduct of Party: Accident: Diligence. Where the grounds of a motion for a new trial are misconduct of the prevailing party, and accident or surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, and the facts as claimed are that the prevailing party testified incorrectly as to the contents of a letter, it is not error to overrule the motion when it does not appear that the prevailing party was guilty of willful false swearing, nor that the losing party had used due diligence to have and produce the letter at the trial.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Cherokee district court.

Sanford recovered a judgment against Boyd at the October term, 1873, for $120 for services as an attorney at law. Boyd moved for a new trial, which was refused.

W. M. Matheny, for plaintiff in error.

Amos Sanford, defendant in error, for himself.

BREWER, J. Three errors are alleged: First, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. As the certificate of the judge to the bill of exceptions is only that "it presents nearly all of the testimony introduced by the parties," it is impossible for us to say that the verdict was not sufficiently supported by the evidence.

The second error alleged is in refusing a new trial on the *281 *ground of newly-discovered evidence. The newly-discovered testimony consists of two letters written by Sanford, the plaintiff, to the defendant. But no diligence is shown—no reason given—why they were not produced at the trial. True, the affiant swears that he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced them on the trial; but this is insufficient. The facts which show diligence must be disclosed. The court is to decide, and not the party, whether reasonable diligence has been used. . Smith v. Williams, 11 Kan. *104.

The defendant below, plaintiff in error here, also filed a second motion for a new trial, on the ground of misconduct of the plaintiff, and accident or surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. The facts are these: The action was for professional services. That the services were rendered does not appear to have been questioned, nor was their value seriously contested. Defendant claimed that after they had been rendered plaintiff agreed to take a certain sum, to-wit, fifty dollars, in full payment; that he had paid part thereof, and tendered the balance. He testified on the trial that he had received a letter making such a proposition, but had lost it. Another witness testified to having seen the letter, and that such were its contents. The bill of exceptions does not show that plaintiff testified at all concerning the letter, or the proposition. But Boyd's affidavit filed on the motion states that the plaintiff on the trial "denied the contents of said letter, and testified that said letter stated 'if defendant would send him fifty dollars by a certain time, to-wit, the Tuesday after the writing thereof, he [plaintiff] would give defendant a full receipt.' This affiant also alleges that the letter was lost, and could not be produced on the trial, and has since been found." But he does not disclose what, if any, efforts were made to find and produce it at the trial, or how it happens to have been found within two days thereafter. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the court erred in overruling the motion. There is not enough to warrant the court in imputing willful false swearing to the *plaintiff,—nothing to show reasonable diligence on the part of the defendant. Laithe v. McDonald, 7 Kan. *254.

The judgment will be affirmed.

LUCY R. SHED v. JACOB AUGUSTINE.

January Term, 1875.

1. Principal and Surety: Pleading: Several Defenses not Inconsistent. Usury, extension of time to the principal whereby the surety is discharged, and payment are not inconsistent defenses in an answer of a surety on a promissory note.<sup>1</sup>
2. Evidence: Judicial Notice: Foreign Laws. The courts of this state do not take judicial notice of the laws of another state; and it is error to instruct a jury as to the meaning and effect of those laws in the absence of any evidence concerning them. [Dodge v. Coffin, 15 Kan. 284.]

3. Instructions: Erroneous. Where the jury may have been misled by such erroneous instructions, and may have based their verdict upon them, it is the duty of this court to reverse the judgment, even though there are other matters upon which the jury might properly have returned the same verdict. [Hodgin v. Barton, 23 Kan. 744; Solomon R. Co. v. Jones, 30 Kan. 611; S. C. 2 Pac. Rep. 657.]

Error from Davis district court.

On the eighth of May, 1855, at Mendota, Illinois, Augustine, as surety for one Rust, executed his promissory note for $200, payable to the plaintiff six months after date, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. The action below was on this note. Defendant answered, setting up three defenses: First, payment; second, that he signed the note without consideration, and the plaintiff, by agreement with the principal debtor, extended the time of payment one year, and without his knowledge or consent, and for a valuable consideration; third, usury. Trial at September term, 1873. Plaintiff moved the court to require defendant to strike out all except the defense of payment, as being inconsistent, or elect upon which defense he would rest his case. This motion was overruled.

*283 *Verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant.

Culbertson & Hoffmire and Case & Putnam, for plaintiff.

It was error to overrule plaintiff's motion. The defenses were inconsistent. Munn v. Taulman, 1 Kan. *258; Butler v. Kaulback, 8 Kan. *672.

The case must have been decided in favor of defendant on either the ground of usury, or that the plaintiff extended the time of payment of the note, for there is no proof of payment of the principal. The proof as to extending the time is contained in the evidence of the principal to the note, P. B. Rust, and shows that there was no binding contract to extend the time, and no consideration therefor. Story, Notes, §§ 415, 426; Chit. Bills, c. 9, p. 442; Bayl. Bills, c. 9, p. 339; Bank of U. S. v. Hatch, 1 McLean, 93; McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat. 544. As to the payment of interest during the time of forbearance, see Reynolds v. Ward, 5 Wend. 501; Central Bank v. Willard, 17 Pick. 150; Crosby v. Wyatt, 23 Me. 157; Bank of Utica v. Ives, 17 Wend. 501; Creath's Adm'r v. Sims, 5 How. 206. The requisites indispensable for absolving the surety are (1) a consideration; (2) a promise to indulge for a definite time; and (3) the absence of the surety's assent. Alcock v. Hill, 4 Leigh, 622; Bank of Utica v. Ives, supra; Norris v. Crummey, 2 Rand. 328; Hunter v. Jett, 4 Rand. 104.

As to the usury, the court instructed what the law of Illinois was as to usury. There was no evidence before the court as to the law of Illinois. The Gen. St. 1868, p. 700, § 370, provide how the laws of other states shall be proved. The court could not take judicial notice of the laws of Illinois, and it was error to instruct upon the law without proof. Walker v. Armstrong, 2 Kan. *222; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 489;

Porter v. Wells, 6 Kan. *455; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Blackshire, 10 Kan. 487.

N. C. McFarland, for defendant.

The defenses of extension of time, usury, and payment are not inconsistent with each other. They all may exist in a case. Nor do the cases cited by plaintiff's counsel (1 Kan. and 8 Kan.) decide to the contrary. But if it was error to refuse to grant the plaintiff's motion, it is not at all certain that it is such error as would *284 require a reversal of the judgment, the plaintiff not being prejudiced thereby. If there is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain any one of the defenses, the verdict and judgment must stand.

The evidence shows that the time of payment of the note was extended by the payee and principal, for a valid consideration, without the consent or knowledge of Augustine, the surety. Bearing in mind the rule so often laid down by this court, that it will not disturb the verdict unless it is clearly against the weight of the evidence, let us see what that evidence is: Rust, the principal, testifies that he was to pay 20 per cent. interest on the note; and that this was to be the rate on the new, or $200, note is shown, because he repeats that he was to pay $40 a year interest. He says: "I paid the interest, sometimes a little before, sometimes after, the same became due. After the note became due I paid, in six months, $40. I am quite positive I paid four and one-half years' interest. I think I paid Mrs. Shed, in all, $210. The note [first, or old, note] had run from the previous summer. All the amounts I paid were paid voluntarily, as interest. I think I paid at one time $30. At the time I executed the new note I paid $10. I paid these amounts as interest."

The plaintiff in her testimony does not deny that the rate of interest agreed to be paid was 20 per cent., and this evidently was the rate on both notes. She does not deny that the sums named by Rust were paid. She does not deny that they were all paid as interest. She does not deny that the first note had run from the previous summer, and as the note sued on is dated May 8, 1855, it is not probable that the first note had run over one year. It would seem as if the $30 was paid on the old note, and, as all that was paid was interest, it is fair to suppose that the $30 was the interest on the $150 note for one year; and, if so, then the $10 paid at the time of the execution of the $200 note was interest paid in advance on that note. If the $30 was not paid on the old note, then $40 was probably paid in advance on the $200 note. Rust says he "paid the interest, sometimes a little before, sometimes a little after, it was due." The plaintiff does *285 *not deny this last statement. If interest was paid and received in advance for any period of time by such action of the parties, the payment of the note was extended to that time. The payment being as interest, the $200 could not be due till the time expired for which interest had been paid. It was, in effect, an agreement not to sue till then. Rose v. Williams, 5 Kan. *483, *487; Crosby v. Wyatt, 10 N. H. 318; Savings Bank v. Ela, 11 N. H. 335; Savings Bank v. Colcord, 15 N. H. 119; Dubinsson v. Folkes, 30 Miss. 432; Scott v. Saffold, 37 Ga. 384; Flynn v. Mudd, 27 Ill. 323; Uhler v. Applegate, 26 Pa. St. 140; McComb v. Kittridge, 14 Ohio, 348; Blazer v. Bundy, 15 Ohio St. 57. The decisions cited by plaintiff in Maine and Massachusetts must give way to these authorities. Nor is the fact changed by the testimony of the plaintiff that she "never agreed to extend the time of payment." It is probable that she did not make what she called an "agreement." Kettell v. Wiggin, 13 Mass. 72. Nevertheless, her negotiations with Rust amounted to such agreement. Whether she did make such agreement is a conclusion which must be arrived at from what was said and done.

Nor does it make any difference whether the court charged correctly as to the law of the state of Illinois on the question of usury. If there is evidence in the record, under the law as laid down by this court as to the weight of evidence, to support the verdict under any one of the defenses, the court will not reverse the judgment for erroneous rulings of the court below on other issues. The jury could not have found, under the evidence, that the defense of payment was made out; nor could they have found, under the charge of the court, that the defense of usury was sufficiently made out. The court must, therefore, have found for the defendant on the defense of the extension of time, and their verdict on this defense cannot now be disturbed.

BREWER, J. This was an action in the district court, brought by plaintiff in error against Augustine, on a promissory note signed by him as surety. Plaintiff was the payee of the note. The answer, as it finally stood, contained three *separate defenses: (1) Usury; (2) payment; and (3) an extension of time to the principal, whereby the surety was discharged. Plaintiff claimed that these defenses were inconsistent, and moved the court to require defendant to elect upon which he would stand. This motion the court overruled, and properly so. All three defenses might be true. The contract might, in its inception, have been usurious, and to that extent have been modified thereby in accordance with the laws of the state where the contract was made. Extension of time might also, after the making of the usurious contract, have been given to the principal, whereby the surety would have been discharged from all liability thereon; and after such extension had released the surety, the principal might have paid the note, and thus destroyed all liability on the instrument. As all these defenses might, in fact, have existed, they were not inconsistent, and the motion was properly overruled.

No proof was made as to the laws of the state of Illinois,—the state in which this note was executed. Notwithstanding this omission, the court charged the jury as to the effect of usury upon the contract according to the laws of that state. This was manifest error. The courts of one state do not take judicial notice of the laws of another. They must be proved as other facts in the case. Counsel for defendant in error does not dispute this, but contends that, under the evidence, the jury could not have found against the plaintiff on the question of usury, but must have found against her on the question of extension of time to the principal, and that, therefore, the error is immaterial. We do not think this is clear. There was no evidence upon the plea of payment; but there was evidence tending to show an agreement to pay, and a payment, of 20 per cent. interest, and a payment of interest at that rate for four and a half years. The court charged the jury that 10 per cent. was the extent of legal *287 interest in Illinois, and that a party taking usurious *interest forfeited three times the amount of such interest, and could recover for the remainder of the note only. Upon this the jury might well have found for the defendant. True, this instruction seems to have been qualified by one given subsequently, which told the jury that usurious interest, voluntarily paid, could not be applied on the principal, but must be applied on "the interest accruing from the time of executing the said note, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum." But the jury may have understood that the extra and usurious interest was to be carried forward, and treated as an advance payment of subsequently accruing legal interest, and, in addition, that the party forfeited three times the amount of such usurious interest. In this case three times the usurious interest, upon the basis heretofore indicated, would have exhausted the principal. We cannot say, therefore, that the error was immaterial. Indeed, it seems to us full as likely that the jury found for the defendant upon the question of usury as upon the question of extension of time. The judgment must, therefore, be reversed, and the case remanded for another trial.

In reference to the question of extension of time, no objection is made to the instructions given, but it is insisted that the testimony fails to show any extension. We will not anticipate what may be shown on a subsequent trial, but would simply remark that, to make the proposed defense good in law, there must appear to have been a distinct agreement, without the consent of the surety, to give to the principal debtor an extension, and a valid consideration therefor,—a consideration which must be other than the payment of interest at the rate, and in the manner, required by the original contract for the use of the money.

Judgment reversed.

*288 *S. N. WILLIAMS and another v. B. A. FEINIMAN and others.

January Term, 1875.

1. Sales: Where Made: Order Taken by Traveling Agent. Where a person living and doing business in another state sends his agent into this state to solicit orders for goods, and the agent here takes orders, and sends them to the store of his principal, who fills the orders, and, without any special arrangement as to the manner and place of delivery, delivers them to the carrier in such other state, to be carried at the expense of the purchaser to the latter's place of business in this state, held, that the place of sale is in the state where the agent's principal lives and does business.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———. There is no complete sale—no transfer of title to particular goods—until they have been separated from the entire stock. Before such separation, there can be, at best, only a contract to sell.

Error from Anderson district court.

This action was originally brought before a justice of the peace to recover the price of goods sold and delivered by B. A. Feiniman & Co. to Williams & Pattee. Plaintiffs' bill of particulars shows the "goods" sold were several half-barrels of whisky, and several kegs and cases of brandy, gin, and wine, amounting to $293.97, on which defendants were credited with payments to amount of $95. The plaintiffs were wholesale liquor dealers, residing and doing business at Kansas City, Missouri. The defendants were doing business at Garnett, in this state. Answer, a general denial. The action was taken to the district court, where a trial was had at the September term, 1873. The real defense interposed at the trial was that the goods, for the price of which suit was brought, were intoxicating liquors, sold and delivered in Anderson county, Kansas, without the seller having a license as dram-shop keeper or retailer of intoxicating drinks. The court gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

J. J. & D. W. Hoffman, for plaintiffs in error. No brief on file.

*289 **Bergen & Kirk*, for defendants in error, contended that the sales to Williams & Pattee were made in Kansas City; that the particular goods bought were part of a large stock; that they were separated, and shipped at purchasers' risk, at Kansas City, upon which, and at which place, the sale was complete, and they cited 2 Pars. The laws of this state do not attempt to make the sale of intoxicating liquors void, except the sale be made in this state, and then only when the sale is upon credit, or without license. Simon*, 8 Pac. Rep. 602. Contracts by letter and telegraph, see note to Philadelphia W. Co. v. Detroit Works, 24 N. W. Rep. 885.

BREWER, J. This case is, in all essential particulars, similar to that of Haug v. Gillett, recently decided by this court, (ante, *140,) except that in this case the vendor resided, and had his place of business, outside the state. Feiniman & Co. are wholesale liquor dealers, in Kansas City, Missouri, in which place they have paid all taxes required by the state or national authorities for carrying on that business. Their store and stock of goods was in that place, and they had neither store nor stock in this state. The goods for which this action was brought were sold either by orders given to a traveling agent of Feiniman & Co., at the store of plaintiffs in error, in Garnett, Kansas; by orders sent by letter or telegram to the house, in Kansas City; or by contract made directly between the parties, in Kansas City. Where orders were taken they were subject to the approval of the firm in Kansas City, and in all cases the goods were there selected and separated from the stock of Feiniman & Co., and delivered to the carrier in Kansas City. The charges for carriage therefrom were paid by the plaintiffs in error. Clearly, there was no complete sale—no transfer of title to the particular goods—until they had been separated from the entire stock. Before such separation there was, at best, only a contract to sell. Now, the thing *290 forbidden by the dram-shop act is a sale, not a contract *to sell. True, its penalties reach to any gift of liquors, or any other shift or device to evade the provisions of the act; but the case here presents nothing of that nature. It is an ordinary, straightforward business transaction, and if forbidden at all, it must be because embraced within the plain prohibitions of the statute. But, as we have seen, the thing forbidden is a sale, and no sale was completed until the goods were separated and delivered to the carrier. It is not claimed that there was any special agreement to deliver the goods at Garnett, and both the partners of Feiniman & Co. testify that they were to be delivered at the depot in Kansas City, and to be thenceforward at the risk of the purchaser. And, indeed, it is the ordinary rule, in the absence of any special agreement, that a delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the purchaser, and completes the sale. 1 Para. Cont. ## JAY S. BUSH v. HENRY PEAKE and others.

January Term, 1875.

Special Verdict: Laws of 1870. Under the Laws of 1870 it was the duty of the court, upon the demand of either party, to instruct the jury to return a special verdict.

Error from Marion district court.

Peake & Marsh recovered a judgment against Bush at the September term, 1873, of the district court. Bush appeals, and the *291 only question is as to the right of a party to have a *special verdict under section 286 of the Civil Code, as amended by section 7 of chapter 87 of the Laws of 1870, upon his demand therefor. *R. BREWER, J. Plaintiff in error on the trial in the district court demanded a special verdict, which was refused. This was error. Under the Laws of 1870, upon the demand of either party, it was the duty of the court to instruct the jury to return a special verdict. Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. Rice, 10 Kan. *426. For this error the judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. (All the justices concurring.)

LEVI McVEY v. JOHN BURNS.

January Term, 1875.

1. Replevin: Right to Dismiss Action. A plaintiff in a replevin action may, notwithstanding he has obtained possession of the property under the writ, at any time before a final submission, dismiss such action without prejudice.
2. ———: Defendant's Rights. Notwithstanding such dismissal, the defendant may, unless the property be restored to him, have his rights of property and possession inquired into and determined by the court.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Osborne district court.

<sup>1</sup>An action to foreclose a mortgage may be dismissed, without prejudice to a future action, before the case is called for trial, notwithstanding the defendant has filed an answer amounting to a counter-claim; but such defendant has the right of proceeding to the trial of his claim, regardless of the dismissal. Amos v. Loan Ass'n, 21 Kan. 474. While the defendant in a replevin action has a right, notwithstanding dismissal by the plaintiff, to an inquiry and adjudication in that action of his claims to and interest in the property replevied, and, in case he avails himself of this right, can collect no more from the sureties on plaintiff's bond

Burns brought replevin for one bay mare and one brown horse, claiming ownership and right of possession. McVey answered—First, a general denial; and, second, that he was constable, and as such officer he had taken and held possession of said mare and *292 horse under and by virtue of a writ of *execution issued by him upon a judgment duly rendered against said Burns for the costs of a certain action, (describing it.) Reply, general denial, and a special averment that the process under which defendant claimed the right of possession was void, and setting up a copy of such process. To this reply defendant demurred. At the April term, 1874, the demurrer was sustained. Afterwards, when the case was called for trial, the following proceedings were had:

"[Title.] And now at this day this case came on to be tried, the plaintiff appearing by Smith & Knight, his attorneys, and the defendant by A Saxey, his attorney, and the said defendant demanded a jury to try the case; and thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to dismiss the case without prejudice to a future action, which motion the court sustained, and ordered that the property replevied in this case be returned to the said defendant; and it is hereby ordered and adjudged by the court that the plaintiff pay the costs of this action, —to all of which the defendant excepts."

A. Saxey, for plaintiff in error.

Smith & Knight, for defendant in error.

BREWSTER, J. The action below was replevin. The plaintiff there (defendant in error here) obtained possession of the property by the writ, and then, when the case was called for trial, moved the court to dismiss the action without prejudice. This motion was sustained, and of this ruling plaintiff in error complains. The court, at the same time that it sustained the motion to dismiss, ordered that the property replevied be returned to the defendant, and that the plaintiff pay the costs of the action. We see no error in the ruling of the court. In all cases an action may be dismissed by the plaintiff without prejudice at any time before the final submission. Civil Code, § 397. If a counter-claim or set-off has been presented, the defendant may proceed to the trial of his claim, notwithstanding the dismissal. *293 Code, § 398. In a *replevin action, "if the property has been delivered to the plaintiff, and judgment rendered against him on demurrer, or if he otherwise fail to prosecute his action to final judgment, the court shall, on application of the defendant or his attorney, proceed to inquire into the right of property and right of possession of the defendant to the property taken." Code, § 184. And than is awarded by such adjudication; yet this is not his only remedy, for, after a voluntary dismissal by the plaintiff, he may commence an independent action on the bond, and recover therein all his damages sustained by the taking of the property, including therein, if the title be in him, the value of such property. Manning v. Manning, 26 Kan. 98.

the court in such action, "before or after judgment, may compel the delivery of the property to the officer or party entitled thereto, by attachment." Code, § 188. These sections afford ample protection to a defendant in such an action when the plaintiff elects to dismiss his suit without prejudice. In this case the record discloses no formal application under these sections. Perhaps none was made. But the court ordered the return of the property. If that order has been obeyed, surely the defendant below has no cause of complaint. If not, let him apply to that court under section 188, or bring his action on the bond, in which, notwithstanding the form of the judgment in this case, he can recover full compensation. Marix v. Franke, 9 Kan. *132.

The judgment will be affirmed.

E. N. MORRILL and another v. J. C. DOUGLASS.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

1. Quieting Title: Pleading and Proof: Specific Answer: Evidence under. Where, in an action to quiet title, a petition is filed, alleging, among other things, ownership and possession by the plaintiff, and the answer, without any denial of the allegations of the petition, only sets up a specific title, it is error to admit evidence of any other than the title pleaded; but where the answer contains, besides the plea of a specific title, a denial of the allegations of the petition, it is not error to admit in evidence a voluntary conveyance from the plaintiff, a sheriff's or a tax deed, or any other legal testimony tending to show that plaintiff is not the owner as alleged, whether specifically set up in the answer or not.
- *294 *2. ———. Where the testimony only shows that plaintiff has no title or possession, but fails to disclose any interest or title in the defendant, no affirmative relief can be granted the latter.
3. Tax Deed: When not Void. A tax deed which does not state the amount for which the sale certificate was assigned by the county, but which gives the amount for which it was sold to the county, the date of such sale, and the date of the assignment, is not, by reason of such omission, void on its face. [Board of Regents v. Linscott, 30 Kan. 261; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 81.]
4. ———. Nor is a tax deed void simply because it shows that it is made upon the consideration alone of one year's tax and interest. [Douglass v. Nuzum, 16 Kan. 525.]
5. Taxation: Assessment Roll: Separate Books. An assessment roll, otherwise regular, is not invalidated by the fact that it was returned and preserved in separate books for each township instead of in a single book for the county.

6. Public Records: When not Found: Presumption. Where notices, affidavits, etc., are directed to be preserved in a particular office, a failure to find them there raises a presumption that no such documents ever existed; but this presumption is by no means conclusive.
7. Tax Deed: Prima Facie Evidence of Regularity. A tax deed is made prima facie evidence of the regularity of all prior proceedings; therefore of the fact that all notices and affidavits required were duly given. The treasurer is required to file in the county clerk's office all notices, affidavits, and papers in relation to tax sales. The sale in this case was for the taxes of 1862. The county clerk testified that he could not find certain notices in his office; that if they were in the office they should be in a certain bundle, which he produced, and in which they were not; that when he had first taken possession of the office he had sorted all the papers therein; that he could not swear that they were not in his office; and that when the papers of his office were kept in the old court-house some of them were eaten up by rats. Held, that a finding of the district court, upon this testimony, in favor of the validity of the deed, so far as affected by these notices, would not be reversed in this court.
8. Taxation: Contract of County Commissioners in 1868 for Certain Assignments, Void. In 1868 the county commissioners were not authorized to contract for the transfer and assignment of tax-sale certificates for lands struck off to the county at prior tax sales, and a contract therefor was ultra vires, and void.
9. —. Where the county commissioners assumed to make such a contract, by the terms of which some certificates were to be assigned for the amounts necessary to redeem the land, and others for a sum in gross, which was less than the amount requisite for redemption, and, in pursuance of such assumed contract, the treasurer and clerk assigned all the certificates named therein, and received pay according to the terms of the contract, held, that such assignments were valid as to those certificates for which they received the legal pay, and that tax deeds based thereon were not thereby avoided. [Noble v. Cain, 22 Kan. 498.]

Action by E. N. Morrill and W. W. Guthrie, as plaintiffs, to quiet title to the E.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 26, township 6, range 12 E., and the W.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 1, township 6, range 18 E., in Jackson county. The plaintiffs claimed to be the legal owners, and in peaceable possession, of said lands, and alleged that Douglass, the defendant, "sets up and claims an estate and interest in and to said premises adverse to the title of the plaintiffs, but that the same is null and void;" and asking that said defendant's claim and title may be determined and adjudged to be null and void as against the title of the plaintiffs. The action was tried at the April term, 1874, of the district court. The plaintiffs showed a regular chain of title, from the patent down, in themselves, and that the land was vacant. The defendant offered in evidence three tax deeds to show title in himself. Two of these deeds were dated September 8, 1868; one of them upon the sale of 1863 for taxes of 1862, the other upon the sale of 1864 for taxes of 1863. The other deed was dated January 30, 1872, issued on said sale of 1863 for the taxes of 1862, and was procured by defendant to cure some real or supposed defects in the former deed issued to him on that sale. Clippinger v. Tuller, 10 Kan. \*377, \*381. It is this last tax deed which is commented upon and sustained by the court in the opinion, infra. Said deed is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that whereas, the following described real property, viz.: N. E. qr. sec. 8, town 6, range 16; west  $\frac{1}{2}$  S. W. qr. sec. 9, town 6, range 16, [here follow 50 other tracts, described in the same manner as the 2 tracts mentioned, and including the land described in plaintiffs' petition,]—situate in the county of Jackson and state of Kansas,—was subject to taxation for the year 1862; and whereas, the taxes assessed upon said real property for the year 1862, aforesaid, remained due and unpaid \*296 at the date of the sale \*hereinafter mentioned; and whereas, the treasurer of said county did, on the seventh of May, 1863, by virtue of authority in him vested by law, at an adjourned sale of the sale begun and publicly held on the first Tuesday of May, 1863, expose separately and severally to public sale, at the county-seat in said county, in substantial conformity with all the requirements of the statute in such case made and provided, the real property above described, for the payment of taxes, interests, and costs then due and unpaid upon said property; and whereas, at the time and place aforesaid, the said real property above described could not be sold for the amount of said taxes, penalty, and charges thereon, respectively, to any person or persons, in any parcel or parcels, at said public sale, or any adjourned sale thereof, the whole of said lands above described were severally bid off by the county treasurer of Jackson county, state of Kansas, for the several sums of money, dollars and cents, respectively placed opposite each respective tract in schedule hereto attached, and marked 'A,' being the whole amount of taxes, interest, and cost then due and remaining unpaid on each of several tracts of said real property, respectively, for said county of Jackson, in said state of Kansas, and which whole tracts, respectively, were in each case the least quantity bid for; and whereas, the county clerk of said Jackson county, state of Kansas, did, on the eleventh of May, 1868, in consideration of the several sums of money, dollars and cents, taxes, interest, and costs due, respectively, on said several tracts of land for the year 1862, paid into the county treasury of said county by John C. Douglass, of the county of Leavenworth and state of Kansas, duly assign the certificates of the sale of the property as aforesaid, and all the right, title, and interest of said Jackson county to said property, to said John C. Douglass; and whereas, the said county clerk did, on the eleventh of May, 1868, duly assign the certificates of the sale of the property as aforesaid, and all the right, title, and interest of said county of Jackson to said property, to John C. Douglass, of the county of Leavenworth and state of Kansas:

Douglass, his heirs and assigns, the real property last hereinbefore described, to have and to hold unto him, the said John C. Douglass, his heirs and assigns, forever, subject, however, to all rights of redemption provided by law.

"In witness whereof, I, E. D. Rose, county clerk, as aforesaid, by virtue of authority aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the official seal of said county, on the thirtieth day of January, 1872.

[Seal.]

"E. D. Rose, County Clerk."

This deed was duly acknowledged and certified, and recorded on said thirtieth of January, 1872. The district court found that Douglass had the legal title to, and was the owner in fee-simple of, the lands in controversy, and gave judgment decreeing that all title of the plaintiffs in said lands was null and void.

W. W. Guthrie and John S. Hopkins, for plaintiffs in error.

An assignee takes no greater rights than before existed in the county. Judd v. Driver, 1 Kan. *455. But, taken independently, each tax deed is void upon its face as a title. Yet it is on the record, and is a cloud upon plaintiffs' title, and is evidence, to extent of its recitals, against defendant claiming under it, and is so pleaded. Dean v. Madison, 9 Wis. 402; Knowlton v. County of Rock, Id. 410. When a deed has been made "on presentation to him of the certificate of sale," (section 112, p. 1055, Gen. St. 1868,) the certificate becomes functus officio, and no longer the subject of presentation to the clerk, with whom since the first deed it has been filed. If he may legally take two deeds, he may take twenty; if at interval of four years, equally so of forty years. The land-owner finds on record a tax deed which he knows cannot affect his land, and on this he rests.

*298 *He has a right to, and the tax-deed holder is estopped from denying his own act, so long as it is unquestioned; at least, when its effect is to entrap the land-owner. Blackw. Tax Titles, 311, 315.

The tax deed of January 30, 1872, is for same tax and property as in No. 1. In one case it is stated as sold on May 5th; in other, on 7th. In one case as assigned on May 18th; in other, on May 11th, (which is right.) It does not, as required in statutory form, state the amount of the bid for each tract, or the sum paid for such assignment, or to whom paid, and is shown to be upon the consideration alone of one year's tax. Now, while several tracts may be included in one deed, each separate requisite for a valid sale and conveyance can and must, in each case, be stated, as required, in statutory form, or the deed is not prima facie evidence, by which the onus probandi is changed, under rule of section 112, p. 1055, Tax Law 1868.

But, if rightly admitted, the deed was avoided by evidence offered by plaintiff: (1) The assessment roll is not as required. Dukes v. Rowley, 24 Ill. 221; Baily v. Doolittle, Id. 579; Gilpatrick v. Foster, 12 Ill. 357. A county assessor was required to make out a "tax-roll" for his county, and return a true copy to the county clerk. Any number of fractions for the several cities and townships will not constitute that "tax-roll," or a true copy. See sections 17-22, p. 862, Comp. Laws 1862. (2) The county clerk's office was made the depository of all evidence in reference to tax sales, etc. "When not there found, the presumption arises that no such document has ever been in existence." 16 Mich. 135; 5 Gilman, 379. The county clerk appeared under subpoena duces tecum, and stated his inability to find any such notices or papers. How otherwise could plaintiff prove a negative? All these "affidavits, notices, and papers in reference to such tax sale" are absolute prerequisites. Weller v. St. Paul, 5 Minn. 105, (Gil. 70.)

Section 112 of the tax law of 1868 does not make deed prima facie evidence of everything,—only to extent as therein specially provided. Section 20, p. 862, Comp. Laws 1862, required a step prior to assessment, and which the deed is not made evidence of. *Dukes v. *299 Rowley, supra*; Baily v. Doolittle, supra. The certificates *offered by defendant, as well as tax-sale book, show that the defendant had no interest in the certificates on which deed issued for ten days after time stated in deed. This variance would avoid the deed. But defendant's "lump trade" with the county commissioners for "all they had on hand" was neither authorized by law nor tolerable in good policy. The right to purchase was alone from the treasurer; the commissioners had no authority whatever in the premises. Defendant not only bought of the commissioners, but the record shows he bought on credit, on the eighth of July, 1868, when the trade was finally concluded, but the certificates had been assigned two months before. He got 60 certificates, while only the cost of 25 was computed, and of the $14,000 one-twentieth part was not computed. By such unauthorized purchase and transfer Douglass obtained no legal ownership to any of such certificates. He was party to, if not a fraud, at least a violation of law, and will not be permitted to reap any advantages therefrom. The rule is stricti juris, rigidly applied. Such certificate is a "chose in action," and any remedy thereon is barred after five years.

J. C. Douglass, defendant in error, for himself.

BREWER, J. This case turns upon the validity of a tax deed. The district court found in favor of its validity. Three principal questions are presented on the record. It is claimed, in the first place, that under the pleadings it was error to admit this deed in evidence; in the second place, that the deed was void on its face; and, in the third place, that, if not void on its face, it was shown to be void by the testimony aliunde. Of these in their order.

1. In reference to the first question, the facts are these: The action was brought by plaintiffs below, who are plaintiffs in error, under section 594 of the Code. They alleged that they were the owners and in possession of the premises in controversy; that defendant *300 set up and claimed "an estate and interest therein adverse to theirs; but that the same was null and void. The answer first denied specifically the ownership and possession of plaintiffs, then set up a single tax deed, and closed with a plea of the statute of limitations. The deed set up in the answer was not the one afterwards received in evidence, and held valid. The latter was a subsequent deed, given upon the same sale. The reply, which is very full, was obviously prepared on the supposition that all the tax deeds held by the defendant had been specifically pleaded. While only one is set up in the answer, the reply frequently speaks of "each of said pretended deeds," and also alleges, in obvious reference to the deed held valid, "that such last-pretended deed is null and void because executed upon the same pretended sale, and for the same pretended consideration, for which the said first-described pretended deed was executed." It is apparent, therefore, that the plaintiffs were not surprised by the production of this second deed based upon the one sale. Was the deed improperly admitted in evidence? Counsel insists that defendant having pleaded the one deed, was limited in his evidence to that; that he had elected to rest his claims upon the one title, and had tendered an issue thereon. If the answer contained nothing but this single tax deed, there would be force in the argument. But it contains a specific denial of the plaintiffs' ownership, in language as full and satisfactory as the allegation of ownership in the petition. It thus tendered an issue upon that question, and upon such issue any evidence was competent which tended to show that the plaintiffs were not the owners. A voluntary conveyance from them,—a sheriff's or a tax deed,—whether running to the defendant or not, was evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs were not the owners, and therefore tending to defeat their right to maintain any action. Of course, if the title ran to some third party, without subsequently passing to the defendant, it would furnish no basis for granting him affirmative relief,—it would simply tend to defeat the plaintiffs' action. We do not mean to say that proof that plaintiffs had no title would necessarily defeat the action. *Their possession, if actual possession is shown, gives them a right to have adverse claims thereto determined. Brenner v. Bigelow, 8 Kan. *496; Giltinan v. Lemert, 13 Kan. *476. But testimony tending to show that the plaintiffs had no title, as well as that tending to show that they had no possession, is competent; and if they had neither title nor possession, they could maintain no action, even though defendant had no claim to the property. In other words, having no interest themselves, they could not litigate defendant's claims.

A second proposition is that the deed is void on its face. It recites a sale to the county, and an assignment of the certificate to defendant. It embraces a large number of other tracts of land. The objections to it are thus stated by counsel: "It does not, as required in statutory form, state the amount of the bid for each tract, or the sum paid for such assignment, or to whom paid, and is shown to be upon the consideration alone of one year's tax." We think it does state the amount bid for each tract. It gives a table incorporated into the deed, and called "Schedule A," in one column of which is the description of the property, and opposite each tract is placed a certain amount in dollars and cents; and it declares that the "lands above described were severally bid off by the county treasurer of Jackson county for the several sums of money, dollars and cents, respectively, placed opposite each respective tract in schedule hereto attached, and marked 'A;' being the whole amount of taxes, interest, and cost then due and remaining unpaid on each several tract of said real property, respectively."

In reference to the sum paid for the assignment, and the party to whom it was paid, the deed reads thus: "And whereas, the county clerk of said Jackson county, state of Kansas, did, on the eleventh of May, 1868, in consideration of the several sums of money, dollars and cents, taxes, interest, and costs, due respectively on said several tracts of land for the year 1862, paid into the county treasury *302 of said county," etc. *Now, this describes the place of payment as required by statute, (Laws 1866, p. 277, § 74,) and indicates with sufficient precision the amount paid. The amount for which it was struck off to the county being given, as well as the date of such sale, the date of the assignment, the amount of taxes, interest, and costs then due is a mere matter of calculation. It would be no more certain if the calculation had been made and the result stated in figures. It might disclose an error in the calculation, but would such an error vitiate the deed? Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. *326. It must be remarked that the statutory form does not include any statement of the amount paid for an assignment, nor, indeed, does it seem to have been prepared with reference to a sale to the county, and a subsequent assignment by it of the sale certificate. Norton v. Friend, 13 Kan. *582; Magill v. Martin, ante, *67. As to the last suggestion,—that it appears “to be upon the consideration alone of one year’s tax,”—we know of no reason why that is not sufficient consideration. The sale is made for the non-payment of one year’s tax, and if the owner of the land should see fit to pay the taxes of the subsequent years, we do not see how that would invalidate the sale, or prevent a deed. If it did, a land-owner might, with perfect safety, omit the payment of his taxes every fourth year. We think, therefore, that the deed was prima facie valid, and properly received in evidence.

3. The remaining proposition of counsel is that the deed was shown to be void by evidence aliunde; and under this head it is insisted that the assessment roll is not as required. Counsel for plaintiffs cite Comp. Laws 1862, p. 862, § 21: “The assessor shall make a correct list of all the taxable property in his county, to be called a ‘tax-roll.’” This, counsel insists, must be a single paper or book; that a number of fractions for the several cities and townships will not constitute such roll. Here four separate books were produced, indorsed, respectively, “Assessment Roll of Jefferson Township, 1862,”

“Assessment Roll of the Town of Holton, 1862,” etc. In each *308 was a certificate of the assessor that such roll contained all the taxable property in such town or township; and it was also in testimony that the county was then divided into the three townships and one town, and that these four books embraced all the taxable property of the county. We fail to see anything in this to invalidate the assessment, when the entire county is assessed, and by the proper officer, and a proper authentication made of the assessment of each township, and all returned to the proper officer. Surely, an omission to fasten these several assessments together into one roll or book can have wrought no prejudice to anybody, or in any direction. The assessment was sufficient.

Again, the county clerk was called as a witness, and testified that he was unable to find in his office any proofs of the notices required by sections 32, 36, 37, 38, and section 55, of the tax law of 1862; that if any such were in his office, they ought to be in a certain bundle of papers, which he produced; that they were not in such bundle; that he could not say they were not in his office, but that if they were, he had never seen them; and that when he first took possession of the office he had sorted over the files and papers, and placed them in proper packages, where they since had been kept, and that he was certain he had placed in the package produced all papers relating to such matters; that before the new court-house was built, and while in the old court-house, some papers had been eaten by rats. He was also asked whether bills had not been presented and paid by the county for the publication of such notices, but the court sustained an objection to such testimony. The notice required by section 32 is a notice of the amount of the different taxes on each hundred dollars' valuation, and also of the day on which the treasurer will attend in each township for the purpose of receiving taxes. This notice is required to be posted at each place of holding elections, and to be published for four weeks in some newspaper having circulation in the county. There is no express direction to any officer to *304 take and preserve any proofs of the publication or *posting of this notice. Sections 36, 37, and 38 require a notice of the sale for taxes, which notice is to contain a list of the property to be sold. Posting and publication are also required of this notice. Affidavits of both such posting and publication are specifically required to be made and preserved. Section 55 provides for a notice of the expiration of the time limited for redemption, which notice is to contain a list of the unredeemed lands and lots, with the amount of taxes and interest calculated to the last day of redemption. Publication or posting is required of this notice, but there is no specific direction to any one to take and preserve proofs thereof. There is, however, in section 47, a general direction to the county treasurer to "file with the county clerk all affidavits, notices, and papers in reference to such tax sale, to be preserved by him." Upon this two questions arise: First, was the failure to find these notices in the county clerk's office proof that they never existed? If so, was the omission to give these notices fatal to the validity of the sale and deed? We shall rest our decision upon the answer to be given to the first question. It is probably true that when notices, affidavits, etc., are directed to be preserved in a given office, a failure to find them there raises a presumption that no such documents ever existed. Hall v. Kellogg, 16 Mich. 135. But this presumption is by no means conclusive. It amounts simply to prima facie evidence. The deed, on the other hand, is prima facie evidence that they did exist, and were duly and legally given and made. More than that, the testimony of the clerk as to the destruction of papers weakens the force of the presumption from his failure to find them. No attempt was made by plaintiffs to introduce other testimony. No examination was made of the treasurer's office; no inquiry of the party who was treasurer at the time of the sale, or his deputies, or of the party who was then county clerk; none of the publishers of the newspapers. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the court erred in finding upon this question against the plaintiffs.

One other point remains, and that, like the last, is not free *305 *from difficulty. As heretofore stated, the sale was made to the county, which afterwards assigned the sale certificate to the defendant. The assignment was made in pursuance of a contract between the commissioners and defendant for the sale of a large number of sale certificates held by the county. The proposition of defendant, which was accepted by the commissioners, was substantially as follows: He proposed to buy all the claims for delinquent taxes

"belonging to Jackson county on the following terms: I will pay for all correct and regular descriptions, for all sales for the years 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, and 1866, the amount required by law to redeem the same, provided that all claims other than the above, and to include the sales for 1858, 1859, and 1860, and irregular or defective descriptions since, shall be quitclaimed to me for $100. Payment shall be made as follows, to-wit: $1,000 in hand; $1,000 per month thereafter, until the whole is paid." Payments were to be secured by bills of exchange drawn on and accepted by some responsible banker in Leavenworth. The amount of this purchase was about $14,000, and about one-twentieth of this amount consisted of irregular and defective descriptions, and of sales for years prior to 1861. The sale certificates in this case were in evidence. They were in all respects, both as to form and amounts, as they would have been if defendant had had no such contract with the county, and was only the purchaser from the treasurer and clerk in the manner provided for in the statute. Upon these facts counsel for plaintiff in error claims that "defendant's lump trade with the county commissioners for all they had on hand was neither authorized by law, nor tolerable in good policy; that the right to purchase was alone from the treasurer; the commissioners had no authority whatever in the premises." Defendant, on the other hand, insists that the contract was good; but, if not good, that it can have no effect in this case, because the treasurer and clerk did no more than they were compelled to do; that is, transfer the certificate upon the payment of the amount necessary to redeem. In other words, *he insists that the invalidity of the contract can affect only those cases of sales before 1861, and of irregular and defective descriptions which were quitclaimed for $100; for those, and those only, were transferred for less than the amount legally due.

It would seem to follow from the decisions already made in this court, and to appear from the provisions of the statute, that this contract between the defendant and the commissioners was ultra vires. The commissioners, it is true, are in a certain sense the general agents of the county; that is, to them is committed the general superintendence and management of the affairs of the county. There are, however, many limitations upon this general control. One is that they cannot interfere with duties specifically assigned to a given officer. They may not direct what instruments the register of deeds shall record, what fees he may charge, or what certificates give. They may not control the county attorney in the prosecution of criminal actions; nor can they give receipts for taxes, or assign sale certificates. These are duties assigned to particular officers, and the manner of their discharge specifically indicated. Comp. Laws, 865, § 33; Id. 867, §§ 43, 44; Laws 1866, p. 274, §§ 60, 61; Id. 277, §§ 73, 74; Gen. St. 1045, §§ 77, 78; Id. 1048, §§ 90, 91. "Whenever any person shall pay into the county treasury a sum of money or warrant of the appropriate fund, or county orders equal to the cost of redemption at that time, or any such tract of land or town lot," is the language of the statute in reference to the assignment of a certificate of sale. Laws 1866, p. 277, § 74; Gen. St. 1048, § 91. The statute having thus designated the officers to discharge this duty, and the manner of its discharge, the commissioners have no authority to interfere. They can no more make a valid contract in reference to the matter than they could one with reference to the fees the register of deeds should charge a third party for recording his deeds and mortgages. State v. Magill, 4 Kan. *415; State v. McCrillus, Id. *260; Clough v. Hart, 8 Kan. *487. Though the property which *307 cannot be sold to individuals at a tax sale is struck off to the county, it does not become thereby, like ordinary property of the county, subject to the control of the commissioners. If the purchase was an absolute purchase by the county, with a view of acquiring a perfect title, it would seem to follow that the county should be responsible to the townships, school-districts, and the state for their proportion of the taxes upon the property purchased, and that the county should be permitted, as a result of its purchase, to subsequently obtain a deed. But see, to the contrary, Judd v. Driver, 1 Kan. *455; State v. County of Atchison, Id. *479; State v. Magill, supra; Guittard Tp. v. County of Marshall, 4 Kan. *389; Sapp v. Morrill, 8 Kan. *677; Tarr v. Haughey, 5 Kan. *626.

The contract, therefore, was ultra vires and void. Douglass acquired no rights by such contract, nor was the treasurer or clerk justified thereby in disregarding the provisions of the statute. Other parties than the county are interested in the full payment of taxes. City and township and school-district are alike concerned. We do not hold that the contract was against public policy or good morals. It might be well if authority was given, once in a while, to some county officials to dispose as best they could of all the interest of the county in such back-tax sales. But there was no such authority at the time of this contract, and hence it was without warrant of law, and void. But how does this affect the validity of the assignment of the sale certificates in this case? It seems to us that the result follows, as is claimed by the defendant, that the assignments were good for which full payment was made, and that the others alone are subject to attack. This contract was void. It was as though none had been made. It is not pretended that the treasurer and clerk were parties to this contract with defendant, and the authorities cited by counsel as to the entirety of certain contracts are not applicable. The assignments the treasurer and clerk executed were the only contracts they entered into. They assigned some certificates, receiving full payment therefor. This was legal, and passed full title *308 to the assignee. Others they assigned, receiving only part of what they should have received. This was illegal. Whether they rendered themselves liable for the difference between the amount received and that which should have been received or not, whether the assignments passed a good title or not, whether they can be avoided or not, and whether Douglass would be responsible to the county for the above difference or not, are questions into which it is unnecessary, and would therefore be improper, for us to enter. It is enough, in this case, that the assignments were for a full and sufficient consideration.

These are all the questions necessary for determination in this case, and, there appearing as to them no error in the ruling of the district court, the judgment will be affirmed.

ABRAHAM JEFFS and another v. ROBERT FLICKENGER.

January Term, 1875.

1. Pleadings: Answer Filed out of Time. An answer filed two days after time is improperly filed, and should, on motion, be stricken from the files.
2. ———: Reply: Waiver. But if in such a case the plaintiff, thirteen days after the filing of the answer, having first applied to and obtained the written consent of the defendant therefor, files a reply thereto, he waives any irregularity in the time of filing the answers, and consents that the case may be tried upon the issues raised thereby.

Error from Doniphan district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

*309 W. D. Webb, for plaintiffs in error, contended that the filing of the reply to the answer was a waiver, and cited Green v. Dunn, 5 Kan. *259; School-district v. Griner, 8 Kan. *224; Hughes v. Miller, 2 G. Greene, 9; Barnum v. Fitzpatrick, 11 Wis. 81; Waterhouse v. Freeman, 13 Wis. 339; Smith v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 63; Tenney v. State Bank, 20 Wis. 152.

B. O'Driscoll, for defendant in error, contended that the records in this case do not speak the whole truth, as the same were made up after term. There is no error in the judgment. The same was properly rendered the last day of the term, and after plaintiffs in error refused to verify their answer. Douglas v. Rinehart, 5 Kan. *392; Luke v. Johnnycake, 9 Kan. *511.

BREWER, J. This was an action brought by defendant in error to foreclose a mortgage. An answer was filed two days after time. It set up certain payments on the note. Thirteen days after the filing of the answer the plaintiffs, having first obtained the written consent of the defendant's attorney thereto, filed a reply. During the then pending term judgment was taken by the plaintiffs as by default, and without any motion or other effort to rid the files of the answer and reply, or either of them. A motion was duly made to set aside this judgment, and reinstate the case for trial upon the pleadings, but the motion was overruled. It is insisted by counsel for defendant in error that the record is incorrect, and fails to state the truth. This may be unfortunate for him, but we must take the record as it is, and upon that dispose of the case. And upon that record we think the court erred in treating the case as in default. While the answer (filed, as it was, out of time) was improperly filed, and should, upon motion, have been stricken therefrom, yet, when the plaintiff elects to file a reply thereto, and particularly when he applies to and obtains from the defendant's counsel written consent therefor, he waives the irregularity in the filing, and consents that the case may be tried upon the issues raised by the pleadings, including the *310 answer. Luke v. Johnnycake, 9 Kan. *518; **Osgood v. Haverty, McCahon*, 182; S. C. 1 Kan. (Dass. Ed.) 587. The error was material, for it prevented a trial of the allegation of partial payments.

The judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for another trial.

CHARLES TILTON v. W. H. KNAPP.

January Term, 1875.

1. Supreme Court: Insufficient Record. Where the answer and reply are not set out in full in the record, nor even the substance of the same given, the supreme court cannot tell what the issues in the case were in the court below; nor what evidence would be required to prove such issues, or to sustain the decision of the court below.
2. ———. Where the record does not purport to contain all the evidence, the supreme court cannot tell whether the evidence introduced on the trial sustains the decision of the court below.
3. ———: Motion for New Trial: Presumption. Where a statement is inserted in a motion for a new trial that no evidence was introduced on the trial except an affidavit for a continuance, and there is no evidence to sustain this statement, and the court below overrules the motion for a new trial, held, that it should be presumed by the supreme court that the statement was not true.

Error from Sumner district court.

Action by Tilton, as plaintiff, to foreclose a mechanic's lien, a statement for which had been duly filed. The account attached to said statement showed a balance in favor of plaintiff of $149.31. At the November term, 1872, the plaintiff moved for a continuance, and filed an affidavit showing what he expected to prove by one C. S., an absent witness. The record contains a skeleton "case made," signed by the district judge, in which are instructions to insert, in *311 their proper *places, the petition, answer, reply, affidavit, judgment, etc. This is followed by a duplicate of said "case made," made complete by the insertion of the pleadings, etc., as directed in the original. In this latter part of the record, next after the affidavit for a continuance, is the following: "And the defendant answering himself ready for trial, and consenting that the said affidavit might be received and treated as the deposition of said absent witness, the court thereupon ordered the trial of this cause to proceed. This cause was thereupon submitted to the court, without the intervention of a jury, upon the petition, answer, and reply, and exhibits on file; and the court, having heard the evidence, and the arguments of counsel thereon, and being sufficiently advised in the premises, * * * finds for the plaintiff in the sum of $32.42. The court thereupon orders and adjudges that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of thirty-two dollars and forty-two cents, and the costs herein, taxed at $7.55."

Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was overruled.

J. L. Abbott, for plaintiff.

Charles Wilson, for defendant.

VALENTINE, J. The grounds relied upon in this case for a reversal are as follows: First, the record does not show that there was any answer to the petition in the court below; second, the decision of the court below is not sustained by sufficient evidence.

In answer to these objections we would say—First, the record does show that there was an answer to the petition. Even that portion of the record which the plaintiff in error claims constitutes the whole of the record shows it. It shows that there was a petition, answer, and reply, and that the action was tried thereon; and the other portion of the record sets out the answer and reply in full.

In answer to the second proposition of the plaintiff in error, *312 we would say: If we should consider only that portion *of the record which the plaintiff in error claims to be the whole of the record, then we could not tell what the issues in the case were in the court below; for in that portion of the record the answer and reply are not set out in full, nor is even the substance of the answer or reply given; and therefore we could not tell what evidence would be required to prove such issues, or to sustain the decision of the court below. But even if we should examine the whole of the record, and ascertain what the issues were, still we could not tell whether the evidence introduced on the trial would sustain the decision of the court below, as the record does not purport to contain all the evidence, or even any material portion of the same. There certainly was evidence, for the decision purports to have been rendered upon "the evidence in the cause, and the arguments of counsel thereon." It is true, the plaintiff states in his motion for a new trial that there was no evidence introduced, except the plaintiff's affidavit for a continuance; but there was no evidence to sustain this statement, and the statement itself is no evidence of the fact. The court overruled the motion, which is some evidence that the statement was not true. It should therefore be presumed by the supreme court that the statement was not true.

The judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

CEMETERY ASS'N v. JOSEPH MENINGER.

January Term, 1875.

1. Roads and Highways: Outlet. A road opening at one end into a thoroughfare, but without outlet or egress at the other, and leading only to a farm and a cemetery, may nevertheless be a public highway.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———: Dedication: How Proven. The dedication and acceptance by the public of such a highway may be proved in the same manner, and by the same character of testimony, as in the case of an ordinary thoroughfare.<sup>2</sup>
- *318 *3. ———: Dedication: Acceptance. Outside of cases of condemnation, and possibly prescription, to constitute a public road, two things are essential, a dedication by the owner of the soil, and an acceptance thereof by the public.
4. ———: User: Intent of Owner. A highway may be proved by long usage; but for this, the user must be such as to show that the public accommodation requires it to be a highway, and that it is the intention of the owner of the soil to dedicate the way to the public.
5. ———. Whether the user has been continued for such a length of time, and is of such a character, as to show these facts, is ordinarily a question for the jury.
6. ———: Cemetery: Highway Established by User, with Owner's Knowledge. A cemetery is ordinarily a public place. The accommodation of the public may require a highway to it; and the use of a way to it for funeral processions, and by parties going to and from the cemetery, with the knowledge of the owner of the soil, may be evidence sufficient to prove a highway.

Error from Wyandotte district court.

Meninger brought trespass against the City Cemetery Association, a corporation, to recover damages for breaking and entering plaintiff's close, and tearing down his fences, etc. The action was commenced before a justice of the peace. Defendant denied plaintiff's title to the premises, and the case was thereupon certified to the district court, where it was tried at the October term, 1873. Meninger had judgment for $20 damages.

D. B. Hadley, for plaintiff in error, contended that the facts showed that the lands claimed by Meninger were a highway; that dedication by the land-owner, and acceptance by the public, were sufficiently shown, and the court erred in its instructions to the jury.

Scroggs & Bartlett, for the defendant in error, maintained that the instructions were right, and cited Ang. Highw. 1; People v. Jackson, 7 Mich. 449; Hall v. McLeod, 2 Mete. (Ky.) 98; Onstott v. Murray, 22 Iowa, 466; Holdane v. Cold Spring, 23 Barb. 103; Mattoon v. Kidd, 7 Mass. 83; State v. Nudd, 23 N. H. 327.

*314 There must be two competent parties to constitute a valid dedication of lands to the public use; the grantee must accept the land dedicated, either in terms, or by treating it as public property by doing work upon it, by general and uninterrupted user by the whole public, or in some other manner signifying its acceptance. Manderschid v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 73; Tillman v. People, 12 Mich. 401; Grube v. Nichols, 36 Ill. 92. The public, and not merely a public corporation, must be the chief beneficiary in a dedication of land. Todd v. Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co., 19 Ohio St. 514; Hobbs v. Lowell, 19 Pick. 405; Clements v. West Troy, 16 Barb. 251; Oswego v. Oswego Canal Co., 6 N. Y. 257.

BREWER, J. The question in this case is as to the existence of an alleged highway. The facts are these: In 1857 one Sophia Clement was the owner of a tract of about seventy acres, a little north of the city of Wyandotte. A portion of this, on the west side, was inclosed and occupied by her as a residence. Along the east of this inclosure was a traveled road which ran from the city of Wyandotte to a saw-mill. In 1857 or 1858 she sold ten acres east of her inclosure for a cemetery, and which in the latter year was fenced and platted into lots. Between the west cemetery fence and the fence on the east of her inclosure, was left a road of about thirty feet in width, and the same as the previously traveled road, none of which, however, was on the cemetery grounds. The two gates of the cemetery opened, and the two avenues of the cemetery led, into this road, and it was the regularly traveled road to and from the cemetery, without objection, and without obstruction, from that time until the spring of 1873, when defendant in error fenced the south end of it. Prior to this time, however, and in 1867 or 1868, the saw-mill lying north of these grounds having been abandoned, the owner of the land immediately north of the cemetery had fenced across the road, so that from that time the travel thereon had been only by the occupant of the tract north, the occupant of the Clement field, and the parties visiting them, and of parties going to and from the cemetery. Mrs. Clement lived on the place until her death in 1864, with full knowledge of *315 the use of this road *by the public. After her death it was occupied by a tenant for a series of years, and until 1870, when defendant in error bought and moved onto it. There was other testimony tending to show an intention on the part of Mrs. Clement to dedicate this road to the use of the public, but it is unnecessary to notice it here. At the instance of the defendant in error the court gave this instruction: "If the jury find from the evidence that the land in question has not been traveled since 1860, except by the owner of the real estate, one of his neighbors, and persons attending funerals to the cemetery of said defendant, then the court instructs the jury that such travel is not sufficient to constitute said way a public highway by use, and they will find in favor of the plaintiff." The jury found against the existence of the highway.

It may be remarked that the fee of this cemetery is in the city of Wyandotte, and the association, plaintiff in error, holds simply a lease for ten years from 1870. What the terms and conditions of that lease are, we are not advised. But as the grounds belong to the city, and as they have been used as a cemetery since 1858, and for a dozen years before this association obtained any control over them, we must presume that they are public cemetery grounds, and not a mere private cemetery for a single family or organization. It is true that this road has not for years had an outlet on the north, and has therefore not been in the ordinary sense of the term a thoroughfare; and it is also true that it has been one of the disputed questions in the law of ways whether such a road could be legally held a public highway. See, on the one hand, Austin's Case, 1 Vent. 189; Wood-yer v. Hadden, 5 Taunt. 126; Wood v. Veal, 5 Barn. & Ald. 454; Simmons v. Mumford, 2 R. I. 172; Holdane v. Trustees Cold Spring, 28 Barb. 103. And, on the other, Rugby Charity v. Merryweather, 11 East, 376; Rex v. Lloyd, 1 Camp. 260; Bateman v. Bluck, 14 Eng. Law & Eq. 69; People v. Kingman, 24 N. Y. 558; Ferris v. Bramble, 5 Ohio St. 109; Sherman v. Buick, 22 Cal. 241; Bankhead v. Brown, 25 Iowa, 540; State v. Price, 21 Md. 448. In this state the *316 question has *been before the courts, and it has been settled that such a road may be a public highway. Masters v. McHolland, 12 Kan. *17. It follows from this that the authorities may condemn land for such a road, that the owner may by dedication constitute such a road a public highway, and that the fact of such dedication may be proved in the same manner and by the same character of testimony as in case of a thoroughfare.

We say nothing now of the comparative amount of testimony necessary to establish the fact of a dedication in the two cases. In order to constitute a way a public road, outside of cases of condemnation, and possibly of prescription, it is said that two things are essential: First, a dedication by the owner of the soil; and, second, an acceptance by the public. In the different cases reported stress is laid upon one or the other of these matters, according to the character of the questions involved. Thus, where the former owner is attempting to obstruct a way, the important matter is whether he has once actually made a dedication, and so estopped from obstructing it; and to that the testimony mainly runs. On the other hand, where the authorities are prosecuted for not repairing a highway, the important question often is whether the public have accepted the dedication, and upon that is most of the testimony. For the mere fact that a land-owner has dedicated certain land to the use of the public does not necessarily cast upon an unwilling public the duty of improving and keeping it in repair. No formal acceptance by any particular authorities is essential. The mere user by the public may be of such a character as to constitute an acceptance. Indeed, such user by the public with the knowledge of the owner may be sufficient evidence of both the dedication and the acceptance. We know this doctrine is denied by some courts, but it seems to us to rest upon the soundest principles. Of course no mere temporary or occasional use will be sufficient. It is said by RICHARDSON, C. J., in Barker v. Clark, 4 N.

H. 380, that "we entertain no doubt that a highway may be *317 proved by long usage; but a way, to *become public, must be used in such a manner as to show that the public accommodation requires it be a highway, and that it is the intention of the owner of the land to dedicate the way to the public." See, also, Holdane v. Trustees Cold Spring, 28 Barb. 103; Clements v. West Troy, 10 How. Pr. 199; Onstott v. Murray, 22 Iowa, 457; Hanson v. Taylor, 23 Wis. 547; (though in this case see a vigorous dissenting opinion of Dixon, C. J.,) Buchanan v. Curtis, 25 Wis. 99; Ang. Highw. § 161, and cases cited in note. It seems to us that the foregoing views are a fair statement of the rule applicable to these cases.

If a highway may be proved by usage, who is to determine whether the usage shown is sufficient? Does the usage prove an intention on the part of the owner to dedicate, and an acceptance by the public? These are questions of fact, and questions in their nature eminently appropriate for the consideration of a jury. Drake v. Rogers, 3 Hill, 604; Trustees M. E. Church v. Council of Hoboken, 33 N. J. 11. Both the intention and acceptance are evidenced by a series of acts. It is impossible, generally, to put the finger on a single circumstance and say that this is conclusive. It is true the user may be so temporary or occasional as to justify a court in stating as matter of law that it is not evidence sufficient to prove a highway; but we think this is not such a case. A cemetery is as public a place as a court-house, or a market. It may not be frequented as much, but visits to it are as necessary and as certain. The accommodation of the public requires a highway to it. Over that way all must travel. We may keep away from the court-house, and avoid the market, but the place of the dead none may shun. Now, if the accommodation of the public requires a highway to the cemetery, the use of the public of a way to it may be evidence of the acceptance by the public, and, if with the consent of the owner, of the dedication by him; and, when continued, as it has been in this case, for years, it is error for the court to state as matter of law that it is not sufficient evidence.

*318 That is a question *which must be left to the jury. For the error in giving the instruction quoted, the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

STEPHEN RHEINHART and others v. STATE OF KANSAS.

January Term, 1875.

1. Recognizance: Action on: Petition. In a petition on a forfeited recognizance it is not necessary to insert a copy of the order of forfeiture, nor to allege that it was "duly made."<sup>1</sup>
2. Evidence: Objection. An objection to testimony which does not specify the ground of objection is too general to be available. [Humphrey v. Collins, 23 Kan. 550; Long v. Kasebeer, 28 Kan. 240.]
3. ———: Order of Presenting. The order in which testimony is received upon the trial is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and, unless it appears that such discretion has been abused, is not ground for reversal. [Blake v. Powell, 26 Kan. 327.]

5. Justice of Peace: When He Holds over. A justice of the peace holds his office until a successor is qualified, and if a party has once been elected and qualified, and at a subsequent election is re-elected, but fails to qualify, he nevertheless remains a justice de jure, as well as de facto, until a successor is qualified.

Error from Washington district court.

Action upon a forfeited recognizance, brought by the county attorney in the name of the state. The recognizance was executed June 16, 1873, by Rheinhart, as principal, and J. B. Snider and E. H. Prall, as sureties, to secure the personal appearance of Rheinhart at the then next term of the district court "to answer a charge of burglary and larceny." A demurrer to the petition was overruled, *319 answer was filed, *and trial had at the December term, 1873.

The defendants objected to the introduction of all the evidence offered. The commitment objected to did not commence "The State of Kansas, to the Sheriff," etc. The words in italics were omitted, but in the body of the writ, after the recitals, it reads: "Now, therefore, in the name of the state of Kansas, you are hereby commanded," etc.

The district court made the following findings: "(1) That defendant Stephen Reinhart was arrested on a charge of having committed the compound crime of burglary and larceny in a dwelling-house, on the second of April, 1873, in Washington county, and brought before H. C. SPRENGLE, a justice of the peace, for preliminary examination, upon a warrant duly issued by said justice. (2) That said SPRENGLE was a justice of the peace for said county, and had full authority to hold a preliminary examination in said cause. (3) That said defendant was legally arrested under said warrant by one Martin Patrie, who was at the time a legally appointed and constituted deputy-sheriff of said county. (4) That on the ninth of June, 1873, said Reinhart had his preliminary examination on said charge before said justice, and was by said justice required to give bail in the sum of $1,000 for his appearance at the next term of the district court of said county to answer to said charge, and that said Reinhart failed to comply with said requirement. (5) That thereupon said justice issued a commitment directed to the sheriff of said county, commanding him to receive the said Reinhart into his custody, in the jail of said county, there to remain until discharged by due course of law. (6) That while said Reinhart was in the legal custody of said sheriff, in pursuance of said order of commitment, said Reinhart, as principal, and the other defendants, Snider and Prall, as sureties, by their certain recognizance or writing obligatory of date of June 16, 1873, a copy of which is attached to the petition herein, which recognizance was executed and delivered by said defendants personally to and in the presence of said Martin Patrie, the legally qualified and appointed deputy-sheriff of said Washington county, and was duly approved by said deputy-sheriff, acting on behalf of his principal, the sheriff *320 of said Washington county. * (7) By reason of the giving and taking of said recognizance as aforesaid the said Reinhart was then and there discharged from custody. (8) That said recognizance was duly certified by the said sheriff to the clerk of said district court, and was by said clerk duly filed and recorded. (9) That at said next term of the district court said cause of the state of Kansas against the said Reinhart came on for hearing, on the fourth of August, 1873, and was duly called; and said Reinhart, being three times solemnly called, came not, but wholly made default; and said recognizance was then and there, by the said court, declared forfeited, and the county attorney of said county was by the court ordered to institute legal proceedings on said recognizance; and that no part of said sum of money has been paid. The court finds, as a conclusion of law, that said plaintiff is entitled to recover judgment against said defendants for the sum of one thousand dollars, and costs."

Judgment in favor of the state.

J. G. Lowe, for plaintiffs in error.

Section 118 of Civil Code plainly prescribes what shall constitute a good petition when the action is founded upon a "written instrument as evidence of indebtedness." The recognizance set out in the petition of itself does not constitute a "written instrument as evidence of indebtedness," upon which a party would be entitled to recover, any more than would the setting out of a promissory note without alleging a default in payment. Without the order of the court, declaring the recognizance forfeited, and ordering the county attorney to institute proceedings for the collection of the amount thereof, there could have been no action upon the recognizance. This order was a condition precedent, and became a part of the "written instrument as the foundation of the cause of action." It is as necessary to be set out in the pleadings as a part of the "written instrument" as the recognizance itself; for without it the written instrument, as evidence of indebtedness, is incomplete, and only in part set out. Douglas v. Waddle, 1 Ohio, 423; State v. Caffee, 6 Ohio, 150; Gilliland v. Sellers' Adm'rs, 2 Ohio St. 225.

*321 *Section 121, Civil Code, provides that, "in pleading a judgment or other determination of a court or officer of special jurisdiction, it shall be sufficient to state that such judgment or other determination was duly given or made;" and certainly as much would be required in pleading an order of a court of general jurisdiction. In vain we search the petition for this statutory requirement. It is clear the petition did not state such facts as would entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded, and it was error of the court to overrule the demurrer.

It was error to admit as evidence on behalf of the plaintiff the order of commitment. Article 3, § 17, of the constitution says: "The style of all process shall be 'The State of Kansas.'" Said commitment was introduced for the purpose of showing that Rheinhardt was in the legal custody of the officer to whom the order of commitment was directed. It was incompetent for that or any other purpose, inasmuch as it was irregular, and not in accordance with the law. Before a man can be in the legal custody of an officer under an order of commitment, the process of commitment must be regular upon its face, and of such particular certainty as to enable the officer holding the person to enforce its mandates.

The bond and oath of office of the sheriff could cut no figure in the case, as his authority was not in question; and had it so been, the evidence would have been original, and not competent as rebutting testimony. For the same reason the court erred in permitting to be read in evidence, for the purpose of rebuttal, the proceedings of the board of county commissioners, and the bonds and oaths of office of Sprengle, to show that he had been regularly elected and qualified as a justice of the peace for the years 1870 and 1871. The bonds were irregular in not being signed by the requisite number of sureties, nor approved as is required by law. Section 108 of the Civil Code requires that, to raise an issue upon an "allegation of any appointment or authority," the answer shall be verified; otherwise the allegation will be taken as true. The verification of defendant's *322 *answer raised the issue, and it became necessary for plaintiff to establish its case before defendant could be required to offer any evidence. The verification of the answer destroyed plaintiff's prima facie case, and barred it from introducing, as rebutting testimony, what was necessary as original evidence. If plaintiff rested upon its supposed prima facie case, it was at its peril, and cannot be taken advantage of on rebuttal, except for good cause shown, and then the evidence is put in part of the original case.

Brewer, J. This was an action on a forfeited recognizance, and the first question arises on the overruling of a demurrer to the petition. The petition alleged the arrest of the defendant Reinhart; his examination before a justice; the order requiring him to give bail; his failure to do so; the commitment; the giving of the recognizance to the officer; its acceptance by him; and the consequent release of the defendant from custody; his failure to appear at the district court for trial; and the forfeiture. It also gave a copy of the recognizance. The specific objection is that it does not contain a copy of the order of the court declaring a forfeiture, nor does it allege that such order was "duly made." Neither of these is necessary. Section 121 of the Civil Code, upon which the latter part of the objection is based, refers only to judgments and orders of courts and officers of special jurisdiction, and has no application to the orders and judgments of the district court, which is a court of general jurisdiction. Nor is the forfeiture, in any sense, "a part of the written instrument which is the foundation of the cause of action." The recognizance is a separate and complete instrument. The forfeiture is an independent matter, and the evidence that the condition of the recognizance has been broken. It may be necessary to establish a liability on the recognizance, as demand is necessary to establish a liability on a note payable on demand; but it is no part of the instrument. The demurrer was properly overruled.

*323 *The answer contained a general denial, and also a special denial under oath, that the justice before whom the preliminary examination was had, and the deputy-sheriff who took and approved the recognizance, were legal officers. Upon the trial certain testimony was admitted, over the objection of the plaintiff in error, defendant below. To most of the testimony thus admitted no specific ground of objection was raised. Under those circumstances error cannot be affirmed. Walker v. Armstrong, 2 Kan. *199; Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. *176; Luke v. Johnnyeake, Id. *511; Marshall v. Shibley, 11 Kan. *114. Other testimony was objected to on the ground that, being part of the original case, it was admitted in rebuttal; and also because it was received after the testimony had once been closed. These are matters largely within the discretion of the trial court, and, unless it is apparent such discretion has been abused, are not grounds for reversal. There is here no evidence of any abuse. Laws 1872, p. 329, § 1. These cover all the matters of evidence noticed by counsel for plaintiff in error in his brief.

It may also be said that the motion for a new trial is based solely upon the ground that the findings of fact are not supported by the testimony, and that the conclusions of law are contrary to law. Under these circumstances, it is apparent that the rulings of the court in the admission of evidence must be taken to be correct. Notwithstanding this, we have carefully examined the testimony, and see no error in the admission of evidence. As to the finding of the court that the justice and deputy-sheriff were legal officers, it is abundantly sustained by the testimony. As to the justice, it appeared that he was elected and qualified in 1870, and had continued to act without objection ever since. It appeared also that he was re-elected in 1871, and again in 1873. The bond filed at this last election does not appear on the face of it to have been approved. Still, under his prior election, he held until his successor was qualified, (Const. art. 8, § 12,) and hence was still a justice de jure as well as de facto. As to *324 the deputy-sheriff, it appeared that this was during the *second term of the sheriff that the written appointment of the deputy was made and filed at the commencement of the first term, and no other was on file in the office of the county clerk, though the deputy-sheriff testified that at the commencement of the second term he received a written appointment, and filed it in the county clerk's office; but it also appeared that this party had been regularly acting as deputy-sheriff during both the first and the second term. Under those circumstances, it is evident that he was at least an officer de facto, and as such his acts were binding.

We see no error in the proceedings, and the judgment must be affirmed.

N. B. CANNON and another v. CONRAD KREIPE and others.

January Term, 1875.

1. Pleading: Stating Same Defense Twice: Demurrer: Immaterial Error. Where the same matter of defense is twice alleged in the answer, but is stated as two separate defenses, and a demurrer is sustained to one of said defenses, but the other left unchallenged by demurrer, and the matter inquired into upon the trial, the error, if any, is immaterial.
2. Debtor and Creditor: Contract of Debtor with Stranger. Where a debtor makes a contract with a third party, by which the latter agrees to pay the debt, the creditor is not bound by this contract, or under any obligations to sue upon it, but may proceed against the debtor the same as though no such contract had been made.
3. Equity: Application of Securities. While equity will sometimes decree the order in which two funds or securities shall be applied to the payment of indebtedness, it is essential that it clearly appear that such decree will in no manner trench upon or prejudice the rights or interests of third parties.
4. Assignment of Debt: Transfer of Securities. While the transfer of a debt ordinarily carries with it all the securities therefor, yet this is not necessarily so, and may be changed by stipulation.

*325 *Error from Shawnee district court.

Action by Conrad Kreipe, to foreclose a mortgage on twenty acres of land, given by Cannon and wife to secure a note for $962.85, given by said Cannon to C. & G. Cooper in March, 1871, and by them transferred to said Kreipe. The answer of Cannon and wife set forth three defenses: First, a general denial; second, that plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and that George W. Spencer and Theodore Kreipe had "lifted and satisfied" said note "in pursuance of an agreement between said N. B. Cannon and said Spencer and T. K.;" third, that Cannon, at the time said real-estate mortgage was executed, had given to said C. & G. Cooper a chattel mortgage to further secure said note, which chattel mortgage was duly filed of record, and still owned and held by said C. & G. Cooper; that in May, 1872, said Cannon had sold and delivered a portable saw-mill to said Spencer and T. K., in part payment for which they agreed to pay off the note and mortgage mentioned in plaintiff's petition; that said Spencer and T. K., in July, 1872, "made arrangements with the plaintiff to purchase the note mentioned in plaintiff's petition, and to foreclose said real-estate mortgage for the benefit of said Spencer and T. K.," and that plaintiff "well knew at the time he sold said note that said Spencer and T. K. had purchased said saw-mill, and in part payment thereof had undertaken and promised to pay said note." Reply to second defense, general denial. Demurrer to third defense. Spencer and T. K. were joined as co-defendants, and they also demurred to said third defense. The district court, at the December term, 1873, sustained said demurrers. Trial and judgment for plaintiff, and Cannon and wife bring the case here on error.

Thomas Ryan and J. P. Greer, for plaintiffs in error.

Martin & Case, for Conrad Kreipe, defendant in error.

W. P. Douthitt, for defendants G. W. Spencer and T. Kreipe.

*326 *Brewer, J. The question in this case arises on the ruling of the district court sustaining demurrers to the third defense in the answer of Cannon and wife, the plaintiffs in error. The petition was an ordinary petition on a note and mortgage, alleging the execution of the note and mortgage to C. & G. Cooper & Co., and an indorsement to plaintiff before maturity. The third defense in the answer alleged substantially that at the time of the execution of the note defendant N. B. Cannon executed a chattel mortgage on a portable saw-mill situate in the same county as the land as additional security therefor, the filing of the mortgage, and that the same was "still held and owned by C. & G. Cooper & Co." It also alleged that subsequently thereto Cannon sold and delivered said mill to George W. Spencer and Theodore Kreipe, who still have the possession thereof in the same county; that as part consideration therefor said purchasers agreed to pay this note; that thereafter said Spencer and Theodore Kreipe "made an arrangement with plaintiff to purchase the said note and foreclose the said mortgage for the benefit of the said Spencer and Kreipe;" that the plaintiff knew of the purchase of the mill by Spencer and Theodore Kreipe, and of their agreement to pay this note therefor. There was a prayer that said Spencer and Theodore Kreipe might be made parties, and brought into court, and that on decree the saw-mill be first sold to satisfy the note. To this defense plaintiff below, Conrad Kreipe, demurred. Spencer and Theodore Kreipe were made parties, and they also filed a demurrer to this third defense, in Cannon's answer. Both demurrers were sustained. Was there error in this?

The most that can be gathered from this defense is that it alleges the existence of two securities, or funds, for the payment of this debt, with an equity in favor of the exhaustion of the other before touching the land; secondly, that it alleges a contract, for a valid con-

*327 sideration, by Spencer and Theodore Kreipe to pay this debt; and possibly a third matter, that plaintiff was not the real party in interest. So far as this last matter is concerned, if it were fully and distinctly stated, the error in sustaining a demurrer to it would have been immaterial, for the second defense, which was unchallenged by demurrer, contained the same allegation, and it was a matter inquired into on the trial. So far as the allegation of a contract by Spencer and Theodore Kreipe to pay this debt is concerned, though it might disclose a contract for the benefit of plaintiff, and which he could enforce if he desired, yet it cast no obligation upon him to sue upon or pay any attention to it; nor did it release or affect the security of the mortgage on the land, or the primary liability of Cannon for the debt. There remains, therefore, only the first of the matters suggested. It is unquestionably true that equity will oft-times interfere to direct the order in which two funds or securities for the same indebtedness shall be exhausted; as, for instance, where a mortgagor, having mortgaged for the same debt several tracts, thereafter sells some of them without any stipulation as to the debt, equity will direct a sale in the inverse order of the alienation. So, where a portion of mortgaged premises is sold, and the purchaser, as part of the consideration, assumes the payment of the mortgage debt, equity may direct the sale of the portion purchased before that unsold is offered. Yet in these cases it is necessary that it clearly appear that the rights and interests of third parties will in no manner be trenching upon or prejudiced by such order. But the allegation here is that this chattel mortgage was still held and owned by C. & G. Cooper & Co., not that it was held and owned by plaintiff, or by Spencer and Theodore Kreipe, in whose interest and for whose benefit plaintiff was charged to be acting.

Now, while the indorsement of a note carries with it ordinarily all the sureties therefor, yet this is not necessarily so, and may be changed by stipulation. Noyes v. White, 9 Kan. *640. Thus, Cooper & Co. may have held other indebtedness for which both the real estate and the chattel mortgage were securities, and on the sale of *328 the note to *plaintiff may have given him the real estate as security therefor, and kept the chattel mortgage to secure the unsold indebtedness. Or, if they held but the one note, they may have, by express agreement, withheld the chattel mortgage from plaintiff. Whatever may have been the reason, the allegation is clear that Cooper & Co. still held and owned it, and equally clear that plaintiff had purchased for himself or Spencer and Theodore Kreipe the note and mortgage sued upon. And it does not appear that the order asked would not trench upon the rights of Cooper & Co., but, on the contrary, it does appear that whatever rights and interests they had, and by the allegations they had some, would be materially affected thereby,—in fact, might be entirely destroyed. Hence, it was not error to refuse to order the sale of the saw-mill first, and the demurrer was properly sustained. The judgment will be affirmed.

ROBERT H. WATSON and another v. JACOB R. VOORHEES and another.

January Term, 1875.

1. Homestead: Mortgage to Secure Prior Debt. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 4 of the homestead act (12 U. S. St. at Large, 393) "that no lands acquired under the provisions of this act shall, in any event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor," if the owner of a tract acquired under that act execute a mortgage thereon, to secure a debt existing prior to the issue of the patent, such mortgage is valid, and may be enforced by a foreclosure and sale of the land.<sup>1</sup>
2. Defense: Laches: Omitting to Plead Defense before Judgment. If a party with a perfect legal defense to a cause of action, of which he has full knowledge, omits, when sued upon such cause of action in a court in which the defense can be pleaded, to set it up, and suffers *829 judgment *thereon to be entered by default, he cannot thereafter, without showing some valid excuse for such omission, avail himself of said defense to vacate or modify the judgment, or restrain its collection.

Error from Marshall district court.

Watson and wife brought injunction against Voorhees, as sheriff, and the St. Louis & Peoria Plow Company, to restrain the sale of certain real estate under an order of sale issued to Voorhees upon a foreclosure judgment rendered in favor of the plow company against the plaintiffs. The district judge, on the eighteenth of May, 1874, refused to grant a temporary injunction, and from such order of refusal the plaintiffs appeal.

J. D. Brumbaugh, for plaintiffs in error.

J. A. Broughton, for defendants in error.

BREWER, J. This is a proceeding to review an order of the judge of the Twelfth district, refusing to grant a preliminary injunction. The facts, as they appear in the petition, are that Robert H. Watson and wife, on the twenty-second of September, 1872, executed a mortgage upon a certain tract of land to secure a certain note of even date given for the purchase of a wagon. The land mortgaged was acquired by Watson under the homestead act. The application therefor was made September 18, 1866, and the final receipt given September 19, 1872, three days before the execution of the note and mortgage. The patent, however, was not dated or issued until the twentieth of March, 1873, some months thereafter. The note was not paid at maturity. Suit was commenced, personal service had, default made, decree entered, and order of sale issued to the sheriff, who was proceeding to sell the land. Was there error in refusing to restrain the sale? Section 4 of the homestead act (12 U. S. St. at Large, 393) provides "that no lands acquired under the provisions of this act shall, in any event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or

and it is argued that this debt was contracted before the issue of the patent, and that, therefore, the land could not be subjected to its payment. On the other hand, it is insisted that congress has not the power to attach any such condition to the title; that when the title passes from the general government it becomes wholly subjected to the laws of the state, which control, not only the manner and conditions of voluntary transfer, and the casting of descent, but also the conditions of judicial sale and forced alienation. County of Miami v. Brackenridge, 12 Kan. *117; Miller v. Little, 47 Cal. 348. In this last case the power of congress was affirmed, though by a divided court.

We deem it unnecessary to examine this question, for, conceding the power, it does not seem to us that congress intended by this act to place any restriction on the owner's control of the land. The limitation was on the creditor, and not upon the debtor. While the land might not be taken from him against his will, for the satisfaction of past indebtedness, yet he was not prohibited from appropriating it, if he desired, therefor. He might convey it as freely as any other land, and for such consideration as satisfied him. His deed passed a good title, and he could not thereafter avoid that deed by showing that the only consideration therefor was past indebtedness. And if he could convey absolutely, so he could conditionally. He could use the land as security. He was in nowise limited or restricted in his power of disposing of the property. Now, in this case, the land is not taken in execution because of the debt simply, but because the owners voluntarily appropriated it to the payment of such debt. Having once appropriated it for that purpose, they may not thereafter deny such appropriation. The supreme court of Iowa have had this question before them, and reached the same result. Nycum v. McAllister, 33 Iowa, 374. The California case above cited was a case of simple debt, and without any mortgage or voluntary appropriation of the land.

Probably another and entirely sufficient reason might also *331 *be given for affirming the ruling of the district judge. The plaintiffs have had their day in court. They knew then of this defense as fully as they do now, yet they failed to set it up. No excuse is given—no reason shown—why they did not make their defense in the foreclosure suit. They probably had no defense to the note, but if their present claim in reference to the land, and its freedom from liability for this debt, is a good one, they could have set it up in that suit, and thereby prevented a decree of foreclosure. There is no reason why they should have two opportunities of interposing the same defense, especially when it is one so utterly void of equity. Elder v. Bank of Lawrence, 12 Kan. *242.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Error from Labette district court.

Higby, a grocer, doing business at the city of Chetopa, on the thirteenth of November, 1872, made assignment to D. J. Doolen of "all the lands, and all the personal property, of every name and nature whatsoever," belonging to said Higby. Said assignment was specified in the deed to be made "upon the following trust, viz.: To take possession of said lands and personal property, and sell the said lands and personal property upon such terms as in his judgment may appear best for all parties concerned; and hold the proceeds of all sales for distribution among all the creditors of the said party of the first part in accordance with such orders as may be given by all of the creditors, or the district court of the county of Labette; and shall, after final settlement and distribution be made, and all reasonable expenses, rents, taxes, assessments, commissions, and allowances are paid, return any surplus that may be of the proceeds of the sales of the assigned property to the party of the first part, or his assigns; and also reconvey and reassign to him or them any real or personal property remaining unsold."

Ayres and Martin, each claiming to be a judgment creditor of Higby, commenced an action against Higby and Doolen, "on behalf of themselves and all of the judgment creditors *of said Higby," to set aside said deed of assignment, claiming that it was executed to hinder, delay, and defraud Higby's creditors, and was therefore void. The petition prayed that a receiver might be appointed, and that defendants be enjoined from selling or disposing of any of the assigned property, etc. The action was tried at the July term, 1873, of the district court.

The record shows that "the judge of said district court being engaged in the trial of a cause, and there being no statutory provisions disqualifying him from presiding at the trial of this cause, the parties consented to the trial of the issues joined herein before H. G. W., as pro tem. judge." The case was tried before said judge pro tem., without a jury. The court found, as facts, that Ayres had recovered a judgment against Higby for $243.39, and costs; that Martin had recovered a judgment against Higby for $805.19, and costs; that said parties had issued writs of execution on said judgments before the thirteenth of November, 1872, and that said writs had been returned unsatisfied; that Higby, on said thirteenth of November, had assigned all his property, real and personal, to said Doolen by deed of assignment of that date; that Doolen had disposed of a large amount of the assigned property, "and now holds the net proceeds thereof, over and above all expenses, to the amount of $1,100 in ready money, and also holds other assigned and real and personal property to the amount of $500 or more;" that there was no actual and continued change of possession of the assigned property; that said deed of assignment is illegal, fraudulent, and void, etc.

Judgment was given in accordance with findings, and it was adjudged "that defendant Doolen holds the proceeds of such assigned property in trust for plaintiffs, as judgment creditors of said Higby, and that they have a lien in equity thereon for the satisfaction of their respective judgments, interest, and costs; and that the defendant Doolen, as such assignee as aforesaid, pay to plaintiff Alexander

H. Ayres the sum of $243.34, and interest thereon at 12 per cent. per annum from the date of the recovery of his judgment against said Higby; and that said Doolen, as such assignee, pay to plaintiff Gilbert Martin the sum of $805.19, and interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the date of the recovery of his judgment against said Higby," etc.

From this decree defendants Higby and Doolen appeal.

F. A. Bettis, for plaintiffs in error.

Consent cannot give jurisdiction. The court must be constituted and authorized by law. Dicks v. Hatch, 10 Iowa, 380. The judge cannot delegate his powers, even though the parties consent. Winchester v. Ayres, 4 G. Greene, 104; Petty v. Durall, Id. 120; State v. Cure, 7 Iowa, 481. The record shows affirmatively that the district judge de jure was present, and in no manner disqualified to sit in the case. The constitution only requires the legislature to make provision for the election of a pro tem. judge in cases where the judge de jure is absent, or otherwise unable or disqualified to sit in any case; and the legislature has provided that a judge pro tem. may be selected when the judge is sick, absent, or interested; and in any such case (and such case only) the parties may agree on a pro tem. judge.

Judgment should have been given for defendants on the pleadings. The answer alleges that Martin, with a full knowledge of the facts, assented to the act of assignment. This is undenied, and is a good defense. Eager v. Com., 4 Mass. 183; Sebor v. Armstrong, Id. 206; Bond v. Farnham, 5 Mass. 174. And the answer alleged that Ayres' judgment was against True as principal, and Higby as surety, and that True had ample property to satisfy the judgment within reach of the process of the court. This was neither denied nor avoided, and was a good defense. Civil Code, § 470. The evidence in this case indicates the whole transaction of bringing this suit to have been a champertous speculation, as vide the testimony of Fox, which we quote entire: "I am the partner of A. H. Ayres. Martin sold us the Higby note, and ordered us to collect it in his name, and we were by agreement to pay him fifty per cent. of what was realized."

*335 The deed of assignment was not void upon its face. It contains every element necessary to carry out the letter and spirit of the law, and not one word to indicate a fraudulent intent in the maker. Such an assignment is not per se void. Case v. Ingersoll, 7 Kan. *367. The deed from Higby to Doolen is without any of the objectionable features which were prominent in the assignment of Johnson to Case, and yet, with reference to the latter assignment, the supreme court held this language: "There was some evidence on the face of this instrument tending to show that it was executed for the purpose of defrauding Johnson's creditors, but probably not enough to prove said fact, or to render the instrument void for that reason." Johnson v. Laughlin, 7 Kan. *361.

The findings that there was no actual and continued change of possession, and that the assignment deed was fraudulent and void, are not sustained by the evidence.

Ayres & Fox, for defendants in error.

There does not seem to be any question as to the jurisdiction of the pro tem. judge, or the regularity of the judgment on his decision. The language of the statute is unequivocal, and there is no office for construction. "The parties in any case may select a judge to sit in such case." Gen. St. c. 28, § 5; Brainard v. Jones, 11 How. Pr. 569, 571. But if we should be mistaken in the meaning of the words "any case," still the person chosen was a judge de facto, and the judgment is free from error. In re Boyle, 9 Wis. 264; Beach v. Beckwith, 13 Wis. 21; Dinsmore v. Smith, 17 Wis. 20; Bacon v. Bickwell, Id. 524.

Plaintiffs in error "objected to the introduction of any testimony, and moved for judgment on the papers." Upon what grounds? None were assigned. True, the case recites, as matter of history, that no reply had been filed, but not that the objecting party called the attention of the court to the fact, or even then knew it. There was no determination of the court upon the lumped question whether the plaintiffs in error were entitled to a general judgment for lack of a reply. Had even that general question been raised, defendants in error might have obtained leave to reply, and it is now too *336 late to raise the question. Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. *179; Williams v. Hayes, 20 N. Y. 58; 2 Till. & S. Pr. 502.

The objection that no reply was filed suggests the question, was a reply necessary? Proofs were entered into by the parties before the court, which shows that it was the understanding of all parties that no reply was necessary; and plaintiffs cannot now take the ground that there were material allegations in the answer that were admitted. It is, moreover, the duty of this court to construe the objection to be grounded on the claim that a reply is necessary in all cases, because the allegation in the answer of assent by Martin to the assignment was proven to be unfounded, and was rightfully overthrown by the court below on the proofs. Williams v. Hayes, 20 N. Y. 58, 61.

But if it can be said that the lack of a reply was assigned as the ground of the motion, and that such ground was sufficiently specific, the ruling below was still proper, because the ground was too broad. It went to both defendants, while as to defendant Ayres, at least, the answer, on mere inspection, contains no new matter, well pleaded,—material,—but merely conclusions of law and of fact.

The finding that the assignment is illegal and void on its face as against the defendants is sound. The assignor did not declare and fix the uses to which the assignee should apply the fund, and no creditor could enforce any payment thereunder. By the clear effect of the assignment the assignee could keep the proceeds in perpetuity. The instrument did not devote the property to the payment of creditors "in proportion to their respective claims," but the assignment provides that any distribution may be made which all the creditors, or the district court, may choose to order, which may be neither fair nor equitable. Much less does it secure a pro rata distribution, the only one which is legal.

The assignment on its face must delay, hinder, and defraud the creditors; for the property was placed beyond their control until such time as all the creditors or the district court should order distribution and fix the sale. The lack of change of possession *337 of the property is evidence of such trust *reserved. Christy v. Scott, 14 How. 289; Adams v. Davidson, 10 N. Y. 309, 313. The finding of no actual change of possession, and bad faith, is not only sustained by clear evidence, but by the undisputed proof of the facts.

VALENTINE, J. The laws of Kansas provide for such an officer as a judge pro tem. of the district court. Const. art. 3, § 20; Gen. St. 304, §§ 4 to 8. And hence, whenever it appears from the record of a case that the action was tried before such a judge, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that such judge had the requisite authority to hear and determine the case. The district court of Kansas being a court of general and superior jurisdiction, all presumptions, in the absence of anything to the contrary, must not only be that the court acted within the scope of its jurisdiction, but that it acted regularly and legally. And a judge pro tem. of such a court being as much a judge of the court for the time being as the regular judge, all presumptions, in the absence of anything to the contrary, must be in favor of his authority, and in favor of the regularity and validity of his proceedings. Whenever his authority has been duly recognized, as in this case, by the regular judge, the clerk, the sheriff, the attorneys, the parties to the suit, and others, it would hardly seem proper to allow his authority to be questioned for the first time in this court. This case was tried before a judge pro tem. But whether such judge was duly elected and qualified does not appear. It does appear, however, that all the parties consented to try the case before him. It also appears that there were "no statutory provisions disqualifying the regular judge from presiding at the trial." From this we suppose that the regular judge was not sick, absent, interested, related to either of the parties, or otherwise disqualified from hearing and determining the case. But suppose the regular judge was present, and competent to hear and determine the case, still he did not do it, but allowed a judge pro tem. to do *338 so. The *district court was in session. No question is raised as to the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the action and the parties to the suit. The case came regularly on for trial. A judge pro tem. tried it. The constitution and laws recognize such an officer; and whether this judge pro tem. was regularly and legally filling the office or not, still he did fill the office, and was therefore an officer de facto, and his acts are therefore not void, but, like the acts and proceedings of all other officers de facto, are valid and binding. Of course, his proceedings could not be attacked collaterally. But attempt is now made to attack them directly by petition in error. This may be done where the question was raised in the court below, and proper exceptions taken. But, unfortunately for the plaintiffs in error, the question was not raised in the court below. Neither party objected to trying this case before said pro tem. judge, but all the parties consented thereto. The question of whether said pro tem. judge could legally try this case is now raised for the first time in this court, and we think the question is raised too late. See Hunter's Adm'r v. Ferguson's Adm'r, 13 Kan. *462, *473, and cases there cited.

This was an action to set aside a deed of assignment, made for the benefit of creditors, on the ground that the assignment was fraudulent and void. The plaintiffs had separate rights and interests, and not joint interests. The defendants answered that the plaintiff Martin, with a full knowledge of all the facts, acquiesced in, and became a party to, said assignment, and instructed and encouraged the assignee to proceed under the assignment, and sell the property, etc. There was no reply filed to this answer, and there was nothing in the case which tended to show that the defendants waived a reply. On the contrary, it seems that they twice objected to the introduction of evidence because of the condition of the pleadings; and they also asked for a judgment in their favor upon the papers in the case. It is true, the objection to the evidence went to both of the plaintiffs,

*339 while it could properly apply to only *one of them. But still it shows that the defendants did not intend to waive a reply. Where a reply is necessary, as it was in this case, and none has been filed, it must appear affirmatively from the conduct of the defendants that the reply has been waived, or the court must take all the allegations of new matter contained in the answer as true. Where the defendants go to trial, and proceed with the trial in all respects as though a reply had been filed, such conduct on their part will authorize the court and the other party to consider that the defendants have waived a reply. But that is not the case. The evidence in this case failed to show that Martin acquiesced in said assignment with a full knowledge of all the facts. But still as such was so alleged by the defendants, and not denied by the plaintiffs, we must take it that such was the fact.

The answer does not allege, as is claimed by the plaintiffs in error, that the Ayres judgment was rendered against True as principal, and Higby as surety. The answer merely alleges that the judgment was rendered upon a promissory note, on which note True was principal and Higby was surety. The answer does not state or show how the judgment was rendered, and there was no evidence upon the subject. With reference to such judgments, see Rose v. Madden, 1 Kan. *445; Points v. Jacobia, 12 Kan. *50. No question of champerty was raised in the court below. Such question is not in this case. It is immaterial whether the court below erred or not as to the amount of money which Doolen had received from the sale of Higby's property. We must reverse the judgment as to Martin, and there was certainly more than enough to pay Ayres.

We hardly think that the deed of assignment was void upon its face; but, as we view the case, it is not necessary to decide that question now, and we therefore do not wish to be understood as deciding it. It is also claimed that the assignment was fraudulent in fact, and therefore void in law. It is claimed that the assignment was made *340 for the purpose of hindering, delaying, *and defrauding Higby's creditors, and especially the plaintiffs, who were judgment creditors of Higby. The court below finds this to be true. And while it is at least doubtful whether this finding is correct, yet there was some evidence to sustain the finding, and enough, under the rules of practice to which this court has always adhered, to uphold the judgment rendered thereon. If the court below erred, as perhaps it did, in making this finding, the error was one of fact, and not one of law. And as this court cannot retry the case upon the facts, but can only decide such questions of law as may be involved in the case, we cannot reverse the decision of the court below merely because it erred in its findings of facts, provided, of course, that there was sufficient evidence introduced from which, if such evidence were uncontradicted and unexplained, a court might reasonably infer what is contained in its findings. If there had been no evidence to sustain the findings, or any one of the findings, then we might reverse the judgment of the court below for that reason; for then the question would be purely one of law.

Some of the evidence which tends to show that said assignment was in fact fraudulent is as follows: (1) Under the provisions of the deed of assignment the proceeds of the sale of the property assigned could be distributed among the creditors only, by and in accordance with the orders of all the creditors or the district court. This might cause delay and injustice. The assignee should allow all just and legal claims, and pay as much as he could on them, without waiting for the orders of all the creditors or the district court. See Gen. St. c. 6, §§ 21, 24, 35. One creditor has no right to determine how much is due to another creditor, or when it should be paid. (2) It would seem, from another provision of the deed of assignment, that the assignor contemplated that there would be a surplus of his estate left after paying all his debts, and there was no evidence introduced that would tend to show otherwise. Now, it is generally fraudulent for a person who can pay all his debts to make an assignment.

*341 Seibert v. Thompson, 8 Kan. *69; Burrill, *Assignm. 190. All assignments in trust for creditors tend to hinder and delay such creditors, and cannot, as a rule, be sustained unless the assignor is insolvent. (3) The assignor in this case was a grocer, and the business was carried on in the same place and in the same manner after the assignment that it was before. The assignor continued to reside in a part of the same house where the grocery was kept. He was sometimes in the grocery and behind the counter, and also sold goods. The same clerks remained in the store, one of whom seems to have been a sister of the assignor. The signs remained the same. The assignor's name still remained on all the boxes, casks, etc., and the name "E. Higby, Grocer," still remained on the delivery wagon. There was really no apparent change in the business. There was some evidence about two different inventories of the property which we do not precisely understand, but it is claimed by the defendants in error that such evidence indicated fraud.

There are some questions in this case which counsel have not chosen to raise, and therefore we have purposely avoided saying anything about them. We, however, desire that it be distinctly understood that we have decided no questions in this case except such as are mentioned in this opinion.

The judgment of the court below will be affirmed as to the defendant in error Alexander H. Ayres; and it will be reversed as to the other defendant in error, Gilbert Martin. The cause will be remanded for further proceedings as between the plaintiff in error and Gilbert Martin.

*JOHN BRANDON v. MARY ANN BRANDON.

January Term, 1875.

1. Homestead: Divorce. Upon granting a divorce, whether on account of the fault of the wife or the husband, the court has power to award to her the possession of the homestead.<sup>1</sup>
2. Divorce: Party in Fault: Custody of Children. When the record shows that a divorce was granted on account of the habitual drunkenness of the wife, this court cannot hold that it was error to give to her the care and custody of two infant children, in the absence of any showing that the husband was a suitable person to have such care and custody.<sup>2</sup>

Error from Leavenworth district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

F. P. Fitzwilliam, for plaintiff.

The court could not lawfully decree possession of the homestead to defendant during her natural life, and require plaintiff to vacate it. The marriage was dissolved, and all rights and obligations dependent on the existence of the marriage relation became extinguished. The parties are no longer husband and wife, but are permitted to marry at pleasure. The husband is released from all obligation to maintain the wife. Any inchoate right that she might otherwise possess is at end upon the dissolution of the marriage. In this case the legal title was in plaintiff, and was procured by his own means. Defendant had an interest in it, by operation of law, and which could not be defeated without her consent during the existence of the marriage relation; but as soon as a decree for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for the fault of the wife, was made, it annulled any right she had in the homestead. He still remained the head of the family, (having two *adopted children and his aged mother with him,) occupying the homestead at the time of the dissolution of the marriage. Hence the court could not defeat the right of plaintiff to occupy the premises, nor could it create for plaintiff a different estate from that he had under the marriage relations, or limit the right of occupancy. Defendant's right to occupy the homestead was subordinate to his right. On the dissolution of the matrimonial union, defendant became civiliter mortuus. Were this not the case, then plaintiff could not dispose of the premises without the consent of defendant, although he should deem it for the best interest of himself and family to change his domicile. Were defendant to marry again, would not she and her second husband enjoy the occupancy of this homestead, under decree of the court, while plaintiff is driven by a new process of ejectment from the home the constitution of the state guaranties shall be exempt from forced sale on any process of law, and shall not be alienated without his consent? In case of plaintiff's death, what estate would his children inherit? In case of a second marriage of plaintiff, and of his death, what estate would his widow take? In case a judgment should be recovered against him, could this property be sold to satisfy the judgment? or, in the event he procured another home while the defendant was in occupancy of these premises, could the latter be sold under execution? Article 15, § 9, Const.; Blue v. Blue, 38 Ill. 10; Redfern v. Redfern, Id. 509; Moore v. Titman, 33 Ill. 368.

The statute declares that on the court granting a divorce for the fault of defendant it shall be a bar to any claim of such party in or to the property of the plaintiff. Civil Code, § 647. The statute governs the rights of the parties, if not in conflict with any constitutional provision, (Crouse v. Holman, 19 Ind. 37;) for the court possesses no powers, in actions for divorce, except such as are conferred by statute, (Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 367.)

If the court possessed a "discretion" in the matter, was it the exercise of that "sound discretion," assured through an enlightened jurisprudence and advancing civilization, to give a life-estate to defendant in the homestead of plaintiff; to give the care, nurture, and *344 education of the children to her; *to require plaintiff to pay to her $25 per month for her support, together with a requirement to surrender all the household property,—after adjudging that defendant was an habitual drunkard? It is not often that a court is called on to review a decree like this one. It is not often that a court will assume to bestow the care and education of two infants to a drunken wife or mother,—children whose little lives are as "chaste and pure as the unsunned snow," but who must, in a few short years, have their sunny childhood overshadowed by the withering influence of an inebriate mother. It is not often that the hopes and ambition of young manhood are forever darkened by the "demon cup" in the hands of one that was to be a wife to him, and a mother to his offspring. It is not often that the court is willing to say to the unoffending plaintiff, you are freed from the "accursed thing," but weary days of toil shall be your lot, to furnish the means to support defendant in debauchery.

BREWER, J. The facts in this case are as follows: The court below granted to plaintiff a divorce on account of the fault of defendant, on the charge of habitual drunkenness, but awarded the defendant the care, custody, nurture, and education of the two minor children of the said plaintiff and defendant; one, as appears by the allegations of the petition, three and a half years old, and the other only one year old. The court further decreed that the defendant should have and retain the possession of the homestead of the plaintiff during her natural life, and that plaintiff should forthwith deliver possession of said premises to said defendant. The court further adjudged that plaintiff should pay as further alimony $25 per month; and that there should be allowed, assigned, and set off to the defendant, to her own sole and separate property, all the clothing of herself and said two minor children, and all the household and kitchen furniture in said house, excepting two medium-sized bedsteads, and the bedding thereof, to be retained by the plaintiff; and then adjudged that the defendant have and recover of and from plaintiff the costs, taxed at $204.97.

Upon this record two questions are presented. It is insisted, in the first place, that "the court could not lawfully decree possession of the homestead to defendant during her natural life, and require plaintiff to vacate it." It appears that the title to the homestead was in plaintiff; and the argument is that the defendant's interest in the homestead arises from her relation as wife to plaintiff; that when that relationship ceased, as it did by the decree of divorce, her right and interest therein ceased, and the property remained as the absolute property of the husband; that it was his homestead, he remaining the head of a family; and that, being his homestead, he could not, under the constitutional provisions, be in this way forced to surrender it to any one. The argument is ingenious, and forcibly put by counsel in his brief; but we are constrained to say is not sound. The divorce, and the adjustment of property interests, are not to be regarded as transpiring at different times, but as contemporaneous. The homestead of the plaintiff is not given to a stranger, destitute of all interest and right therein, but the homestead of the husband and wife (for it is equally the homestead of each) is, upon their separation, assigned to one of them. There would be manifest impropriety in attempting to continue it as the homestead of each after the divorce; and in awarding it to the wife the court is but choosing between conflicting interests. The fact that the title to the homestead property is in the husband does not give to him any greater interest in it as a homestead. His deed of it conveys no more than hers. He can no more incumber or alienate it by a direct proceeding than she. Perhaps, by contracting for improvements thereon, he may have more power than she to make it liable to judicial sale, though thus only indirectly does he affect it. That he has even this power greater than she, we do not now positively decide, leaving the question to be examined and decided whenever it is fairly before us. But whatever he may do, directly or indirectly, affecting the title

*346 in so far as it is a homestead it is the homestead of each and upon a divorce the court has power to assign it to either. The statute expressly gives to the court the power, in case of a di orce, whether granted for the fault of the wife or the husband, to give to her such share of her husband's real or personal estate as shall be just and reasonable. Laws 1870, p. 180, § 27. The assignment of the homestead to the wife is within the terms of this power. And if it be said that the protection of the constitution is placed around a homestead, it may also be said that the power to grant divorces is also by the constitution expressly given to the district courts. Const. art. 2, § 18. And the constitutional grant of power to divorce is broad enough to include the power to determine the subordinate and dependent questions of the family property, and the care and custody of the children. In this case we have only the question of power to determine; for, as the testimony is not before us, we are unable to form any opinion as to the propriety of the assignment of the homestead to the wife.

As a second question in this case, it is asserted that it was error to award the custody of the children to one found to be an habitual drunkard. Here also we labor under the disadvantage of having none of the testimony bearing on this question before us. We cannot say that the court erred, because we do not know what facts were before it. The character of the husband, the associations by which he was surrounded, his constant absence from home, may all have been so shown in evidence as to make it apparent that it was unwise to give him the custody, and it may have been awarded to her as the least of two evils. We do not mean to say that any such testimony was introduced, for the record is silent thereon; but we do hold that unless it affirmatively appears in the record that there was none such, or similar, we cannot say that it was error to award the custody to the mother, rather than the father. The children were of tender years, and needed a mother's care, and if she was at all suitable she ought to have the care of them during their infancy. The court *347 reserved in the order, as it had the right to do, the *power to change the custody; and if, after the children pass that age which especially demands a mother's care, her habits of drunkenness should continue, and the father appear to be a proper person to have the charge of them, we cannot doubt that the court will modify its order, and give him the custody.

So far as the amount of alimony is concerned, we suppose it was intended for the benefit of the children rather than of the wife. The law does not intend that a woman unfit to remain the wife shall be supported in idleness by the toil of the husband. We, however, are not prepared to say that it was exorbitant, when the custody and care of the children are taken into the account.

The judgment will be affirmed.

LUCY J. WEAVER v. WILLIAM GARDNER.

January Term, 1875.

1. Default: Judgment on: Indorsement on Summons: Foreclosure
In an action on a note and mortgage in which the summons is indorsed with the amount due on the note, and for which a personal judgment is asked, but without any statement of a claim for other relief, and such summons is personally served, it is not error to enter on default a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises, as well as a judgment for the sum indorsed on the summons. Following George v. Hatton, 2 Kan. *333.
2. Stare Decisis. A mere matter of practice once settled by the decision of the supreme court, and unchallenged for years, ought not to be disturbed except in case of glaring and dangerous error.

Error from Greenwood district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

- *348 **Almerin Gillett*, for plaintiff in error.
G. H. Lillie, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. Defendant in error brought his action in the district court of Greenwood county against Barrett Weaver and Lucy J. Weaver. He set up in his petition two notes signed by Barrett Weaver, and alleged the execution of a mortgage on certain real estate by both the defendants to secure them. A summons was issued and duly served upon both the defendants. Neither of them made any appearance, and a judgment was taken against both for the amount of the notes, and a decree entered against both for the foreclosure of the mortgage. An order of sale was issued, the property sold, and purchased by the plaintiff. Lucy J. Weaver then appeared and filed her motion to set aside the judgment, decree, and sale. The personal judgment against her was set aside, but the motion otherwise was overruled. The grounds of the motion were as follows: The single summons which was issued was indorsed "Sum brought for the recovery of money. Amount claimed, $1,312.83 with interest from the twenty-sixth of May, 1873, at the rate of 1 per cent. per annum. G. W. LILLIE, Attorney for Plaintiff." This it is claimed, was notice to the defendants that only a personal judgment was sought, and that it was error to take anything more. This is not an open question in this court. As long ago as the case of George v. Hatton, 2 Kan. *333, it was decided that in an action like this no indorsement was required on the summons, it not being an action for the recovery of money only, but that if an amount was indorsed, it was not error to take judgment for that amount together with a decree for the sale of the land. Counsel contends that the decision in that case properly rests on the other grounds, and that the comments of Chief Justice CROZIER upon this question are mere obiter dicta. We do not so understand it. It was made one of the points announced in the syllabus, and the decision may as *349 fairly be said to rest upon this as upon any other ground.

We are aware of contrary rulings in Ohio. Williams v. Hamlin, 1 Handy, 95; 1 Nash, Pl. & Pr. (4th Ed.) 67. And if this was an open question we might be disposed to give considerable weight to these authorities. But being merely a question of practice, and having been once settled in this state, we deem it better to adhere to that ruling. Doubtless it has been accepted by the profession during the last ten years as the correct interpretation of the statute, and many rights founded upon it. Stare decisis is eminently appropriate in such cases. It may be remarked that there is no showing here of any actual prejudice, no allegation that plaintiff in error did not in fact sign such mortgage, or that no decree of foreclosure thereon ought in equity to have been made.

The order of the district court will be affirmed.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. v. E. G. DAVIDSON.

January Term, 1875.

Firing Woods and Prairies: Unavoidable Casualty. Gen. St. 1122, c. 118, § 2, does not authorize a recovery against a railroad corporation for a prairie fire caused by a locomotive running on the track of the company, where there is no want of care and skill in the construction of the locomotive, or in operating it.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Labette district court.

Davidson sued the railway company to recover damages for injuries sustained, alleging that "defendant, in October, 1872, did set fire to and burn up and destroy seven acres of young timber, the property of the plaintiff." The action was commenced before
 *350 a justice of the peace, was taken to the district court by appeal, where it was tried at the March term, 1874. Verdict and judgment in favor of Davidson for $40, and costs.

T. C. Sears and David Kelso, for plaintiff in error, submitted that there was neither allegation nor proof that the railway company was guilty of any negligence; that section 2 of the act against firing woods, prairies, and marshes (Gen. St. 1122) does not authorize a recovery where there is neither wrongful act nor neglect of any duty. If the fire was set by the railway company, it was unavoidable accident, and no liability therefor exists.

Davis & Tulbott, for defendant in error, urged that the action was commenced under section 2, c. 118, Gen. St. Under that statute it is sufficient for the plaintiff below to prove that his damage resulted directly from a fire set by defendant to "woods, marshes, or prairies," or set to either of them. Plaintiff below had the right to seek his remedy under the statute without regard to the common law. It was held in Emerson v. Gardiner, 8 Kan. *455, that a party was liable for damages resulting from fire set to his weeds and rubbish on his own lands, without regard to negligence. A railroad corporation cannot claim greater rights or greater exemption from liability than individuals. "Unavoidable accident" cuts no figure in the question at issue, for the reason that the statute is absolute, and makes the defendant liable without regard to how the fire was set out by defendant below, whether by sparks from the locomotive, or by fire dropped from the ash-pan of the locomotive, or thrown out by the engineer or some other employe of defendant below.

KINGMAN, C. J. The defendant in error brought his action against the plaintiff in error for damages caused by setting fire to and burning and destroying several acres of young timber, the property *351 of the defendant in error, and obtained *a verdict. There was no allegation of negligence or carelessness on the part of the corporation or its agents; neither is there any testimony tending to show negligence. The testimony is that there was no fire before the train arrived at a certain place, but just after it passed the fire was observed in the prairie-grass near the track, and it spread till it reached the land of Davidson, and burned his young timber. In the entire absence of allegation or proof of negligence there could be no recovery at common law. Kansas Pac. Ry. v. Butts, 7 Kan. *308. This seems to be conceded by the counsel for defendant in error, who relies on section 2, c. 118, Gen. St. 1122, as authorizing a recovery in this case. Does this statute, by its terms, cover the case presented? The company was in the performance of its duty; pursuing its lawful avocation; using its property, so far as is shown, with care and prudence; and, for aught that appears, either in allegation or proof, its engine was of the most approved construction, furnished with all the appliances and safeguards possible to be used to prevent the escape of sparks and cinders. The fire, then, must be considered as the result of unavoidable accident. If the corporation is liable, it is an insurer of other people's property not under its control. It must use its road. That is what it was created for. It has an absolute right to use it, as it is its own property; and in such use it cannot be responsible for the injury unless made so by statute, and we do think it is made so by the statute referred to.

The object of the law was to prevent those prairie fires so disastrous in this state, and make those who set the prairies on fire, whether on his own land or that of another, responsible for all damages done thereby, and such are the terms of the act. The first section punishes criminally a person who shall wantonly and willfully set on fire the woods, prairies, etc. This section contemplates some direct act, done wantonly and willfully. The second section uses the same terms, except that the words "wantonly and willfully" are omitted; but the direct act is as much to be done in the second as in the first. It must be a direct "setting on fire," not the result of accident *352 that can not be avoided. If a tornado were to destroy a man's house, and the fire he had safely kindled in his stove should be scattered so as to fire the prairies, the unfortunate owner of the house could not be held as having set the prairies on fire. Yet he kindled the fire that finally did the injury. So in this case. The corporation kindled the fire in the furnace, and, as far as the pleadings and the evidence shows, it escaped by unavoidable accident that no care or skill could have prevented. We are clear that the statute does not cover such a case, either in its terms or in the objects sought to be accomplished by it.

The judgment must be reversed, and the case sent back for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

LEONARD SMITH v. CHARLES BURKHALTER.

January Term, 1875.

Appeal from Justice of the Peace: Amount in Controversy. Where the only question is one of fact, whether the defendant in an action before a justice of the peace filed a bill of particulars claiming over twenty dollars, and upon that question the district court finds for the defendant, and dismisses the plaintiff's appeal, this court, unless in case of manifest error, will affirm such order of dismissal.

Error from Doniphan district court.

Smith sued Burkhalter before a justice of the peace. Trial before a jury, and verdict and judgment for defendant. Smith appealed, and the district court, at the March term, 1874, on motion of Burkhalter, dismissed the appeal on the ground that there had been a jury trial, and that neither party claimed "in his bill of particulars a sum exceeding twenty dollars."

*353 **Price & Seaver*, for plaintiff in error.
W. D. Webb, for defendant in error.

BREWSTER, J. We are asked in this case to reverse the finding of the district court upon a question of fact. That question arose in this way: Plaintiff sued defendant before a justice. His bill of particulars filed, claimed twenty dollars. The case was tried by a jury, who brought in a verdict for defendant for one dollar. Plaintiff appealed to the district court, and there, upon motion of defendant, the appeal was dismissed upon the ground that it was an action tried by a jury in which neither party claimed in his bill of particulars more than twenty dollars. Plaintiff before the dismissal had moved for an order on the justice to correct his record by showing the filing of a bill of particulars by defendant. The motions were heard together, and the question was whether defendant did in fact file a bill of particulars. Several affidavits were read upon both sides. The district court found for the defendant, and, we think, correctly. Certain facts are undisputed, or proved beyond question: The docket of the justice shows the filing of plaintiff's bill, but does not show the filing of any bill for defendant. The justice is required to note thereon the filing of the bill of either party. Gen. St. 815, § 188. No bill of defendant was demanded before the trial. No bill or memorandum was presented or used by defendant until after the plaintiff had finished his case. No bill was actually marked "Filed" by the justice. During the examination by defendant's counsel of his witness a paper containing a statement of the matters claimed by defendant was produced and used by him. It was left on the table after the termination of the trial, was placed among the papers by the justice, and transmitted with them to the district court, where it was filed by the clerk as "Defendant's Bill of Particulars;" but afterwards returned to counsel as having been so left, transmitted, and filed by mistake. These matters are disputed, and doubtful: Plaintiff claimed that after he had rested defendant offered his bill, and that plaintiff objected to its being filed as out of time, but that the justice overruled the objection, and ordered it filed. Defendant insisted that he did not offer to file it; that the objection made was to the introduction of testimony because no bill had been filed; and that this objection was overruled, the justice holding that the defendant was not bound to file any bill unless the same had been required by plaintiff under section 71 of the justice's act. Upon this point we think the preponderance of testimony was with the defendant, and that no application was in fact made to file the bill. Defendant insists that this statement was a mere private memorandum to assist counsel in trying the case; that it was not filed, was not offered, and was not intended for filing. While the matter is not perfectly clear, we are inclined to think that the testimony sustains this claim. Referring to the matter in dispute, and it appears that plaintiff's claim was $10 for rent of house and $10 for damage to stable. It would seem that defendant's claim was that no damage had been done to stable; that a balance of rent of $20, including the $10 in plaintiff's bill, had been paid, by agreement, in building an outside cellar or root-house; and that defendant was entitled to recover of plaintiff $7 or $8 for the cost of building this cellar, over and above the amount due for rent. It would seem, also, though this is a matter not made clear by the testimony, that there was no dispute between the parties, but that $10 of rent had been paid by the building of this cellar; and that the only matters in dispute were whether any damage had been done to the stable, and whether the $17 or $18 alleged cost of the cellar (over and above the rent conceded to have been paid) was applicable, so far as was necessary, to the rent not admitted to have been paid, and gave to defendant a claim against plaintiff for the excess. It is probably, however, unnecessary to determine the exact nature and extent of the controversy between the parties. Upon the whole case, we think there is not enough to justify us in reversing the order of the district court, and the same will be affirmed.

W. J. BAWDEN v. W. C. STEWART.

January Term, 1875.

District Judge: Vacancy in Office: Removal from State. The removal of a district judge from the state, with an intention never to return here to reside, of itself creates a vacancy in the office; and where such vacancy exists more than thirty days before a general election, the vacancy is rightfully filled by an election. Section 11, art. 3, Const.

Original proceedings in quo warranto.

In December, 1874, Bawden filed in this court his petition in quo warranto, as follows: "Now comes W. J. Bawden, plaintiff, and informs the court, and avers, that at the general election held in and for the Sixth judicial district, in November, 1871, one M. V. Voss was duly elected judge of the said Sixth judicial district for the term of four years from the second Monday of January, 1872; that said M. V. Voss duly qualified as such judge of said district, and entered upon the duties of said office, and held said office of district judge from thence until the twenty-first day of October, 1874, when he died; that to fill the vacancy in said office occasioned by reason of the death of said M. V. Voss, the governor of the state of Kansas, on the seventh of November, 1874, duly appointed and commissioned this plaintiff as judge of said Sixth judicial district, and on the ninth of said November the plaintiff, being so as aforesaid duly appointed and commissioned, took the oath of office as district judge of said Sixth judicial district, and thereupon entered upon the duties of his office, and thenceforth acted as such district judge until the fourteenth of December, 1874, when the defendant, W. C. Stewart, without any warrant or authority of law, usurped and intruded himself into said office of *district judge of said Sixth judicial district, and wholly excluded plaintiff therefrom; that said W. C. Stewart, defendant herein, still excluding the plaintiff from his said office, and from the right and power to possess, use, and enjoy the same, doth still usurp and intrude into, and unlawfully hold and exercise, the same, to-wit, at the county of Bourbon, in the Sixth judicial district aforesaid, in contempt of the laws of the state of Kansas, and to the great damage of the plaintiff, to-wit, to his damage three thousand dollars. "Wherefore the plaintiff demands the judgment of this court, that the said defendant has usurped and unlawfully intruded into said office of district judge of said Sixth judicial district, and hath unlawfully held and possessed the same from and since his usurpation thereof on said fourteenth of December, 1874; and that he be absolutely ousted and excluded from the said office, its powers, privileges, and franchises, for the future; and that the plaintiff have and recover possession of his said office; and that he be restored to its powers, duties, privileges, and franchises; and that he have and recover of and from said defendant his said damages so as aforesaid sustained, together with the costs of this action."

To this petition defendant, Stewart, filed an answer as follows: "Now comes the defendant, and for answer to the petition of said plaintiff denies each and every allegation therein contained. (2) For further answer to the petition of said plaintiff said defendant alleges and avers that for more than thirty days prior to the last general election, on November 8, 1874, there was a vacancy in the office of judge of said Sixth judicial district; that said defendant, at said election, by the electors of said district, was duly elected to fill said vacancy, and on the twenty-eighth day of November, 1874, received from the state board of canvassers of said state his certificate of election therefor, and on the twelfth day of December, 1874, and before the fourteenth day of said month, duly qualified for said office, and entered upon his duties as such judge, and has ever since said time held and discharged the duties of said office, and does now; and said defendant avers that any pretended appointment or commission which the plaintiff may have as judge of said district was and is without authority of law."

Reply, a general denial, was filed to said second defense. The *357 action was tried at the January term, 1875, of this court. *Most of the testimony was in depositions. It was admitted that Judge Voss had been duly elected, and had duly qualified, for the term of four years, commencing on the second Monday of January, 1872; that shortly after the commencement of his term he became ill, and was unable to hold his courts<sup>1</sup>; that courts had been held usually, for two years or more before his death, by pro tem. judges; that he had made several trips to other states, with a view to restore his health, and that he left Fort Scott, the place of his then residence, in May, 1874, for California, where he died October 21, 1874. It was also admitted that Bawden had been commissioned by the governor, and had qualified, and had entered upon the duties of his office; and that an election had been held, as alleged in Stewart's answer; and that Stewart had been duly elected, as claimed, if there was such vacancy as could then be filled by election; and that he had duly qualified, and had taken possession of the office. On the part of plaintiff, Bawden, it was claimed that no election was proper, as there were not thirty days between the date of Judge Voss' decease and the day of the general election; and that Judge Voss at the time of his death was only temporarily absent from the state, and proofs were taken to establish this theory.

A transcript from the records of the probate court of Bourbon county, "In the Matter of the Estate of M. V. Voss, Deceased," was produced, in which appears the affidavit of John T. Voss, brother of Judge Voss. This affidavit was made November 4, 1874, and reads as follows:

"The affidavit of John T. Voss respectfully sheweth that Martin V. Voss, late of the town of Fort Scott, county of Bourbon, and state of Kansas, departed this life while temporarily absent from his residence in this county, at San Francisco, in the state of California, on *358 the twenty-first of *October, 1874, having, as your affiant is informed and believes, duly made and published his last will and testament, in which your petitioner is named as executor, and which he now offers for probate as the law directs; that the said will relates to both real and personal estate; that the said Martin V. Voss was at the time of his death an inhabitant of the said county of Bourbon and state of Kansas," etc.

Andrew Voss, the father of Judge Voss, testified as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, as follows: "I reside in Fort Scott. Have lived there seven years. Judge M. V. Voss, late judge of this judicial district, was my son. During my residence in Fort Scott I have resided with my son ~~M. V.~~ Voss. The house in which we lived belonged to

When Judge Voss was elected, the Sixth district comprised Bourbon and Linn counties. Judge Voss resided in Bourbon. Owing to his illness, and consequent inability to hold courts, Linn county, after doing without courts for a year or more, was detached from the district. In Bourbon county, two terms in 1872, four terms in 1873, and two terms in 1874 were held by pro tem. judges. In August, 1874, a majority of the bar concluded to treat the office of district judge as vacant; so at the time fixed for holding the September term such majority elected a pro tem. judge, who at once continued the whole docket until the December term, and adjourned sine die.

M. V. Voss. Judge Voss' health began to fail about three years ago, and since that time his health has been gradually failing, more or less. About the first of the year 1874 his health began to show signs of failure much faster than before. During the year 1873 he took a notion to travel to find that health which he could not find here. His doctors had told him that it was necessary for him to have a change of climate. This country did not agree with him. He was advised here to go to Colorado, and he went to Denver near the close of the year 1872. He went from Denver to the mountains, to Colorado Springs. He returned home, and he then went to northern New York in the spring of 1873. After remaining in New York several months he came home, having found no relief. He then went to the Hot Springs, in Arkansas. He returned home again. After some deliberation, he concluded to go to Santa Barbara, California. He and four or five others started for Santa Barbara on the twelfth day of May last, 1874. That was the last trip he made. We had several conversations on the subject of where he was going before he left. He told me this: that he couldn't get the health here that he desired; that he wished to have health so that he could go on and do business; that that was denied him here,—the climate forbid it. * * * He said he would not stay in this climate; that he would leave it this time for good; that he never expected to live in Fort Scott again. He said this: 'I may come back and pay you a visit in November, but not to exceed four days, at any rate.' * * * I think one very strong idea that prompted him to come back here was his salary. I think he would like to have retained his salary.

This conversation was about one week before he left. *I received letters from Judge Voss at different periods, and from different places,—from Fort Steele, from Sacramento, and from Santa Barbara,—up as late as August, that he would be home in November. He said, in a kind of round-about way, that he might hold court; that he might stay four days. He said he didn't know whether he would be able to hold the court on account of bodily infirmities. He observed that he never intended to put his foot in Fort Scott again, if he could avoid it, because his health and strength would not permit him to continue here. He said that nothing could induce him to make a permanent residence in Fort Scott, but he might return in November and spend three or four days. He said he would like to have his salary continue, and would like to hold court, but he was not able to do it. Judge Voss died at San Francisco, California, on the twenty-first day of October, 1874. He was on his way home to Fort Scott. He wanted to come home to die. His object was to come home to die."

Several other witnesses for plaintiff were called, who testified to conversations with Judge Voss shortly before he left in May, 1874, and that Judge V. in such conversations spoke of his going to California as a trip for his health only, and talked of coming back in the fall in time to hold the December term of court. One witness, C. H. M., produced a letter written by Judge V. to the witness, dated "SANTA BARBARA, September 15, 1874," in which Judge V. said "I would like to write up California to you, but as I will be at home in November, by the 20th, when I can tell you so much better, I will omit it. * * * When I left home last spring I told my friends I did not expect to make Fort Scott a permanent residence; that I was going to look up a climate where I could live; that in November I would return, and then sell my property and home, and remove. I have not yet found anything to suit me. * * * I shall determine sometime this fall, after I return home, what I shall do." Another witness, B. J. W., produced a letter from Judge V. to witness, dated September 17, 1874, in which Judge V. says: "I shall go to the north part of the state, [California,] and travel there some, and arrive at home in November, and then we will see who

On the part of defendant, Stewart, it was claimed that Judge Voss had left the state permanently, and had abandoned his office. Several witnesses testified to different conversations with Judge Voss shortly before he left home, in which Judge V. stated that he was going away, and "not coming back;" that he would "never be seen back here again," etc. The principal witness for defendant was John T. Voss, who testified as follows:

"I am a brother of the late Judge Voss. I reside at Girard, Kansas. I am forty-four years old. The first I knew of Judge Voss' sickness was in the winter of 1871-72. When he was here in Fort Scott I was frequently with him, from the time of his sickness until he left Fort Scott. He was for a portion of the time in New York and in Colorado. During this time I was not with him. He made two trips out on the plains, and I did not see him while he was gone out on these trips. He was accustomed to consult with me in relation to his private and official business during the period of which I have spoken. I had frequent conversations with him on the subject of his health during his sickness, from 1871 up to August 20th last, [1874,] at which last-mentioned date I left him at Santa Barbara, California. I know that he left the state of Kansas for the west sometime in May, 1874,—between the tenth and fifteenth of May, is my recollection. I had conversations with him shortly before his departure on that trip. In those conversations he spoke with reference to his residing in this state in the then future. He said that he was satisfied that the climate of Kansas would kill him, if he remained in it, and he was not going to lie down here and die; but that he would take a trip overland with a team,—himself and others,—and would go to Santa Barbara or Los Angeles, and there, from what he had learned and studied of the climate, he would recover his health entirely. Then he would select him some location on the Pacific coast. Then, when he found some place where he could have his health, he would like to have me come, and go into partnership with him in the practice of the law. He said he didn't want anything said about it; that he was dependent on his salary as judge for his *861 support during his *sickness. He said he was poor, and if it was known that he had left the state with the intention of staying away that he would lose his salary; and that he desired me to see the members of the Fort Scott bar, and ascertain who they would like to hold the court as pro tem. judge, and, when I ascertained that fact, to make an effort to procure that party to hold the court as pro tem. judge. He said he very much regretted the situation of things, but his condition of health, as well as his financial condition, seemed to demand that course, and if he had means he would resign before he left.

"This conversation took place shortly before he left for California, —from one month to six weeks before,—and up to within one week before he started. I was not here the day he left Fort Scott. I didn't see him for about one week before he left here. I was absent in Franklin county. In the conversations I had with him shortly before he left he said he was going to California to look out a situation; that he didn't intend to live here any more; that he wanted me to sell his property, but not advertise it. He said he didn't want it publicly known that he designed leaving the state permanently. That was one reason he gave why he didn't want the property advertised. He said he wanted money from the sale of his property, as his health might linger along bad for years, and that was the only resource he had to get money, if his salary failed him. He said he was telling the people of Fort Scott generally that he would return in the fall, when inquiry or conversation was had on that subject, but that he didn't intend to come back; that he might die if he went, but he was satisfied he would if he remained here; that the reason he didn't want it known was that his salary was his only available means of support, and he said it was a question of life and death with him, both financially and physically, and that if he could get through so as to obtain his November salary, he hoped by that time to be able to make a living by his own labors.

"I saw Judge Voss on the twenty-seventh of July, and was with him up to the twenty-third of August, when I left him at Santa Barbara. I was with him constantly during all this time. I had correspondence with him from that time up to the fifteenth of October. The last letter I had from him is here, and is as follows:

"SANTA BARBARA, October 15, 1874.

"John T. Voss: I have this day drawn for $100 on Merchants' National Bank, Fort Scott. See that it is honored for me. I start for home to day. Am worse. Let nobody know I am worse, and they will think I come back according to promise.

"M. V. Voss."

*362 *Witness being asked what he understood by the last sentence of said letter, said: "I was aware of the fact that he did not design to return, and also of the fact that he had said to many that he expected to return in the fall. I then understood from that sentence that he had made up his mind that he could not live, and that he preferred to return home, to die among his friends."

On cross-examination witness testified as follows: "From May, 1865, until the time of his death, in 1874, Judge Voss did not have any other home than Fort Scott, that I am aware of. Before I left him in Santa Barbara, in August, 1874, he did not state to me that he would be home to hold the December term of court; but he said this to me, just before I left, that it was impossible for him to come home, but that he wanted me to say that he would come back in the fall,—to say that to the folks here. He said he wanted me to say that I heard him say that he was coming back in the fall. I think I did tell different persons, substantially, that Judge Voss would be home in the fall to hold the term of court, in September last, after my return from California. I am an attorney at law. Have practiced law more or less for ten years and upwards. From my conversation with Judge Voss before he left Kansas for California, and while in California, and from all the communications I had from him, I am in doubt as to whether he did or did not become a non-resident of Kansas, and of the Sixth judicial district. I am the duly-appointed and qualified executor of my brother, Judge Voss. I am acting as such. As such executor, on or about the fourth day of November, 1874, before the probate judge of Bourbon county, I filed an affidavit in making application for letters testamentary as such executor." Witness is here shown said affidavit, above quoted, and his attention called to the statements showing Judge V. to be a resident of Bourbon county at the time of his death; concerning which he testifies: "I meant by those words that Judge Voss owned a dwelling-house at that time in the city of Fort Scott, and that he was absent from it at that time; and that he was the owner of property in this county; and this fact I assumed determined the question. For myself, I regarded it as immaterial, as I regarded the fact alone of his having property here sufficient for the purpose of letters testamentary. I did not regard the question of residence, on the occasion of making the affidavit, material to proving the will. I do not know whether I am

*363 right or wrong in my decision on that *question. As to these words in said affidavit, 'that the said Martin V. Voss was at the time of his death an inhabitant of the county of Bourbon, in the state of Kansas,' I meant that he had been such inhabitant previous to that time,—that he was when he made the will; and my recollection is that those words were in the blank form furnished me by the probate judge, and that I copied them, and did not regard them as of very great importance for the purpose of proving the will, and was in doubt as to the fact, and determined it according to my own notion of it. I drew his salary as district judge, as his executor, up to the twenty-first day of October, 1874. Auditor Wilder wrote to me that there was $116 due up to the twenty-first of October, and upon furnishing him with a certified copy of my letters testamentary, he would pay me."

The testimony is voluminous, and somewhat conflicting. The case was argued orally.

W. C. Webb, for plaintiff.

J. E. McKeighan and E. M. Hulett, for defendant.

KINGMAN, C. J. This is a contest, by original proceedings in this court, as to who is entitled to the office of district judge of the Sixth judicial district. The plaintiff claims by virtue of an executive appointment; the defendant by virtue of an election in November, 1874. The sole question presented in the case is this: Did a vacancy exist in the office more than thirty days before the last general election? If such vacancy did exist more than thirty days before such election, then it is conceded by plaintiff that the defendant was rightfully elected, and is entitled to retain possession of the office. On the other hand, if such vacancy did not exist more than thirty days before the election, then there could be no lawful election, and the appointment of the plaintiff entitles him to the office. Section 11, art. 3, Const. M. V. Voss was elected judge of said district at the November election, 1871, and continued to hold the office until the twelfth day of May, 1874, and, as is claimed by plaintiff, until his death, on the twenty-first day of October, 1874. The defendant *364 claims that *in May, 1874, the office became vacant by reason of the removal of the incumbent from the state. There is no doubt that if he did so remove, with a fixed determination to remain away from the state, that such a removal of itself constituted a vacancy. Judge Voss had been in feeble health for two years or more, and a portion of the time was absent from the state, and sometimes was unable to perform the duties of the office when at home. In May, 1874, he finally left this state, and on the twenty-first of October died in California. Thus, all the difficulty that arises in the case is to know with what intent he left the state,—whether with the purpose of returning or not. On this point there was much testimony which it is not our purpose to repeat. A very considerable part of it was what was said by Voss about the time of his departure, and after he was gone; and these statements were so contradictory that the mind would become perplexed by their consideration. To some he said he never would come back; to others he said he would be back in November. Sometimes he said he was done with official action; to others he said he would be back and hold the court in November, if his health would permit. These statements, so conflicting, cannot be reconciled. They may readily be explained, and they are, by the testimony of his brother, and this is the substance of the explanation: He testifies that his brother when he left never intended to return to reside, but his purpose was to find a climate that would agree with his health, and there remain; but as he was poor, and needed his salary, he would say, and instructed his brother to say, that he would return in the fall, and hold the November term of the court, thus holding out the idea that he intended to return, so that no step would be taken to fill the vacancy, and deprive him of his salary. With this explanation it is not difficult to weigh and value those expressions of Judge Voss which indicated his purpose to return. They were made with an object other than to show his real intentions. With the morality of this course we have nothing to do. Our object is to ascertain his intentions, so far as we can do so from his own declarations and his acts.

*365 *It may be asked why he was not consistent in his declarations that he would return. This may be answered by stating that in most of the instances where he spoke otherwise, save to his relatives, who might be relied upon to keep silence, there was some motive to induce a statement of his intentions, or something in his relations to the witness that would naturally lead him to trust him to keep silence. The plaintiff's explanation of these contradictory statements is that Voss sometimes felt certain that he would not live to return, and at those times would make the statements that he never would return here, or "never expected to return." There is some reason in the suggestion, and it is entitled to consideration; but it does not explain many of the statements,—such, for instance, as those made to the companion of his journey of his purposes in life when he found a climate favorable to his health, and those declarations made to his father and brother. Again, there is no testimony that these declarations were made while he was in a desponding mood. We must assume that as a fact without proof, and, were there no other possible explanation, might be compelled to do so; but cannot, in the face of the full and satisfactory explanation offered by the testimony of his brother and of his father. Judge Voss left his district and the state in May, 1874, never to return. So far as we can judge from the testimony in this case, it was his intention when he left never to return to the state to reside. The removal, with such an intention, of itself created a vacancy in the office; and such vacancy having existed for more than thirty days before the election, the defendant was rightfully elected to the office, and is entitled to hold it.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss another point raised by the defendant, and on which no opinion is expressed.

Error from Saline district court.

Replevin, by Orson Smith and Rodney Smith, for 422 head of cattle. Russell, as sheriff of Saline county, received an order of attachment issued to him in an action then pending in Leavenworth district court, wherein Charles F. Tracy & Co. were plaintiffs and *367 John E. Tappan was defendant, and *he levied said order of attachment on the cattle in question, and took them into his possession. Smith Bros. claimed ownership and right of possession, and brought this action of replevin to recover possession. Russell answered by general denial; and that he was sheriff of Saline county; and that the cattle were the property of said Tappan; and that he (the sheriff) had taken them into his possession by virtue of said order of attachment, etc. There was no reply. Trial at the April term, 1872. The court found the issuing of the attachment; that the defendant, as sheriff, had taken the cattle into his possession by virtue thereof, and held the same by virtue of said attachment at the time of the replevin; that the cattle had been replevied and delivered to plaintiffs; that the average value of the cattle at the time of the levy by the sheriff was $39 per head; that at the time the cattle were returned to the plaintiffs under the order of replevin they were worth $30 per head; that the plaintiffs owned all of the cattle except three head, which three head belonged to said Tappan, and O. Smith, one of the plaintiffs; that at the time of the levy of the attachment and the replevin the cattle replevied were all one herd; that said Tappan and O. Smith owned a lot of cattle, which were then, except three head, in Ottawa county; that the sheriff requested said Orson Smith, before the levy of the attachment, to designate his own cattle, assuring him that none of his (Smith's) cattle would be disturbed if he (Smith) would inform said sheriff which they were. Judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the possession of the cattle, and for $3,000 damages, the amount claimed in the petition.

Stillings & Fenlon, for plaintiff in error.

We contend, first, that, on the pleadings, the defendant below was entitled to judgment; that Russel was, on the findings, entitled to a judgment for the return of the three head of cattle, and costs.

When Smith was requested to designate Tappan's interest in *368 the cattle, and used language to induce the sheriff to believe that Tappan had an interest in the cattle, but failed and refused to point out what that interest was, the sheriff was justified in taking possession of all the cattle; and that the Smiths could not consider or treat him as a wrong-doer, at least until they had pointed out to him their property, so as to enable him to separate the property, and deliver to them their own. Tufts v. McClintock, 28 Me. 424; Wilson v. Lane, 33 N. H. 466; Willard v. Rice, 11 Metc. 493; Carlton v. Davis, 8 Allen, 94; Drake, Attachm. § 199. It was the right and duty of the sheriff to seize the property in which Tappan had a partnership interest. 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 336, 339; Drake, Attachm. § 248. The fact of that interest being only a partnership interest in three of the cattle can make no difference, any more than if but three of the cattle had been owned by Smith, and the balance had all belonged to Smith and Tappan. The declarations of Smith to the sheriff that Tappan had an interest would justify the levy, although there had been no interest in Tappan, and estop Smith from claiming damages for seizing property in which they thus led the sheriff to believe Tappan had an interest subject to levy.

Smiths at no time offered to designate their cattle to the sheriff, nor demanded a delivery of their cattle, and yet claimed and recovered judgment in the court below for the difference in the value of their cattle, caused by a decline in the general cattle market, while they had thus held out to the sheriff that Tappan had an interest in the cattle, and neglected and refused to designate what share or portion of the cattle belonged to them. If this is the law of the case, it will hardly be claimed in future that law is the perfection of reason.

The pleadings admit the ownership of the cattle in Tappan at the time of the levy, and of course all evidence was improperly received, and the evidence as to damages was objected to. The damages assessed were merely imaginary,—such as might have been suffered; but that they were actual damages, flowing necessarily and legitimately from the detention, is not shown by the testimony; and, on the finding of the ownership of the three head of cattle to be *369 in Tappan *and Smith, we were entitled to a judgment for their return, or the value, and the court erred in refusing it.

The pleadings do not admit the ownership of the cattle attached to have been in Tappan. Under the Code a reply was not necessary unless the answer contained matter that was both new and material. Section 128. A material allegation is one essential to the defense, which could not be stricken from the pleading without leaving it insufficient. Code, § 129. In replevin in detinet, under a general denial, property in the defendant can be shown. Coverlee v. Warner, 19 Ohio, 29; Snook v. Davis, 6 Mich. 156; Dickinson v. Lovell, 35 N. H. 9; Oaks v. Wyatt, 10 Ohio, 344. Besides, this objection comes too late. Had it been made in the court below it could have been obviated by an amendment of the pleadings. A point cannot be insisted upon here which was waived there.

The sheriff had no right to take possession of Smith & Tappan's partnership property on attachment for an individual debt of Tappan's. The copartner Smith had a lien upon the stock until the settlement of the partnership debts, and he was entitled to the possession of it. Pars. Copart. 350; Pars. Mer. Law, 188; Pars. Cont. 107; Treadwell v. Brown, 43 N. H. 290; Deal v. Bogue, 20 Pa. St. 228; Smith v. Emerson, 43 Pa. St. 456; In re Smith, 16 Johns. 102. It is undoubtedly true that where property belongs to joint owners, not partners, the sheriff may take possession of it in payment of an individual debt. Drake, Attachm. (3d Ed.) § 248. But Drake refused to apply this rule to partnership property, "concerning which," he says, "there is much diversity of decision." We are not disposed to deny that there are some decisions of respectable courts in which a contrary rule is adopted, but these decisions were given, it is believed, in states where the chattels of the debtor cannot be reached by garnishment. In this state the person in possession of chattels may be required to disclose the debtor's interest therein, and the notice of garnishment makes him liable to the plaintiff for the value of the chattels belonging to the debtor. Code, § 206. There is *370 therefore, in *this state, no occasion to seize the corpus of the partnership property. In the present case it is in evidence that Tappan was owner of a partnership interest in three head of the 422 head attached, subject to the lien of a mortgagee in possession, and subject also to the lien of the agister. We submit that such an interest is a mere "shadow of a shade," and too minute to be reached by a levy, and concerning which the maxim of "de minimis" fully applies.

The sheriff did not ask Smith to designate the cattle that belonged to the Smiths. He asked Smith to point out what interest Tappan had in the herd of cattle. This Smith declined to do until he could examine his books. This was a reasonable refusal. Smith only asked for time to examine the complicated account relating to these Smith & Tappan cattle. He could not answer without the examination. The sheriff should have given time for this investigation. Instead of this, he levied at once on the cattle as Tappan's property. This action of the sheriff was indefensible on every ground. Smith's answer acquainted the sheriff with the fact that the Smiths had an interest in that herd.

Smith was under no obligation to point out the cattle belonging to defendants in error, even if he had been requested to do so by the sheriff, which he was not. A man does not hold his property by such a frail tenure that he forfeits it whenever he refuses to answer every impertinent question that a sheriff may propose. In the present instance no confusion of property was possible, and Smith was under no obligation to enlighten the ignorance of the sheriff. But there is another important fact: The cattle were separately branded. This was a brand known to many. It should have been known to the sheriff. It was known to the herdsman, Clark, who was afterwards made the sheriff's bailiff to keep the attached property. Clark says he could have easily pointed out to the sheriff the Tappan cattle, but that he was not asked to do so.

*371 It was in evidence, and found by the court, that the *cattle belonging to Smith & Tappan had been wintered by the defendants, Smith & Smith, and that no settlement had been had for the costs of keeping and tending. Under such circumstances the Smiths, under the law of Kansas, had a lien on these cattle. Gen. St. c. 56, § 2. It was not, therefore, subject to attachment. Drake, Attachm. § 245. The Smiths owned 419 head of the cattle in entirety. Orson Smith had a partnership interest in the other three head, and also held them as mortgagee; and besides, the Smiths held them under an agister's lien, and were entitled to the right of possession of the three head as well as of the 419 head. But even if the court should be of the opinion that the defendant below was entitled to a return of the three head of cattle in which Tappan had a shadow of an interest, it will not be necessary to remand the case. The court can render such judgment as the inferior court should have rendered.

In actions of replevin against a sheriff, if the plaintiff succeeds and recovers the chattels, he is also entitled to damages for the depreciation in the market value of the property while in the hands of the sheriff, and for interest on the value of the personal property for the time in which the plaintiff was deprived of its possession. 8 Bosw. 486; Sedgw. Dam. 587, 593; Beveridge v. Welch, 7 Wis. 465; Morris, Repl'n, 139; Gordon v. Jenney, 16 Mass. 465; Rowley v. Gibbs, 14 Johns. 385. The evidence and findings would have justified a larger judgment for damages. The court finds (and this was supported by the evidence) a depreciation in the value of the cattle of nine dollars per head during the time the sheriff had possession of the stock. To this should be added interest on the value of the herd, and necessary expenses incurred in recovering possession of the property. The plaintiffs below are entitled, therefore, to a judgment for $4,000, had the court not been restricted to $3,000, by the ad damnum clause of the complaint.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action of replevin for 422 head *372 of cattle. Judgment was rendered in favor of the *plaintiffs below, defendants in error. The plaintiff in error claims that on the pleadings, with or without a trial, the judgment below should have been rendered in his favor; and this he does on the ground that he set up new matter in his answer constituting a complete defense to the plaintiffs' action, to which answer the plaintiffs did not reply. No such question as this was raised in the court below, but the trial there proceeded in all respects as though the new matter set up in the defendants' answer was duly controverted. Two questions are really involved in this question: First, was a reply necessary? Second, if so, did not the defendant waive the reply by going to trial without it, and by not in any manner raising the question of its necessity in the court below? Both of these questions have been answered in the case of Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. *177, *189, et seq. We adhere to that decision. A reply was not necessary in this case; and, if it had been, the defendant below waived it.

All of said cattle except three head belonged to the plaintiffs below as copartners. These three head belonged to another copartnership, consisting of Orson Smith (one of the plaintiffs below) and one Tappan. The only interest that the defendant below ever had in any of said cattle was an interest which he obtained as sheriff of Saline county by attaching said cattle as the property of said Tappan. If Tappan had owned said cattle, and there had been no liens in favor of the plaintiffs, or either of them, existing against the cattle, the judgment in this case should have been in favor of the defendant below. But as Tappan had no interest in any of the cattle except said three head, the defendant below, as plaintiff in error, now sets up other grounds than that of ownership or the right of possession on the part of Tappan as a foundation for his (plaintiff in error's) supposed right of recovery. He claims that he should recover judgment for the whole of said cattle. He claims that he may recover upon the following grounds: As Tappan had an interest in said three head of cattle, he claimed that he, as sheriff of said county, had a right to attach them, and hold them for the satisfaction of *373 Tappan's debts; and as these *three head of cattle were kept and herded with the other 419 head which belonged to the plaintiffs below, and as said Orson Smith neglected and refused to point out the interest of Tappan in said cattle, he claims that he, as sheriff, had a right to attach the whole of said herd, and hold them for the satisfaction of Tappan's debts. Had the sheriff, by virtue of the writ of attachment which he held against the property of Tappan, a right to take possession of said three head of cattle, and to hold them for the payment of Tappan's debts? We think not. Orson Smith not only had his partnership interest in said three head of cattle, but he and his brother (the other plaintiff below) had other interests in said cattle. The firm of Smith & Tappan owed the firm of Smith Bros. for keeping said three head of cattle, and other cattle belonging to Smith & Tappan, during the fall, winter, and spring, before said attachment was levied upon said cattle. And for thus keeping said cattle said Smith Bros. had a lien upon the cattle, (Gen. St. 548, § 2,) which lien neither Tappan, nor Tappan's creditors, could divest, except by paying the amount due for keeping said cattle. See Drake, Attachm. § 245.

Also, Orson Smith, by agreement with Tappan, and with certain of Tappan's creditors, assumed the payment of certain debts which Tappan owed to said creditors, and Smith was to retain enough out of the proceeds of the sale of said cattle to pay himself therefor. This constituted another lien on said cattle. Orson Smith had the actual custody, care, and control of said cattle. His possession, however, we suppose was the possession of the Smith Bros., and neither Tappan, nor Tappan's creditors, nor the sheriff acting for Tappan's creditors, had any right to disturb that possession until all of said claims against Tappan were paid. Whether either would then have any right to disturb Orson Smith's possession we do not decide. There would still be the partnership interest of Orson Smith. This partnership interest alone might be sufficient to prevent the sheriff *374 from taking possession of the cattle. The above *claims were really charges upon said cattle in favor of Orson Smith, and of the Smith Bros. When the sheriff inquired of Orson Smith what interest Tappan had in said cattle, the cattle were eight miles away, and of course Smith could not point them out or designate them. And Smith told the sheriff that he could not tell what interest Tappan had in the cattle without consulting his books; and there is nothing in the case which tends to show that this was not true. It does not appear from the record what precise interest Tappan had in said cattle, nor does it appear that Smith then knew, or has at any time since known, Tappan's precise interest in the cattle. It appears that Smith could have known what said interest was by examining his books, but he refused to do so, or to tell what the interest was. We do not think that this refusal authorized the sheriff to attach said cattle, and take them from the custody of Smith. In this connection, see Treat v. Barber, 7 Conn. 275; Holbrook v. Hyde, 1 Vt. 286; Moore v. Bowman, 47 N. H. 502; Tufta v. McClintock, 28 Me. 429. The creditors of Tappan had another and an ample remedy by a proceeding of garnishment. Gen. St. 666, § 200 et seq.

We suppose it is hardly necessary for us to say that if the sheriff had no right to take possession of said three head of cattle under his writ of attachment, he had no right to consider that the Smith Bros. forfeited their whole herd simply because Orson Smith refused to point out to the sheriff Tappan's interest in said three head of cattle. The three head were differently branded from the others, and could easily have been pointed out to the sheriff by the herder, if the sheriff had inquired of the herder.

The damages allowed by the court were not excessive, nor speculative. The court allowed damages for a decrease in the market value of the cattle during the time that they were wrongfully detained by the defendant from the plaintiffs. This was right. Young v. Willet, 8 Bosw. 486; Rowley v. Gibbs, 14 Johns. 385; Allen v. Fox, 51 N. Y. 565; Beveridge v. Welch, 7 Wis. 465; Gordon v. Jenney, *375 16 Mass. 470. *There was evidence, however, tending to show that the damage was much more than the court allowed.

The judgment of court below is affirmed.

STATE OF KANSAS v. J. C. WALTER.

January Term, 1875.

Venue: Criminal Law. Where an offense is charged to have been done in a specific house on a certain lot and block "in the city of Ottawa, and county of Franklin," and against the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas, the venue is sufficiently alleged, although it is not alleged in any other way that the offense was committed in the state of Kansas. [State v. Bybee, 17 Kan. 462.]

Appeal from Franklin district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

A. W. Benson, Co. Atty., for the State.

Mason & Parkinson, for defendant.

KINGMAN, C. J. This was a prosecution for an alleged violation of the statute in selling intoxicating liquors on Sunday. The complaint was made and the case tried before a justice of the peace of Franklin county, and the defendant convicted. From this conviction he appealed to the district court, when, on a trial by a jury, he was again convicted. A motion was then made in arrest of judgment, which motion was sustained. From this decision an appeal is taken *376 by the *state. A defeat in the allegation as to venue is the only ground on which the motion was sustained. The venue is laid thus in the margin: "State of Kansas, County of Franklin, City of Ottawa—ss." In the body of the complaint the particular lot, block, and house, in the city of Ottawa, and county of Franklin, where the offense was alleged to have been committed, are stated, but not the state, nor is there a reference to the venue laid in the margin; but the complaint alleges that the offense was committed "against the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas." Was this a defect, and, if so, was it a fatal one, on motion in arrest of judgment? If so, it must be because of some absolute rule of law; for it is obvious that the accused could not have been misled or injured by it. From the complaint he must have known the exact location in the city of Ottawa and county of Franklin where the offense was alleged to have been committed. He could not have been more certain of the exact locality had the name of the state been added to the venue in the body of the complaint. What, then, is the rule of law? Mr. Bishop lays it down thus: "It is customary in the United States to write the name of the state in the margin, in connection with the name of the county; but there is no need that the name of the state should appear, either in the margin or in any other part of the indictment." 1 Crim. Pr. § 106. The rule as thus stated is supported by the following cases: State v. Jordan, 12 Tex. 205; State v. Lane, 4 Ired. 113; Com. v. Shaw, 7 Metc. 52; Com. v. Quin, 5 Gray, 478. In this case we need not go as far as these authorities justify, for the offense is alleged as against the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas, which could not well be true unless the offense was committed within the state. This court, and all courts, must judicially know that the county of Franklin is in the state of Kansas, because it is established by statute, and its boundaries fixed by law. If it be said that there may be other counties of the same name in other states, then the answer is, an offense committed in one of them is not against the peace and *377 dignity of this *state. We think the venue sufficiently appears, and the complaint is not defective on that ground.

The order of the district court arresting judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

REUBEN M. BROWN v. DAVID JOHNSON.

January Term, 1875.

1. Continuance: What Application Should Show. An application for a continuance on the ground of the absence of testimony must show what the absent testimony is, that the opposite party may, if he desire, prevent a continuance by consenting to the admission of such testimony.<sup>1</sup>
2. Supreme Court: Review: Demurrer to Evidence. This court cannot affirm that there was error in a ruling of the district court sustaining a demurrer to the evidence, unless all the evidence upon which that court acted is before us, or unless it is apparent from the portion presented, not only that it tends to prove the plaintiff's claim, but also that it could not be conclusively overthrown by any other testimony.<sup>2</sup> VAL-ENTINE, J., dissenting.
3. Case Made: What it Imports. The signature of the judge to a case made, or a bill of exceptions, imports the truthfulness of the preceding statements in such case or bill,—nothing more; and we must look to those statements to see whether all of the testimony is preserved or not.

Error from Wilson district court.

Brown, as plaintiff, brought his action to establish a trust, and to compel a conveyance to himself of the trust property. The land in controversy was the E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 15, township 29 south, range 14 east, and a part of the "Osage Trust Lands," so called. Brown alleged that he was in the occupancy of, and had improvements upon, said tract at and before the time when said Osage trust lands were open for settlement and purchase, and ever \*378 since, claiming the right \*to purchase the same; that defendant, Johnson, was occupying the west half of said quarter section, but never improving or occupying said east half, or any part thereof; but in the year 1869 said Johnson, by fraud and deceit, and by means of false, fraudulent, and corrupt representations and testimony before the officers of the land-office, at Humboldt, made entry and purchase in his own name of said east half of said section. Plaintiff further shows his efforts to procure a reversal of said decision and an entry in his own name, and a tender of and readiness and willingness to pay the proper entrance money for the eighty acres occupied and claimed by him, and he prays that Johnson be adjudged to hold the title to said tract in trust, and decreed to convey the same to plaintiff. Answer, a general denial. The action was tried at the May term, 1873, of the district court. A demurrer to plaintiff's evidence was sustained, and judgment was given for the defendant.

<sup>2</sup> Where an action is tried by the court without a jury, and the defendant interposes a demurrer to the evidence after the plaintiff closes his case, the court cannot weigh conflicting testimony; and if in such a case the testimony presented in the record supports the plaintiff's cause of action, and it can only be answered by contradictory or conflicting evidence, the supreme court will declare the law upon the testimony presented in the record, although it does not affirmatively appear therein that all of the evidence upon which the district court acted is before it. Merket v. Smith, 88 Kan. 68; S. C. 5 Pac. Rep. 394.

Chas. Sweeney and J. L. Russell, for plaintiff.

Hudson & Chase, for defendant.

BREWSTER, J. Two errors are alleged in this case: First, in overruling a motion for a continuance; and, second, in sustaining a demurrer to the evidence.

The motion for a continuance was supported by a single affidavit of one of plaintiff's attorneys. Several objections may be noticed to the sufficiency of this affidavit. It alleges failure to obtain a copy of certain testimony given on a hearing of a contested claim before the officers of a land-office; that the proper custodian had made diligent search, and was unable to find such testimony; and that it must have been stolen or removed from his possession without his knowledge; that there had not been time enough to procure a copy of the duplicate of this testimony from the general land-office, at Washington. But it fails to disclose what that testimony was. The court could not, therefore, see that it was material, nor was there anything for the opposite party to admit, as provided in section 317 of the Code. The theory of our law of continuance is that if one is sought upon the ground of absent testimony, the opposing party may defeat the application therefor by consenting that such absent testimony may be considered in evidence. It is essential, therefore, that the testimony be disclosed as a basis for this consent. It may also be stated that the affidavit alleged, upon information, that a copy of this testimony was in possession of defendant's attorney, and that they had been served with a subpoena duces tecum to produce it. The court properly overruled the motion for a continuance.

In reference to the other question, the record discloses these facts: The action was brought by one who had unsuccessfully contested before the department the right to enter a certain tract, against the successful contestant and holder of the title from the government, and the plaintiff contends that, notwithstanding the decision of the department, the matter is still open for judicial inquiry, and that, upon the facts as disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence, clear and prior equity to this land was shown in him, and that it was error then to withdraw the case from the jury. The first claim of the plaintiff is undoubtedly good; for whatever doubts may have heretofore existed thereon, they have been put at rest by the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72, where it is held that "if it appears that the party claiming has established his right to the land to the satisfaction of the land department in the true construction of the acts of congress, but that by an erroneous construction the patent has been issued to another, the court will correct the mistake." This was as far as it was necessary for the court to go in that case, but it unquestionably fails to state the full limits of judicial inquiry. They extend to the full bounds of equity jurisdiction. But the other part of the plaintiff's claim cannot be sustained for this reason: it does not appear that we have all the testimony before us upon which the district court acted.

*380 The only authentication of the evidence is that it is signed by the plaintiff's attorneys without any preceding statement whatever, and that then follow these words: "The above record of evidence is substantially correct as far as given, but is incomplete in several instances, and does not give all the evidence in the case.

"HUDSON & CHASE, Defendant's Attorneys.

"Signed, settled, and allowed, as and for a case made, this twelfth day of August, 1873.

JOHN R. GOODIN, Judge."

Now, whatever other questions may be raised upon such a record, whenever we are asked to reverse the decision of the district court upon the weight and effect of evidence we must have all the evidence upon which that court based its decision; or if only a part is presented, it must be of such a character as under no circumstances can be overthrown by other evidence,—something which is, of itself, and despite of all antagonistic facts, conclusive. We cannot say that a district court erred unless we know upon what it ruled. Though a mass of testimony may be presented, non constat but that the pivotal facts upon which the decision turned—a fact conclusive in support of the finding—is omitted. The same principle controls, though perhaps applied in a different manner, whether a ruling upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, or a finding of fact based upon the testimony of both parties, is challenged. All the presumptions, in the absence of a complete record, are in favor of the ruling already made. This is familiar law, and needs no citation of authorities to support it. Such is this case. We are not advised by the record that all the testimony upon which the court acted is before us. The signature of the judge imports the truthfulness of the preceding statements of the record; nothing more. Turning to those statements, we find nothing which, even by implication, asserts the presence of the entire testimony. Certain testimony appears, but it is introduced by no statement, and followed by only such as has been quoted. And this, if it implies anything, implies that a portion of the testimony is omitted. And while it may be conceded that the testimony as *381 stated tends to support the plaintiff's case, yet it is easy to perceive that many things might have entirely overthrown it. We cannot, therefore, affirm that there was error in this ruling of the court.

The judgment must be affirmed.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J. The decision of this case is perhaps correct, as this was an action in which the court below had the power to send any or all the issues to a jury to be tried, or to try them itself, at its option; but I dissent from the proposition stated so broadly as it is in the second paragraph of the syllabus. A judge ordinarily has no right, upon demurrer to evidence, to weigh conflicting testimony, or to take a case from the jury where there is any evidence to support each and all the issues in the case.

F. M. CONLEY v. JEFFERSON FLEMING and others.

January Term, 1875.

1. Injunction: Preliminary: Refusal: Doubtful Cases: Discretion of Court. Though the allegations of a petition may be such as to entitle the plaintiff, if proved, to a perpetual injunction on a final hearing, and though the testimony on an application for a preliminary injunction preponderates in favor of all those allegations, yet if it appear doubtful what may be the facts established on the final hearing, and the right of the plaintiff is not likely to suffer serious injury unless immediately enforced, it is often the duty of the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to refuse any preliminary injunction, and leave the rights of the parties to be determined upon the final hearing.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———. The probable results of the final hearing, and the probable effects of a temporary restraining order, upon the respective rights of the opposing parties, are proper considerations in determining the question of issuing an order.
3. County-Seat Petition: False, Forged, and Spurious Names: Pleading. Where application is made for a temporary restraining order restraining the county officers from removing their offices to a place declared by the commissioners, as the result of an election therefor, the duly-chosen county-seat; and the ground of the application is the presence of forged names, names of minors, non-residents, etc., upon the petition for an election; and said petition is not presented to the court, nor a single name given as forged or improperly on said petition; and the only evidence of the fact is the general statement in plaintiff's verified petition that the petition contained the names of two hundred non-residents, of fifty minors, of one hundred dead men, etc.; and the plaintiff had had ample time to obtain more specific and direct testimony; and there is no showing of any special injury resulting from the removal: held, that it could not be affirmed that the court erred in refusing such temporary restraining order.
4. County-Seat Election: Second Election: Time. Where two elections are necessary to determine the question of the county-seat, it is not essential that the last election be held within fifty days of the presentation of the petition therefor.

5. ———: Place Selected. In the selection of a county-seat the electors are not limited to existing cities and towns, but may choose a site for a new town, and locate the county-seat thereon.
6. ———: Name or Description of Place. If a certain tract of land is popularly and generally known by a specific name, the use of that name is a sufficient description; and a ballot with that name is not vitiated by the fact that in addition to the name there is an imperfect (but not contradictory) description of the land.

Error from Linn district court.

In February, 1871, the county-seat of Linn county was removed from Mound City, and relocated at La Cygne. On the first of February, 1873, the board of county commissioners, on petition therefor, ordered an election "to relocate the county-seat" of said county. An election was held on the eleventh of March, 1873, at which 2,757<sup>1</sup> votes were cast, of which 1,093 were given for Pleasanton, 684 for Mound City, 972 for Farmer City, 7 for La Cygne, and 1 for Prescott. No choice. A second election was held March 25th, at which there were 2,435 votes cast, of which 1,183 were given for Pleasanton, and 1,252 were given for Farmer City. The commissioners *383 having declared that Farmer City had been duly *elected as the county-seat, the county officers were ordered and directed to remove their respective county offices from La Cygne to Farmer City; whereupon Conley, a citizen and tax-payer at La Cygne, filed his petition for an injunction against Fleming and the other county commissioners, and all the county officers of said county, to restrain such officers from so removing their offices, and the books and records thereof, to Farmer City. A restraining order was granted by the district judge, Hon. M. V. Voss, on the first of April, 1873, which order was by said judge, on the twenty-second of April, vacated and discharged.

James D. Snoddy, for plaintiff.

W. R. Biddle, Co. Atty., for defendants.

BREWER, J. Two errors are alleged: First, in refusing a continuance; and, second, in discharging a temporary restraining order.

The case itself was one involving that question of frequent occurrence: the validity of a county-seat election. The application was for an order restraining the county officers from moving their offices to the place declared by the commissioners, as the result of the election, the newly-chosen county-seat. On the first of April the petition for an injunction was presented to the judge of the district court. The twenty-second of April was by him fixed for the hearing, and a temporary

At the general election of 1872, the total vote cast in Linn county, for presidential electors, was 2,879; for representatives, 2,414. At the general election in November, 1873, the total vote in said county, for representatives, was 1,863. See Wilder's Annals of Kansas.

restraining order granted, to remain in force until the application could be heard. On the twenty-second of April the plaintiff moved for a postponement of the hearing, and a continuance of the restraining order, which motion was overruled, and of this plaintiff complains. It is well settled that these matters of continuance are largely within the discretion of the trial court. Here no abuse of discretion is apparent, but, on the contrary, the ruling was evidently correct. The petition alleged that several hundred of the names on the petition for *an election were improperly there,—some forged, some the names of non-residents, minors, etc. The affidavit for a continuance, which referred solely to this matter, alleged that application had been made to parties to give voluntary information by affidavits as to these matters, but that these parties refused, and the testimony could only be obtained by deposition, and enforced attendance; but it did not show that any effort had been made to take a single deposition, nor did it give a single name improperly on the petition. It was, moreover, simply a statement upon information and belief. We think the court very properly overruled the application. *Brown v. Johnson, ante, *377.*

The other error alleged was in discharging the temporary restraining order. Here, too, we see no error, or, at least, nothing to justify a reversal. The grounds for holding the election illegal, presented in the petition, which was verified, were—First, that the petition for the election did not contain the names of three-fifths of the legal electors, several hundred of them being forged, those of minors, etc., as heretofore stated; second, that the two elections (for no place received a majority at the first election) were not held within fifty days after the presentation of the petition; third, that the two places declared to have received the highest number of votes at the first, and therefore the sole competitors at the second, election did not in fact receive the highest number, and were erroneously so declared; and, finally, that there was no such place as that declared the chosen county-seat. In reference to these restraining orders in limine, it is to be borne in mind that it is not to be expected that the whole case will then be fully tried; so that the court may properly require that a clear showing be made of a right in the plaintiff to relief, and a right which may be seriously impaired unless immediately protected. Where it is doubtful what upon the final hearing may be ascertained to be the real facts of the case, and where the rights of the plaintiff are such as will suffer no serious injury if not enforced until the facts are finally and definitely determined, it oftentimes is the duty of the court, *385 in the ex*ercise of a sound discretion, to refuse an injunction in limine. Otherwise a defendant might be unnecessarily and improperly restrained from doing that which he has a right to do, and through such restraint suffer an injury for which no adequate compensation is afforded. *Stoddart v. Vanlaningham, ante, *18; Akin v. Davis, ante, *144.* Now, in this case, while the petition (which, being verified, was the principal evidence for the plaintiff) alleges that there were several hundred forged names, and names of minors, etc., the paper containing these names is not presented, nor is there a single name given. More than that, the verified answer of the county commissioners denies this allegation of the petition. Whatever may be said upon the sufficiency of the petition as a pleading, as evidence it is not specific nor definite. Not only does it fail to give any names, but also, by the even numbers used, it is evident the pleader does not mean to be considered as stating the facts exactly. Thus, he says there were the names of "two hundred non-residents," of "fifty minors," of "one hundred dead persons;" that there were "three hundred forged names," "two hundred fictitious names," etc. It is evident from this that he did not have in his mind any specific names, or any exact numbers, but was making his allegations large enough to cover the expected proof, and to meet the necessities of his case. It may be remarked, too, that there is no showing of any special injury that would result to the plaintiff from the removal, or any grievous wrong to other parties.

So far as the matter of time is concerned, the petition was presented February 1st, and the elections held on the eleventh and twenty-fifth of March, respectively. The first election was within the fifty days. This, we think, is all the statute requires. Gen. St. 297, § 5.

The two remaining allegations of the petition may be considered together. The place declared the newly-chosen county-seat is thus described in the proclamation of the result: "Farmer City, situated as follows: 40 acres, in S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of sec. 14; 30 acres off the S. W. qr. of the N. E. qr. of sec. 14,—all in town 21 of \*386 range 23, in Linn county, \*Kansas." Now, it is alleged that at the time of said elections there was no such place as "Farmer City," and no city, town, or village anywhere within the limits of said "section 14;" and that at the first election some of the ballots counted as for this place contained the very words of the description in the proclamation, while others added on the word "and" between the words "sec. 14" and "30 acres;" and that, classing these ballots as for separate places, neither of them stood first or second on the list of candidates. On the other hand, it is alleged that prior to the first election the place designated and known as "Farmer City" was selected upon actual view, and placed in nomination as one of the places to be voted for, by a convention of five delegates from each of six townships, and that such selection was witnessed by two hundred or more persons from different parts of the county; and that the place so selected and named "Farmer City" became and was quite notorious, and at each of said elections was generally known and understood by the legal electors voting at said election. There seems to have been no dispute as to the facts thus alleged on the respective sides. If the majority of the electors of a county are unwilling to select any of the existing towns for the county-seat, but prefer to choose a new place, and start a new town therefor, we know of nothing to prevent them from so doing. Each elector is to give "the name of the place" for which he votes. This "place" may be an incorporated city, a village, or an unoccupied quarter section; and if a majority choose a tract of unimproved prairie, the courts have no power to interfere and set aside their selection. The wisdom of such a choice may be questioned, but the power to make it is beyond dispute. Again, if a given tract of land is known by a specific name, the use of that name is a sufficient description. If a certain definite seventy-acre tract was generally known as and by the name of "Farmer City," the use of that term in a ballot was a sufficient description, and the ballot was not vitiated by a mere imperfection in a further description therein of the land. No greater precision or definiteness \*387 is necessary in a ballot than in a deed. There was in these facts nothing to justify the court in continuing the restraining order. Upon the whole case, therefore, we cannot see that the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, erred in discharging the temporary restraining order, and the judgment will be affirmed.

Probably the only matter affected by this decision is the question of costs; as, if the public press be reliable, subsequent elections have relocated the county-seat.

The order of the district judge is affirmed.

SAMUEL O. SWENSON and another v. MOLINE PLOW Co. and another.

January Term, 1875.

Parties: Misjoinder: Separate Interests. Where S. executed to A. two promissory notes, and a mortgage on real estate to secure the payment of the notes, and A. afterwards assigned one of the notes to M., held, that A. and M. cannot sue jointly as plaintiffs on the notes and mortgage, but each has his separate action.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Cloud district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

James Ketner and C. W. McDonald, for plaintiffs in error.

<sup>1</sup>Where two or more persons have separate causes of action against the same defendant, arising from the obstruction of a natural water-course, and the injury of their lands and crops thereby, they cannot unite in the same petition to recover damages for such injuries, which are plainly distinct and unconnected. Palmer v. Waddell, 22 Kan. 352. Under section 85 of the Code, in order that parties may properly unite as plaintiffs they should each have, not only an interest in the subject of the action, but also in obtaining the relief demanded. Jeffers v. Forbes, 28 Kan. 174. Upon pleadings, held that several causes of action were stated. See

Strain & Wells, for defendants in error.

*388 *VALENTINE, J. This was an action on two promissory notes and a mortgage. The facts in the case are substantially as follows: The plaintiffs in error, Samuli O. Swenson and John P. Swenson, executed to the defendant in error C. M. Albinson two promissory notes, and a mortgage on real estate to secure the payment of the notes. Afterwards, Albinson assigned one of said notes to the other defendant in error, the Moline Plow Company. The notes were not paid at maturity, and this action was commenced by Albinson and the Moline Plow Company jointly against the Swensons to recover the amounts which they respectively claimed on said notes and mortgage. The only question which we are asked to decide is whether a joint action may be maintained by the two plaintiffs below, or whether each had his separate action. In this state the debt secured by a mortgage is the real subject of the action. The note given therefor is the principal evidence thereof, and the mortgage is merely ancillary thereto. The mortgage follows the note. Whoever owns the note owns the mortgage. When the note is paid the mortgage is paid. When the action on the note is barred by the statute of limitations the action on the mortgage is also barred. Indeed, any defense that may be set up against the note may be set up against the mortgage. But there is no separate action on the mortgage. The action must always be on the note, and it may be on the note either with or without the mortgage. And the action on the note, whether with or without the mortgage, is, so far as the note is concerned, substantially an action at law. The action is tried, so far as the note is concerned, in the same manner as any other action on a promissory note. Either party has a right to a jury, and the judgment is a personal judgment against the defendant, substantially the same as any other personal judgment. The judgment is much like a judgment in an ordinary attachment case. The judgment is for the amount due on the note, with an order that the mortgage property be first sold to satisfy the judgment, and that if it does not satisfy the judgment, then that a general execution be issued against the property of the defendant. Where more than one note is given, there are as many causes of action as there are notes; and if any of the notes are assigned, then each owner of a note has a separate cause of action, and each has a right to have the mortgaged property sold to satisfy his claim.

Ambrose v. Parrott, 28 Kan. 698. Only such parties as are united in interest should be made plaintiffs in any action. McGrath v. Newton, 29 Kan. 371. Under section 16, c. 128, Laws 1881, (Dass. Comp. Laws 1885, § 2301,) an action cannot be maintained jointly by the infant children who have been injured in their means of support on account of the intoxication of their father, against the persons who sold, bartered, or furnished the liquor. Durein v. Pontious, 8 Pac. Rep. 428. As to several causes of action in one petition, see note to Carr v. Catlin, 13 Kan. *398.

The mortgage is a security for each note. It is substantially the same as several mortgages for the several notes. The mortgage liens in favor of all the notes may be equal, or the lien in favor of one note may be prior to that in favor of another note. In the present case, when Albinson assigned one of said notes to the Moline Plow Company the company became the owner thereof, with the right to a separate action thereon. Each plaintiff then had a separate action, and a separate right to have the mortgaged property sold to satisfy his or its own note. Although the two notes were secured by one mortgage, yet the rights of the parties were the same as though the two notes had been secured by two different mortgages on the same piece of land. The notes are the principal thing, and the mortgage is ancillary. And as the notes are separate, the mortgage must be considered as a separate mortgage for each note. In the present case, Albinson wanted a judgment in his favor for the amount due on his note, and the mortgaged property sold to satisfy his judgment. The Moline Plow Company wanted a judgment in its favor for the amount due on its note, and the mortgaged property sold to satisfy its judgment. Now, where is there any community of interest in this? It is true, both want the property sold, but each wants it sold for a different purpose. What interest has Albinson in having the property sold to satisfy the Moline Plow Company's claim? And what interest has the Moline Plow Company in having the property sold to satisfy Albinson's claim? Each really wants the property sold to satisfy his or its own claim, and not to satisfy that of the other. Instead of there being a community of interest there is really an antagonism of interest between the *390 plaintiffs. Either might *have sued on his or its own note, and made the other a defendant, so as to have the priority of their liens on the mortgaged property determined, for in this there is a conflict of interest; but they cannot sue jointly as plaintiffs, for they have no interest in common. As to joinder and misjoinder of parties plaintiff, see Harsh v. Morgan, 1 Kan. *293; Winfield T. Co. v. Maris, 11 Kan. *148 et seq.; Hudson v. County of Atchison, 12 Kan. *140; Newcomb v. Horton, 18 Wis. 566; Barnes v. City of Beloit, 19 Wis. 93; Howland v. Supervisors, Id. 247.

T. K. JOHNSTON and others v. WINFIELD TOWN Co.

January Term, 1875.

1. Pleading and Proof: Execution of Deed: Admissions of Petition not to be Contradicted. Where a plaintiff's petition admits the execution and delivery of a deed, the plaintiff cannot, under such petition, introduce evidence for the purpose of showing that the deed was never in fact executed or delivered.
2. Conveyances: Consideration: Impeaching. The grantor in a deed cannot, in the absence of fraud in its execution, introduce evidence on the trial tending to impeach, contradict, or vary the consideration expressed in the deed, for the purpose of invalidating the deed, or of setting it aside.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Cowley district court.

Action by Johnston and four others to set aside and annul a certain quitclaim deed. The petition was as follows: "The plaintiffs complain of the said defendant, and aver that the said defendant, on the twelfth of February, 1870, was a corporation, duly incorporated under the laws of said state; that said defendant, on said twelfth \*391 of February, pre\*tended and fraudulently claimed to be the owner of a certain portion of the town-site of Winfield, in said county, to-wit, the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 28, in township 32 south, range 4 east; that on the tenth of July, 1871, the probate judge of said county entered the said described portion of the said town-site at the United States land-office, at Augusta, Kansas, for the several use and benefit of the occupants and inhabitants thereof, under the act of congress in such case made and provided; that at the time of said entry the plaintiffs respectively, each for himself, was an occupant and inhabitant of said town-site, within the meaning of said act of congress, and was then, and ever since has been, possessed of a bona fide interest therein. The plaintiffs further aver that said pretended ownership of the defendant to said described portion of said town-site of Winfield at said date, tenth of July, 1871, was disputed by a great number of persons claiming an interest in said town-site as occupants thereof at the time of said entry, and among whom was each of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs further aver that between the time of said entry and the twenty-first of September, 1871, attempts were made by many of said occupants, and by said defendant, to compromise and settle said disputed title, which finally resulted in a verbal agreement between the said plaintiffs respectively and the said defendant, which was, in substance, as follows: The said plaintiffs respectively, each for himself, agreed to make a quitclaim deed to said defendant, and for said defendant's use and benefit, of all his interest in the said town-site, in consideration that the said defendant would pay to him the sum of one dollar in money, and also procure the quitclaim of each and every occupant of said town-site, within the meaning of said act of congress, of his respective interest, so that the said disputed question of title might be permanently settled, and the property of the town enhanced thereby; to all of which agreement on the part of the plaintiffs respectively the defendant agreed. The plaintiffs aver that in pursuance of said described agreement they did, on said twenty-first of September, 1871, each respectively, make to the defendant his quitclaim deed of his respective interest in and to the said town-site, the names of said plaintiffs, together with some other names of said occupants of said town-site, quitclaiming as aforesaid, being attached to the same deed; that is, each of the plaintiffs, together with others as aforesaid, attached his signature to the same deed, a copy of which is hereto attached marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this petition.

*392 *The said plaintiffs further aver that the said defendant did not fulfill its part of the said agreement in this: that it did not pay to either of the plaintiffs the said sum of one dollar; and, further, that it did not procure the quitclaim deeds of all the said occupants of the said town-site of their respective interests in the same, as it had agreed to do, nor nearly all of them, so that the said plaintiffs were left, and are still left, in no better condition than before they respectively executed the said deed. The plaintiffs further aver that the defendant, well knowing that a large number of the occupants of the said town-site had not quitclaimed their respective interests in the same to the defendant, and with a design to cheat and defraud each of the plaintiffs out of his respective interests in said town-site, did wickedly procure a false acknowledgment of the plaintiffs respectively to said quitclaim deed; and did, on the twenty-third of September, 1871, cause the same to be recorded in the registry of deeds in said county, in Book A, pages 87, 88, and 89." Here follow three averments, alike except as to names, each stating that one of the plaintiffs, "at the time of his executing the said quitclaim, was a married man, having a wife with whom he was then and is still living, and who did not sign said quitclaim deed." The demand for judgment was as follows: "The said plaintiffs, each respectively, therefore prays that the said quitclaim deed from the plaintiffs, respectively, to the defendant, may be declared null and void, and be wholly set aside; and that the plaintiffs may have judgment against the defendant for the costs of this action."

Annexed to this petition, as Exhibit A, was the quitclaim deed, which was signed by the plaintiffs and 80 other persons. It appeared to have been acknowledged and certified on the day of its date, and duly recorded. The answer admitted that the Winfield Town Company was a corporation; that the plaintiffs executed the deed as stated in the petition; that the town-site of Winfield was entered by the probate judge as averred; and, except as to the matters so admitted, denied "each and every allegation in said petition." Trial at the October term, 1873, of the district court. The plaintiffs called one of their number as a witness. After testifying to the usual preliminary matters, and that he had "signed the quitclaim deed *398 set out in the petition," he was asked the following questions, to each of which defendant objected, which objections were sustained by the court. The questions were as follows: "Were there any conditions, or was there any agreement, between yourself and the defendant, containing any conditions not named in the deed, which caused you to sign it? State if you signed the deed by reason of any agreement made with you by the defendant that said deed should not operate as a conveyance until the terms of that agreement should be fulfilled. State if you ever received any consideration for signing said deed. State whether the defendant had agreed to do or perform anything which was to be the consideration for your signing the deed, and which was not done and performed. What was the real consideration for which you signed the deed? State if you ever delivered the deed to the defendant. State if you ever acknowledged the execution of the deed. State whether or not that deed contained the names of all, or nearly all, of the inhabitants and occupants of the town-site of Winfield, or who were such inhabitants or occupants on the tenth of July, 1871, or on the twenty-first of September 1871. State whether or not, previous to the twenty-first of September, 1871, the question of title to the town-site of Winfield was in dispute between a portion of the inhabitants and occupants thereof and the defendant."

These questions were held incompetent and immaterial. Plaintiffs thereupon rested, and defendant demurred to the evidence. The court sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment in favor of the defendants.

Alexander & Saffold, for plaintiffs.

That parol testimony may be adduced to show fraud, or want, failure, or illegality of consideration, in a written instrument, or a different consideration from that expressed, is well settled. Booth v. Hynes, 54 Ill. 363; Waymack v. Heilman, 26 Ark. 449; McCulloch v. McKee, 16 Pa. St. 269; Laudman v. Ingram, 49 Mo. 212, Martins v. Berens, 67 Pa. St. 459; Westbrooks v. Jeffers, 33 *394 Tex. 86; Mallory v. Leach, 35 Vt. 156; Ellis v. Crawford, *39 Cal. 523; Bowman v. Torr, 3 Iowa, 571; Williams v. Donaldson, 8 Iowa, 109; Corbin v. Sistrunk, 19 Ala. 208; Baldwin v. Carter, 17 Conn. 201; Drury v. Trembut Imp. Co., 18 Allen, 168. The plaintiffs insist that in making the deed, or as explained in the language of their petition, "that each of the said plaintiffs, together with others as aforesaid, attached his signature to the same deed," their intent was not to deliver the deed, or to pass any interest, until certain others had signed the deed, and the consideration of their signing fully effected. And parol evidence is admissible to show that a written instrument was not intended to operate and take effect until certain stipulations not named therein had been complied with, or to show that an attempt had been made to use such instrument in violation of some verbal agreement accompanying it. Rearich v. Swinehart, 11 Pa. St. 233; Pym v. Campbell, 36 Eng. Law & Eq. 91; Black v. Shreve, 13 N. J. Eq. 455. And also to show the circumstances under which deed was made. Foster v. McGraw, 64 Pa. St. 464; Wurzburger v. Meric, 20 La. Ann. 415; Brown v. Pitney, 39 Ill. 468; Bonney v. Morrill, 57 Me. 368; Gatlin v. Newell, 9 Ind. 572. We have not sought to use parol evidence to establish a new contract, or to conflict with the terms expressed in any written instrument. We should be allowed such testimony for the purpose of showing that the deed in question is void, and never had any binding force, under the conditions by which it was signed, and also "for want of due delivery."

The plaintiffs sought to show, by parol evidence, that they never delivered the deed. Without delivery, it will be conceded the deed could not take effect. It is true, the petition does not allege, in so many words, that the deed was not delivered; but it does state that which, if true, shows there was neither a delivery, nor an intended one. We readily grant that a deed, duly executed and delivered to the grantee with the intention to pass a title, could not be questioned, unless induced by fraud. But we think that this averment in the petition, viz.: "That the defendant, well knowing that a large number of the occupants of said town-site had not quitclaimed their respective interests in the same to the defendant, and with a design to cheat and defraud each of the plaintiffs out of his respective *395 interest in said town-site, did wickedly procure a false acknowledgment of the plaintiffs respectively to said quitclaim deed," etc.,—is sufficient to charge the defendant with fraud from the making of the deed, and to admit of the evidence offered. Reed v. Noron, 48 Ill. 323; Bullock v. Narrott, 49 Ill. 62; Waddingham v. Loker, 44 Mo. 132; Childress v. Ford, 20 N. J. Eq. 463; 10 Smedes & M. 25. The possession of the deed by the grantee is presumptive evidence of delivery only, and may be controverted by parol evidence. Brackett v. Barney, 28 N. Y. 333; Black v. Thornton, 31 Geo. 641; Gregory v. Walker, 38 Ala. 26. To constitute a legal delivery of a deed, it must have been delivered and accepted with the intention of delivery; and if such delivery depends on a contingency, the contingency must happen before delivery is complete. Comer v. Baldwin, 16 Minn. 172, (Gil. 151;) Walker v. Walker, 42 Ill. 311; Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 92; Berry v. Anderson, 22 Ind. 36; Graves v. Dudley, 20 N. Y. 76. The plaintiffs say that the defendant "did wickedly procure a false acknowledgment of the plaintiffs respectively to said quitclaim deed;" in other words, forged the said acknowledgment. We submit, further, that it was competent for plaintiffs to show by parol evidence that they had never acknowledged the deed. To shut out evidence of this nature would give to fraud, trickery, and forgery too ample a scope.

A. H. Green and Leland J. Webb, for defendant.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought by T. K. Johnston, S. C. Smith, J. D. Cochran, W. Q. Mansfield, and J. P. Short, against the Winfield Town Company, to have a certain quitclaim deed set aside and declared null and void. At the trial of the case the court below excluded certain evidence offered by the plaintiffs; and whether the court erred therein or not is the only question now presented for our consideration. The petition in the court below alleges, among other things, as follows: The N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of sec. 28, in township 32 south, of range 4 east, constituted a portion of the town-site of the town of Winfield, Cowley county. The probate judge of said \*396 county entered this portion of said \*town-site at the United States land-office "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests, but whether the probate judge ever entered any other portion of said town-site or not is not shown or stated in the petition. The defendant, a corporation, claimed to own said portion of said town-site entered by the probate judge, but their ownership was disputed by the plaintiffs and others. The plaintiffs were occupants and inhabitants of said town-site, and had and still have an interest therein; but whether any one of them ever was an occupant or inhabitant of that portion of said town-site claimed by the defendant, or ever had any interest therein, is not shown or stated in the petition. The plaintiffs and thirty other persons, in pursuance of a verbal agreement, made a quitclaim deed to said defendant for that portion of said town-site claimed by said defendant. The consideration expressed in the deed was one dollar paid to each of the grantors, the receipt of which they each acknowledged in the deed. According to said verbal agreement the defendant was to pay each grantor one dollar, and obtain a quitclaim deed from each occupant of said town-site. This was not done, and the plaintiffs now complain. But how such a quitclaim deed from each occupant of the town-site to the defendant could be a consideration for the quitclaim deed from the plaintiffs to the defendant, or how it could be of any benefit to the plaintiffs, is not disclosed, and cannot easily be imagined. Whether such a quitclaim deed would be a benefit to any one is not stated in terms. But if it should be a benefit to any one, it would certainly appear most strongly to be a benefit only to the defendant. The petition also alleges that the acknowledgment of said quitclaim deed was procured fraudulently.

We do not think that said petition states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The deed which the petition asks to have set aside appears upon its face to have been regularly executed and acknowledged. It is found in the possession of the grantee, and has been duly recorded. All this appears from the petition and *397 exhibits; and this, at least, is **prima facie* evidence that the deed was duly executed and delivered. The petition nowhere alleges that it was not duly executed or delivered. (Perhaps a denial contained in a petition, of the execution of a written instrument set forth in the petition, need not be verified by affidavit, as is required to be done of a denial contained in a subsequent pleading putting in issue an allegation of the execution of a written instrument.) But the petition not only fails to deny that the deed was duly executed, but it even admits and alleges that it was so done. With reference to the execution, the petition uses the word "make" twice; the word "executed" once; the word "executing" three times. The petition does not pretend that there was any fraud in the execution of said deed. It states, however, that there was fraud in the acknowledgment of the execution of the same, and in recording it. But it does not state in what the fraud consists. No facts showing fraud are stated. But even if there was fraud in the acknowledgment of the execution of the deed, or in recording the same, still that would not invalidate the deed. Even if the execution of the deed had never been acknowledged before any officer, and even if the deed had never been recorded, it would still be valid, if it had been in fact executed. There is no breach of said verbal contract, nor of any contract, nor any default on the part of the defendant, alleged in said petition, except that it is therein alleged that the defendant did not pay said plaintiffs each one dollar, and did not procure a quitclaim deed from all the occupants of said town-site. These two things, which it is claimed should have been done, it will be remembered are what the plaintiffs alleged in their petition constituted the consideration for their executing said quitclaim deed. As to the consideration: We suppose that, in the absence of fraud, the consideration expressed in the deed cannot be impeached, contradicted, or varied, for the purpose of invalidating the deed. The consideration expressed in the deed, we suppose, may be contradicted or varied by evidence aliunde, where fraud is alleged, or where the grantor sues for the consideration, or where the *grantee sues for a breach of some covenant contained in the deed. But we do not think that such a thing can ever be done, in the absence of fraud, merely for the purpose of setting aside the deed. The consideration expressed in the present deed was one dollar, and the plaintiffs each in the deed acknowledged the receipt of the same. And this is conclusive in a case of this kind. The evidence offered to be introduced by the plaintiffs, and excluded by the court, was evidence tending to show that the deed was not fully executed, and a want or failure of consideration; that is, the plaintiffs desired to show that the deed was not to be considered a deed until all the occupants of said town-site had executed quitclaim deeds to the defendant, and until the defendant had paid each grantor one dollar, and that none of the conditions had been fulfilled. We do not think that such evidence was admissible under the state of the pleadings. It would all tend to contradict either the plaintiffs' petition, or their said deed, and without any sufficient allegations of either fraud or mistake. We might further say, although we think under the pleadings the question is not in this case, that a deed apparently fully executed and acknowledged, and delivered to the grantee, to become an absolute deed upon some condition, is not an escrow, but is immediately a deed absolute. McKean v. Massey, 6 Kan. *122.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

GEORGE J. CLARK and others v. WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

January Term, 1875.

1. Pleadings: Filing Supplemental: Discretion of Court. The filing of amended or supplemental pleadings is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, and, unless it appears that such discretion has been abused, a refusal to permit either to be filed is no ground for reversal. [Simpson v. Vass, 31 Kan. 227; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 601.]
- *399 *2. Usury: Withdrawing Plea: Public Policy. An agreement to withdraw the plea of usury is against public policy, and cannot be sustained.
3. Answer: Additional Defense: Showing. Ordinarily, when leave is asked to file an amended answer containing an additional defense, it is expected that some sufficient reason will be shown for not presenting such defense before.
4. ———. Hence, when a party, with full knowledge of a defense, intentionally omits to plead it, or having once pleaded it intentionally withdraws it, as a rule, he ought not to be permitted to replead it; and especially is this so where he reaps some benefit from such omission or withdrawal, and makes the omission or withdrawal by agreement with his adversary, and for the purpose of receiving such benefit.
5. Usury: As a Defense. The defense of usury is to be treated as any other defense, and has no especial claims on the favor or indulgence of the court. Quære, is the defense of usury so far a personal one that the wife of the debtor cannot plead it where the homestead is mortgaged to secure the usurious debt, and such also that a subsequent mortgagee cannot plead it?<sup>1</sup>

Error from Bourbon district court.

Hulett & McCleverty, for plaintiffs in error.

The several points made, and errors raised, can best be explained by first discussing the force and effect of the agreement to withdraw the defendant Clark's answer, and continue the case. If this be viewed in the light of a contract for forbearance, then it must be admitted that such contracts are valid, and of binding obligation, (1 Para. Cont. 440-444,) provided the consideration therefor be legal. A contract, to be valid and binding, must have both a legal consideration, and a legal subject-matter or object. Hence a subject-matter prohibited by law could not be the object of a contract, since malum *400 prohibitum is equally as effectual as malum in se. *Story, Prom. Notes, § 189. So, where law prohibits usury, no contract can be made or enforced concerning it, being malum prohibitum; and no contract can be made or enforced concerning anything immoral or criminal, being malum in se. The court below evidently viewed this contract as analogous and equivalent to a covenant for forbearance,—not to sue. A covenant not to sue, if perpetual, is held to be a release, and, to avoid circuity of action, may be pleaded in bar, if action be brought. But a covenant not to sue for a limited time cannot be pleaded in bar to the action if brought before the expiration of the time, and the only redress is upon the covenant itself. Guard v. Whiteside, 13 Ill. 7; Chandler v. Herrick, 19 Johns. 129; Winans v. Huston, 6 Wend. 471. So, in that view, if Clark, the defendant below, instead of complying with the contract, had refused to withdraw his answer, the court could not have disregarded it, and Spencer's only remedy would have been an action upon the contract for damages against Clark. And this brings us to the consideration of the contract itself. Suppose Clark had refused to withdraw his answer, and Spencer had brought suit upon the contract against Clark, what would have been the measure of damages? Manifestly, it would have been the amount of the usury. The usury was illegal under the law of 1868, when the note was executed, and the court could only have given judgment for an amount which was illegal, which no court will do. Then, very clearly, the subject-matter or object of this contract, upon Spencer's part, was illegal, and hence the contract void. If any portion of a contract is void, for any reason, a court will not undertake to separate the good from the bad, but will declare the whole void. Widoe v. Webb, 20 Ohio St. 431. This contract, then, being void, because of illegality of consideration, the case should be viewed as if none had been attempted to be made, and even if good is not entitled to consideration until action is brought for breach of it. The agreement of September 19th is simply a second promise to pay the original usury, and no more binding or valid than the first. Ferrier v. Scott, 17 Iowa, 578.

The court erred also in denying the motions to file supplemental answers. The Code, § 184, has provided for *pleading, by way of supplemental pleadings, any new matter occurring after the filing of former pleadings. The answers filed with these motions came clearly within the rule laid down in section 144, and parties have the same rights under the Code in a plea of usury that they have in any other case. Catlin v. Gunter, 11 N. Y. 368. On the sixteenth of December, the day before the motions were filed, each of the defendants made a tender of an amount which they claimed and alleged to be the full amount due the plaintiff. Certainly a tender made on the sixteenth of December is new matter occurring after September 19th. It makes no manner of difference whether the defendants should be able to sustain the allegations by evidence or not. The allegations were made, and, for the purposes of pleading, are true, at least until denied, and come within section 144. If section 144 has any force or effect, does it not confer absolute rights?

If anything new has in fact occurred, is it not the right rather than the privilege of a party to plead it? Suppose the defendants, instead of tendering $2,985, had actually paid that amount to the plaintiff, would not section 144 allow them to plead that fact? Yet, according to the ruling and reasoning of the district judge, they could not even plead a release, or an accord and satisfaction, after having agreed to pay the plaintiff his usury, by pleading a general denial only. As to the truthfulness of the answers, if that is of any importance under our Code, it will be noticed that Marston's answer is verified by affidavit, and the record contains the statement that the court considered the answers of the other defendants as verified. Voorhies, Code, (3d Ed.) 199; Seney, Code, 184, and notes. It will be noticed that the supplemental answer asked to be filed by Antoinette E. Clark complies in every particular, since it contains the allegation "that the facts above set forth did not come to the knowledge of this defendant until the fifteenth of December, 1873." Unless, then, section 144 is a surplusage in the law, without meaning and without purpose, her answer should have been admitted as an absolute right.

*402 **Blair & Hill*, for Marston.

Marston is a subsequent mortgagee; and suppose, as is the fact, that the mortgaged premises are not a sufficient security to pay Spencer the full amount due him, if the usury be included, and leave anything to apply upon Marston's mortgage, which is admitted by Clark and Clark, and contains no element of usury and illegality, is it not then an absolute right of Marston that the Clarks be permitted to file answers which very plainly, if sustained, would so reduce the amount of Spencer's judgment as to save to Marston the amount of a just and lawful debt? The case then presents this anomalous condition: If Spencer's judgment, a large portion of which is usurious and unlawful, be sustained, it must be at the expense of Marston's judgment, no part of which is unlawful; that is, the illegal shall be sustained at the expense of the legal and the just, instead of the converse, which would seem more in consonance with justice.

Harris & Spencer, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage given by George J. Clark and wife to the defendant in error. John J. Marston, a subsequent mortgagee, was also made a party defendant. The pleadings were completed by answers and reply. In the answer of George J. Clark the defense of usury was set up. After this, and on September 19, 1873, there was filed among the papers in said case an agreement upon which this case turned entirely in the court below. It was as follows, after title of cause: "It is agreed and stipulated by and between said parties that said case shall be continued until the next term. In consideration of said continuance, the defendant George J. Clark agrees to withdraw his answer from the files, and file a general denial only, and not to place, or ask to be placed, on file any further answer; and also agrees that in case of sale *403 of the property described herein, that the plaintiff shall have the right to remain in said premises until the first of March, 1874, by paying $20 per month after such sale." This stipulation was signed, "WM. H. SPENCER, GEORGE J. CLARK, ANTOINETTE E. CLARK." Marston's attorney indorsed the following upon said agreement: "I agree that this cause shall be continued till December term, 1873," which was signed, "C. W. BLAIR, Attorney for Defendant Marston." The case was thereupon continued to the December term, 1873, and the terms of the stipulation complied with as to withdrawing answer, and filing only a general denial. On December 17, 1873, the defendants George J. and Antoinette E. Clark filed a joint and several motion for leave to file separate, amended, and supplemental answers, setting up usury, and a tender to the plaintiff of the amount due after deducting the usurious payments. The tender had been made December 16th, and since the filing of the then existing answer. The motion was overruled, and the filing of supplemental answer refused by the court. On the next day, December 18th, defendant Marston filed a motion for leave to file a similar supplemental answer, which was also denied. On December 29th, George J. Clark filed another motion for leave to file supplemental answer, which was also denied, the answer setting up the tender only. Also, on said December 29th, defendants Clark and Clark filed a motion to strike from the files the agreement above quoted, which was also overruled.

The principal question in this case is on the refusal of the court to permit the filing of any new pleadings. It is insisted that the stipulation is void because of illegality of consideration, viz., an abandonment of a plea of usury, and an agreement not to make such plea thereafter, and that, therefore, the case is to be treated as though no such stipulation was in it; also that upon the happening of any new matter, amounting to a substantial defense, since the filing of the existing answer, it is a right of the defendant to be allowed to file a supplemental answer setting up such new matter, the *404 refusal of which right is sufficient ground for reversal of the judgment; and finally, if it be not a right of defendant to be allowed to file a supplemental answer in all cases of the happening of new matter, it was, under the circumstances of this case, an abuse of discretion for the court to refuse to allow one to be filed, such as should compel a reversal. It may be remarked that the only object in the various answers and motions offered and made was to renew the once-abandoned plea of usury; for though the tender was a subsequent fact, yet the tender without the usury amounted to nothing. The note was a note of $3,500. The amount of the alleged tender was $2,985; so that if the plea of the tender had been allowed to be filed, and the tender proved as alleged, it would have constituted no defense, except in conjunction with a plea of payment or one of usury.

The subsequent matter was therefore of itself immaterial. And on the other hand, if the plea of usury had been permitted, and sustained by the evidence, the amount of the judgment would have been no greater than the amount due at the time of the tender, for the usury law in force at the time of the contract forfeited all interest. The only difference would have been in the matter of a few dollars' costs.

The agreement to withdraw the plea of usury cannot be sustained. It is no better than an agreement not to plead it; and surely, if such an agreement could be sustained, a usurious loan would always be accompanied by an agreement not to plead the usury,—a very simple, if not effectual, way of evading the law. In short, this case seems to resolve itself into this: If, after pleadings have once been filed, the district court refuses leave to file an amended answer setting up the plea of usury, under what circumstances will this court hold such refusal error, and reverse the judgment? Neither party has the right, after pleadings have once been filed, issue joined, and the case ready for trial, to change the issues by filing either an amended or supplemental pleading. This can be done only by leave of the court, *405 and the granting of leave is within the discretion of the *court.

Error will lie only when an abuse of that discretion is shown. This, so far as amendments are concerned, is familiar law: Taylor v. Clendenen, 4 Kan. *524; Davis v. Wilson, 11 Kan. *74; Douglas v. Rinehart, 5 Kan. *392; Spratly v. Insurance Co., 5 Kan. *155. It is also true of supplemental pleadings. Medbury v. Swan, 46 N. Y. 200; Voorhies, Code, (3d Ed.) 357, § 177, and cases cited. It may be that, as supplemental pleadings embrace only subsequent facts, there can be fewer reasons for refusing to permit them to be filed; but still, like amended pleadings, they are within the control, and subject to the discretion, of the court.

Was there any abuse of discretion on the part of the district court in this case? Leave was asked to file amended and supplemental answers. What grounds therefor were presented? It will ordinarily be expected, in such cases, where additional defenses are sought to be interposed, that some reason will be shown for not presenting them before,—either that the party was ignorant of the facts, or that such facts constituted a legal defense, or that he was in some way prevented from setting them up. He is asking to change the issues, and some reason other than his own pleasure or convenience should be given. If this be the general rule, a fortiori, where a party with full knowledge of a defense intentionally omits to plead it, or having once pleaded it intentionally withdraws it, he ought not thereafter to be permitted to change the issues by pleading it. Especially is this true when he reaps some benefit from such omission or withdrawal, and more especially when such omission or withdrawal not only inures to his benefit, but also works injury to his adversary, and is the result of an express and separate agreement therefor with such adversary. This covers the case of the principal debtor. He knew of the defense of usury, he pleaded it, and then intentionally withdrew the plea. By such withdrawal he obtained the benefit of a delay in judicial proceedings to compel payment by him of a debt, and to the same extent postponed any collection thereof by his creditor; and he made *406 this *withdrawal in consequence of an express and separate agreement therefor with such creditor. It is unnecessary to affirm the validity of the agreement, or assent that it was one which it was the right of the creditor, and the duty of the court, to enforce. It is enough that such an agreement was made, and that its consequent benefits and injuries were received by both debtor and creditor. True, the injury resulting from a loss of this defense may have more than counterbalanced the benefits of delay, though no positive assertion can be made on this point without a fuller knowledge of the circumstances and conditions of the respective parties; but he elected to take the latter, and cannot complain if he is compelled to abide by his choice.

Again, the plea itself which he seeks to make has no especial claims upon the favor of the court. Many very respectable courts have declared it an odious and unconscionable plea,—one which, though tolerated, ought always to be discountenanced. On granting to defendants leave to amend their answers, it has often been only upon their stipulating not to set it up, (Fulton Bank v. Beach, 1 Paige, 429; Utica Ins. Co. v. Scott, 6 Cow. 606; Lovett v. Cowman, 6 Hill, 223;) and while the better opinion is against such discrimination and denunciation, (Catlin v. Gunter, 11 N. Y. 368,) yet it is undoubtedly true that it has no especial claims upon the indulgence and favor of the court. All applications concerning it should be disposed of upon the same principles, and in the same manner, as those concerning other defenses. So far, therefore, from seeing any abuse of discretion in this ruling, as to the principal debtor, it seems to us to have been just what it ought to have been.

So far as concerns Mrs. Clark, and the subsequent mortgagee, the same considerations do not apply. Neither of them had once interposed, and then withdrawn, this defense. Mrs. Clark also states, in the answer she tendered, which was verified by affidavit, that she did not know of the usury until after the stipulation, and just before the tender, and that the mortgaged premises were the homestead *407 of the husband and *herself. Counsel for defendant in error insists very strenuously that this plea of usury is a strictly personal one, and that, therefore, it was entirely unavailable to either Mrs. Clark, or the subsequent mortgagee. If this were correct, there was of course no error in refusing to permit them to plead it. It is undoubtedly true, as a general proposition, that the plea is a personal one, but we are inclined to doubt the correctness of the claim of counsel, at least so far as Mrs. Clark is concerned. See, upon her right to avail herself of the plea, Lyon v. Welsh, 20 Iowa, 578; and upon the general proposition, Shufelt v. Shufelt, 9 Paige, 137; Green v.

Morse, 4 Barb. 332; Reading v. Weston, 7 Conn. 413; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. 367; Sands v. Church, 6 N. Y. 347.

Without, however, definitely deciding these questions, we think the ruling of the court must be sustained for these reasons: Though Mrs. Clark avers ignorance of the usury, she is not wholly without laches. She signed the stipulation to withdraw the answer of her husband. This was notice to her that some defense interposed by her husband was to be withdrawn, and fairly put her upon inquiry to ascertain what it was before consenting to its withdrawal. The circumstances attending the signing of the stipulation are nowhere disclosed in the record, and no excuse given for her signing it, and no reason given for her ignorance of the usury. Did her husband misrepresent the facts to her, or was she so indifferent to the preservation of her homestead as to make no inquiry? In the absence of a full showing upon these matters, and in a case where the court properly refused to permit the principal debtor to interpose a once-abandoned plea of usury, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in also refusing to permit her to interpose this defense. The subsequent mortgagee cannot urge even these considerations. He had no homestead claim, and he avers no ignorance. He seeks to amend his answer, but he gives no reason for not alleging the usury before. He places great stress upon the tender as a subsequent fact, but the tender alone, as we have seen, could avail none of the defendants anything.

*408 *It is hardly necessary, since the case of Stevens v. Thompson, 5 Kan. *305, to say that, under a general denial to a petition which alleges the making and delivery of a note, of which it gives a copy, that no part has been paid, and that the whole amount is still due, proof of payment is inadmissible.

Upon the whole case we see no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

LELAND A. BABCOCK v. D. DEFORD and others.

January Term, 1875.

1. Evidence: Parol, to Prove Contemporaneous Agreement. While parol testimony is inadmissible to contradict the terms of a written agreement, yet it is admissible to prove an independent parol agreement made contemporaneous with the written contract; and where the written contract is fairly susceptible of two constructions, parol testimony of the surrounding circumstances, including the conversations between the parties, is admissible to show which construction should obtain.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> While parol testimony is inadmissible to change or contradict the terms of a written contract, yet a parol contract may be made between the parties contem-

2. ———. Thus, where D. signed a written order to B. to send certain goods, "at $10 each, on six months' time," held, that it was competent to show a parol agreement, made at the same time, that if D. was unable to resell any of those goods during the six months, B. would take them back, and cancel the sale.
3. Principal and Agent: Agent's Authority: Sale by Agent: Conditions. Where an agent, the actual extent of whose authority is unknown, makes a sale of his principal's goods upon certain conditions within the ordinary scope of such an agent's authority, the principal cannot thereafter affirm the sale, and reject the conditions, without the consent of the purchaser, even though such conditions may be outside of the actual authority of the agent.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Franklin district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

*409 J. O. W. Paine, for plaintiff.

As the action is based upon a contract in writing, parol testimony is not admissible to contradict, add to, subtract from, or in any way vary, its terms. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 275; 2 Phil. Ev. 636; Drake v. Dodsworth, 4 Kan. *159; Halliday v. Hart, 30 N. Y. 474; Burhaus v. Johnson, 15 Wis. 286. Again, the evidence, even if admissible, does not show such an agency on the part of Ross as would bind the plaintiff in any verbal contract outside, and in variance of, the written one for the absolute purchase of plaintiff's goods.

John W. Deford, for defendants.

Oral evidence cannot be given to control, vary, or contradict a written agreement, applies to those contracts only which have been wholly reduced to writing, while to those which rest wholly or partly in parol it has no application. 2 Pars. Cont. pt. 2. c. 1, § 10, and note; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 284, 284a, 304; 2 Phil. Ev. 772; 2 Stark. Ev. 573. And this doctrine is recognized by this court in Drake v. Dodsworth, 4 Kan. *170, and by authorities too numerous to cite. A machine manufacturer's "agent and commercial traveler" has full power to do and perform all the commercial business of his principal, and is to be regarded as the general agent of his principal, and clothed apparently with the power of fixing the price, and the time and mode of delivery of the goods, and the payment of the price. Ross had ap-poraneously with the execution of the written agreement, providing it is separate and independent, and its terms in no way conflicting with, or contradictory of, the written stipulations. Thus, when A. sold to B. a sewing-machine, at a stipulated price, and received a negotiable note in payment therefor, held, that it was competent for B. to prove a contemporaneous parol agreement that A. would furnish him work for said machine at a stipulated price, and within a stipulated time, and a breach of said contract by A.; and B. can set off the damages sustained by said breach against the money due on the note. Weeks v. Medler, 20 Kan. 57. To show that a conditional sale or mortgage, McNamara v. Culver, 23 Kan. 661; parol evidence as to consideration of promissory note, Dodge v. Oatis, 27 Kan. 762. parent authority, from the nature of his agency and dealings, to make the parol contract. His knowledge was the knowledge of his principal, and the principal is bound by the conditions agreed upon.

BREWER, J. Plaintiff in error claims that the district court *410 erred in permitting parol testimony to vary the terms *of a written contract. The facts are these: On the third of February, 1873, the defendants signed and handed to the agent of the plaintiff the following order:

*"Leland A. Babcock, M. D., Freeport, Illinois—DEAR SIR: Please send us six of your pure solid silver uterine supporters, as follows, to-wit: * * * at ten dollars each, on six months' time, with printed matter.*

*"Very truly yours,
 "Ottawa, Kansas, February, 3, 1873."*

D. DEFORD & Co.

This order was on a printed blank, only the words in italic being in writing. The supporters were sent, and at the end of six months a draft drawn for the $60, which was protested for non-payment. Suit was immediately commenced, and on the trial one of the defendants, over the objection of plaintiff, testified that this order did not show the entire contract between the parties; that the contract was, in substance, that defendant should take the supporters conditionally, and if at the end of six months they had not been able to sell any, the plaintiff would take them back; that they had tried, but had been unable to sell a single one, and had notified the plaintiff to take them back, and held them subject to his order. It is not disputed but that, if this testimony was competent, and the contract as thus stated, the defendants were not liable. It is undisputed law that parol testimony is inadmissible to contradict the terms of a written contract; but it is also settled that, notwithstanding the written agreement, proof may be made of a contemporaneous parol agreement, and that where the written agreement is fairly susceptible of two constructions parol testimony is admissible of the surrounding circumstances, including the conversations between the parties, for the purpose of determining which construction should obtain. And these rules, we think, justified the admission of the parol testimony. There is no contradiction between the parol and written agreement. Both may have been made. The writing orders the goods to be sent, specifies the number, the price, and the time. The parol testimony does not dispute either. It concedes all to be as stated in the *411 writing, but *asserts that the vendor also agreed to receive the goods back if the vendee, during the six months, should be unable to resell any. Though the writing in terms asserted an absolute purchase, and contained an express promise to pay, it would still be consistent with an agreement to repurchase. Both might have been made at the same time, and both expressed in writing, or one in writing, and the other in parol. But the writing does not, in terms, assert an absolute purchase, or contain an express promise to pay. True, the law will, in the absence of other testimony, upon a receipt of the goods, imply a promise to pay; but this is not a necessary inference from the language, and might be changed by extrinsic circumstances. Thus, if the defendants were only commission merchants seeking consignments, known to be such by plaintiff, the course of business might be such between the parties as to justify the inference that this was but an application for a consignment, with limit as to price and time. If, then, under any circumstances, this language will permit a construction consistent with a conditional purchase, testimony is admissible to show that such was really the intention of the parties in the transaction, and such, therefore, the proper construction. Reverse the condition, and suppose that it was orally agreed between the parties that, upon delivery of the goods, security should be given as a condition of the time: could not the plaintiff show this fact, and, upon failure to receive security, commence suit at once? The contract is silent as to security: does it prove that there was no agreement concerning it? It is silent as to agreement to repurchase: does it follow that there was none?

This agreement was made between the defendants and one Ross, who was the agent and commercial traveler of plaintiff; and it is objected that there is no proof that Ross had power to bind the plaintiff by such an agreement. The defendants had no personal acquaintance,—no negotiations directly with plaintiff. The entire trade was made between this agent and them. They had no knowledge *412 of the extent or limitations of his authority. If *the plaintiff accepted the contract of his agent, he must accept it as a whole, and cannot accept that which suits him, and reject the balance. The principal is bound by the representations of his agent,—bound by the contracts he makes within the apparent scope of his authority. Ross was the agent of plaintiff,—agent to make sales,—and the plaintiff is bound by the conditions he attaches to such sales. At least, he cannot enforce the sales, and reject the conditions.

We see no error, and the judgment will be affirmed.

SAMUEL C. LONG v. CHARLES C. CULP.

January Term, 1875.

1. Taxation: Homestead Lands, before Issuance of Patent. Lands taken under the homestead act are not liable to taxation until the right to a patent exists; and quære, are they liable until the issue of the patent?
2. Government Homestead Patent: When Due. No right to a patent under the homestead act exists until after five years of continuous possession.
3. Taxation: When Lands Subject to. Lands must be subject to taxation on the first of March, or they are not taxable for that year.
4. Statutory Construction. Where one section of a statute treats solely and specially of a matter, it will prevail as to that matter over other sections in which only incidental reference is made thereto.

Error from Saline district court.

Action by Long to quiet title to certain lands acquired by him under the homestead act, the patent for which was issued March 12, 1872. Culp answered, admitting that he had and claimed an interest in the lands in controversy, and alleging that said lands were subject to taxation in 1871, were duly assessed, that the taxes levied thereon were not paid, and that said lands were duly sold for said unpaid taxes, and that he was the owner and holder of the tax-sale *413 certificate *issued under such sale. Reply denying the taxability of the lands. The action was tried at the May term, 1874. The district court held that the lands were subject to taxation in 1871, and gave judgment in favor of the defendant.

D. R. Wagstaff, for plaintiff.

E. W. Hodgkinson, for defendant.

BREWER, J. The question in this case is whether a certain tract of land was subject to taxation for the year 1871. The facts, as agreed, are as follows: Title to the land was obtained under the homestead act. 12 U. S. St. at Large, 393. On the first of March, 1871, title was still in the government. On the twelfth of June, 1871, the owner made final proof and entry, and on the twelfth of March, 1872, the patent issued. The land was not returned by the assessor, but was placed upon the tax-roll by the county clerk under the provisions of section 36 of the tax law, (Gen. St. 1033,) as amended in 1870, (Laws 1870, p. 245, § 1.)

The first of March is the time at which the taxability of property is determined. This is true, as a general rule, of both personal and real property. Gen. St. 1023, § 8; Id. 1024, § 11; Id. 1027, § 19; Id. 1029, §§ 25, 27; Id. 1032, § 35. The last section provides that "lands entered on or before the first day of March in each year shall be subject to taxation for that year." Was this land subject to taxation on the first of March, 1871? Clearly not. The title still remained in the government. Nor does it appear that a right to a patent then existed. Under the second section of the homestead act five years' continuous possession is essential to secure the right of final entry. If possession ceases before the lapse of the five years, all rights under the act fail, and the title remains with the government. No such possession is here shown, and final proof was not made till the June following. There was therefore then no *414 patent, and *no right to a patent. It was government land, and therefore free from taxation. It is unnecessary to consider what difference it would make if the final proof had been made prior to March 1st. It is insisted that section 4 of the homestead act would have prevented taxation until after the issue of the patent. It will be time enough to determine that question when it is fairly before us; for while it is contended that under section 36 of the tax law, as amended in 1870, (Laws 1870, p. 245, § 1,) lands entered between the first of March and first of July are taxable for that year, (which would bring the question above noticed before us,) we are of the opinion that such claim cannot be sustained. That section, or at least the portion applicable here, reads thus: "It shall be the duty of the county commissioners to direct the county clerk to procure from the land officers of the proper district or districts an abstract or abstracts of all lands entered subsequently to the first day of July of the previous year, and all such lands, as shown by said abstract, not appearing on the tax-roll, shall be entered upon said roll by the county clerk as soon as the abstract shall be received."

So far as this portion of the section is concerned the amendment makes no change, and the law was the same in 1868 as in 1870. We do not think this changes, as to these lands, the taxable point from the first of March. There is nothing to indicate positively up to what time the abstract is to extend. The roll is to be returned to the clerk on the twentieth of June. Should the abstract be made up to that day? It dates from the first of July. Shall it run to the same date? Shall it run only to the first of March, the time otherwise fixed to determine the question of taxability? Shall it run up to the time it may be transmitted to the county clerk, whatever that time may be? These are questions unanswered by the statute. It would seem, if the legislature intended to change by this section the time of taxability, the time of the termination of the abstract should have been clearly given. It is a rule of construction to seek to give effect to each expression of the legislative purpose, and to harmonize, if possible, any seemingly antagonistic expressions. It is also a rule of construction *415 *tion that when one section of a statute treats specially and solely of a matter, that section prevails in reference to that matter over other sections in which only incidental reference is made thereto; not because one section has more force as a legislative enactment than another, but because the legislative mind, having been in the one section directed to this matter, must be presumed to have there expressed its intention thereon rather than in other sections, where its attention was turned to other things. Griffith v. Carter, 8 Kan. *565. Now, in the one section the sole matter is the time at which lands shall become taxable; in the other, the addition to the tax-roll of lands overlooked by the assessor. Of course, therefore, the former should control the latter in this matter of the time of taxability. This would be true if the time to which the abstract was to be made up was definitely stated. Much more so when it is left so uncertain and indefinite. Effect also is thus given to both sections. By the first, the time of taxability is definitely fixed; by the second, one means is provided of ascertaining additions to the taxable lands of the prior year. It is true, a fuller list of additions would be obtained if the abstract extended to the first of March of such year; but the legislature may have thought that by this abstract the county clerk would reach all the lands that the assessor had overlooked. At any rate, if each abstract was extended from July 1st to July 1st, the county clerk would be in a position to ascertain the total additions. However that may be, we are clear in our opinion that the first of March remains unchanged as the time to which the taxability of lands must be referred.

The district court erred in its judgment; and as the case was tried upon an agreed statement, it must be remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff, decreeing the tax sale and certificate thereon null and void.

*416 In re Application of EVALINA CLARA CUNNINGHAM to Compel the Issuance of a Patent.

January Term, 1875.

1. Public Lands: Right to Patent: Receipt of Treasurer. Neither the act of the legislature of Kansas entitled "An act providing for the sale of public lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads," approved February 23, 1866, (Laws 1866, p. 142,) nor any other act, makes it the duty of the governor to issue a patent for land sold under said act of 1866 until "a receipt of the state treasurer for full payment" for the land has been presented to him.
2. Mandamus: To Compel Issuance of Patent. A writ of mandamus can be issued against a public officer only in a case where the officer has neglected or refused to perform some official duty; and therefore, where no "receipt of the state treasurer for full payment" for land sold under said act of 1866 has been presented to the governor, nor even issued, a writ of mandamus will not be issued against the governor to compel him to issue a patent for land sold under said act.<sup>1</sup>

Original proceedings for mandamus.

A verified petition for a mandamus was filed in this court on the sixteenth of March, 1875, which alleged the following facts: "That on the eighth of June, 1868, one H. S. Cunningham purchased from George W. Veale, who was then the duly appointed, authorized, and acting agent of the state for the sale of the same, the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 6, in township 6, of range 5 east,—said land being a part of the 500,000 acres granted to the state of Kansas by the act of congress approved September 4, 1841, and by the state of Kansas ordered to be sold by virtue of an act of the legislature approved February 23, 1866; and at the time of said purchase said Cunningham paid one-half of the purchase money, to-wit, the sum of \$160, and gave his note for the balance, to-wit, \$160, payable two years after date, and thereupon he obtained from said agent a certificate stating the facts heretofore set out, and stating further that, on payment of said note, and presentation of said certificate to the governor of said state, he, or his assigns, should be immediately entitled to a patent for said land, which said certificate is now produced for the inspection and order of this court; that on the nineteenth of April, 1869, the said

H. S. Cunningham duly, and for a valuable consideration, *417 *assigned said certificate to the relator, which assignment, duly acknowledged, is here presented to the court for inspection; that after the note hereinbefore referred to became due, to-wit, January 9, 1874, the relator paid the same, principal and interest, to one R. D. Mobley, (who was then the duly-appointed and acting agent of the state to sell the lands hereinbefore mentioned, and to take pay for the same,) and took up said note, and received from said Mobley a certificate that the payments in full had been made on said lands, which note and certificate are now shown to the court. By reason of which facts your relator became and is entitled to a patent for said land, and accordingly, on the tenth day of March 1875, she exhibited the papers hereinbefore referred to to Thomas A. Osborn, who was then and still is the governor of the state of Kansas, and demanded that he issue to her a patent for said lands, but the said Thomas A. Osborn, disregarding his duty in the premises, refused and still refuses to issue a patent, admitting that all that is set forth in this petition is true, but alleging that the relator has not produced a receipt from the treasurer of state for the money so paid. The relator admits that she has not and cannot produce such a receipt, for the reason that the treasurer refuses to give one. The relator is informed and believes it to be true that the said R. D. Mobley, disregarding his duty, has not paid said money into the state treasury, but is wholly insolvent, and has converted said money to his own use. The relator has no plain and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of the law, and therefore prays that a peremptory writ of mandamus may issue, at the cost of the relator, Thomas A. Osborn, commanding him forthwith, as governor of the state of Kansas, to issue to relator a patent for the lands hereinbefore described."

A. L. Williams and Ross Burns appeared for the relator, and made oral arguments in support of their motion for a mandamus. No appearance in opposition.

VALENTINE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandamus to compel Thomas A. Osborn, governor of the state of Kansas, to issue a patent to the relator for some land claimed by her under a *418 purchase made under an act of the *legislature entitled "An act providing for the sale of public lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads," approved February 23, 1866. Laws 1866, p. 142. The governor refuses to issue the patent on the ground that the relator has not presented to him "a receipt of the state treasurer for full payment" for the land, as provided by section 3 of said act. It not only appears from the proofs presented to us that the relator has not presented such receipt to the governor, but it also appears that no such receipt has ever been issued; nor has full payment, even, ever been made to the treasurer for the land. It is alleged, however, by the relator that full payment has been made to the state agent, and that it is the agent who has failed to make the proper payment to the treasurer. Under these facts, can a writ of mandamus be issued against the governor? We think not. There is no law that requires him to issue a patent in a case like the one at bar, except upon presentation to him of said receipt. That receipt has not been presented. Then what official duty has he neglected or refused to perform? None has been pointed out to us, and we know of none. We suppose it is clear beyond all doubt that the writ of mandamus can be issued against a public officer only in a case where such officer has neglected or refused to perform some official duty. No such neglect or refusal is charged against the governor in this case. The writ of mandamus prayed for will therefore be refused.

STATE ex rel. JAMES GRIFFITH and others v. OSAWKEE TOWNSHIP and others.

January Term, 1875.

Municipal Bonds: Public Purposes: Constitutional Law: Act Held Void. The act of the legislature of 1875, entitled "An act authorizing townships to issue bonds for relief purposes," in that it provides for the issue of bonds and the levy of taxes for other than public purposes, is unconstitutional and void.<sup>1</sup>

*419 *Error from Jefferson district court.

Chapter 42, Laws 1875, entitled "An act authorizing townships to issue bonds for relief purposes," was passed and approved February 20th, and was published February 23d. On the eighth of March the electors of the township of Osawkee, Jefferson county, at an election called and held for that purpose, voted for the issuance of "relief bonds" to the amount of $6,000, to be issued under said act of twentieth February. On the eleventh of March James Griffith and William Armistead, resident citizens and tax-payers in said Osawkee township, as relators, commenced an action in the district court in the name of The State of Kansas, as plaintiff, against said Osawkee Township, and against the trustee, clerk, and treasurer of said township, as defendants, to restrain and perpetually enjoin the defendants from executing, signing, issuing, or selling said "relief bonds" so as aforesaid voted to be issued, or any of them. A temporary injunction was granted. The defendants appeared, and moved to dissolve said temporary injunction, and said motion to dissolve was heard before the district judge, at chambers, on the twenty-second of March. It was admitted on the hearing that the election was duly and legally held, that all acts and proceedings of the township board were regular, and that there was a majority of 37 votes at said election in favor of issuing said bonds. The district judge dissolved the injunction. The case was argued orally in the supreme court.

D. H. Morse, J. H. Bennett, and Williams & Burns, for relators.

H. Keeler and Martin & Case, for defendants.

BREWER, J. But a single question is presented in this case for *420 our consideration, and that is the constitutionality of *the act of the last legislature entitled "An act authorizing townships to issue bonds for relief purposes." Laws 1875, p. 53, c. 42. The matter has been pressed upon our early attention and decision for these reasons: The time within which these bonds may be issued is limited. The purposes sought to be accomplished thereby must be speedily accomplished. An impression widely prevails, supported by an official opinion of the attorney general, that the act is beyond the scope of the legislative authority, and that the bonds provided for in said act would, if issued, be destitute of legal obligation. Hence it is said, and with great propriety, that an authoritative decision is of public importance; that if the act be constitutional such townships as desire may avail themselves of its benefits, and negotiate more easily, and at higher figures, the bonds they may issue; and that, on the other hand, if the act be unconstitutional, no steps may be taken under it, the evil of repudiation be avoided, and other measures of relief be resorted to. Impressed with the force of these considerations, we have given the matter our early attention, and proceed now to state briefly the conclusions we have reached.

Two propositions may be considered settled: First, that taxation, to be sustained, must be for a public purpose; and, second, that where municipal bonds are issued, whose payment is provided for solely by taxation, their validity depends upon the question whether the purposes to which the proceeds of such bonds are to be applied are public purposes. County of Leavenworth v. Miller, 7 Kan. *479; Citizens' Sav. & L. Ass'n v. City of Topeka, (recently decided by the supreme court of the United States,) 20 Wall. 655. It is also conceded by counsel that the entire purpose, or, if there are several, and no rule of apportionment as to the application of the proceeds, that all the purposes, must be public. In other words, that the legislature cannot validate bonds for private purposes by declaring that the authorities may apply an indefinite portion of the proceeds to some public purpose. With these preliminary remarks let us turn to the *421 act in *question, and see to what purposes the proceeds of the bonds authorized by it are to be applied. The first four sections provide for the amount of bonds that may be issued, their form, title, time, rate of interest, the limit of the price for which they may be sold, and the placing of the proceeds to the credit of the relief fund. The last clause of section 4 then reads: "Provided, that no part of such fund shall be used except for the specific objects hereinafter named." Section 5 is as follows:

"Sec. 5. The trustee, clerk, and treasurer of such township, or a majority of them, shall, as soon as practicable, sell and dispose of the bonds issued by them under the authority of this act to the best possible advantage, and invest the proceeds, or so much thereof as in the judgment of said officers may be necessary, for the purpose of providing the destitute citizens of such townships with provisions and with grain for seed and feed; and the officers aforesaid shall distribute such articles of necessity amongst the destitute citizens of such township in proportion to their several necessities, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, in accordance with the provisions of the fourth section of this act: provided, that no family shall receive more than seventy-five dollars in value."

The relief of the poor—the care of those who are unable to care for themselves—is among the unquestioned objects of public duty. In obedience to the impulses of common humanity, it is everywhere so recognized. Our own constitution but gives utterance to the universal voice when it says: "The respective counties of the state shall provide, as may be prescribed by law, for those inhabitants who, by reason of age, infirmity, or other misfortune, may have claims upon sympathy and aid of society." Article 7, § 4. It must be borne in mind, however, that the term "poor" is used in two senses. We use it in one sense simply as opposed to the term "rich." Thus we speak of the ordinary laborers, mechanics, and artisans as poor people, without a thought of describing persons who are other than self-supporting. Indeed, the large majority of our people are poor people, and yet they would feel insulted to be told that they are objects of *492 public charity. *We use the term also to describe that class who are entirely destitute and helpless, and therefore dependent upon public charity. The dictionaries recognize this twofold sense. Thus, Webster gives these definitions: "1. Destitute of property; wanting in material, riches, or goods; needy; indigent. It is often synonymous with 'indigent,' and with 'necessitous,' denoting extreme want. It is also applied to persons who are not entirely destitute of property, but who are not rich; as, a poor man or woman; poor people. 2. (Law.) So completely destitute of property as to be entitled to maintenance from the public." Now, when we speak of the relief of the poor as a public duty, and one which may justify taxation, we use the term only in the latter sense. We have no thought of asserting that because a man is not rich, or even because he has nothing but the proceeds of his daily labor, therefore taxation may be upheld in his behalf. Such taxation would be simply an attempt on the part of the state to equalize the property of its citizens. Something more than "poverty," in that sense of the term, is essential to charge the state with the duty of support. It is, strictly speaking, the pauper, and not the poor man, who has claims on public charity. It is not one who is in want merely, but one who, being in want, is unable to prevent or remove such want. There is the idea of helplessness as well as of destitution. We speak of those whom society must aid as the dependent classes, not simply because they do depend on society, but because they cannot do otherwise than thus depend. Cold and harsh as the statement may seem, it is nevertheless true that the obligation of the state to help is limited to those who are unable to help themselves. It matters not through what the inability arises,—whether from age, physical infirmity, or other misfortune,—it is enough that it exists. It is doubtless true that, in the actual administration of the poor-laws, many who are not properly entitled thereto receive public support; but failures in the administration of laws do not change the principles upon which they must rest. It is important to bear this distinction in mind, for, as *423 will appear *hereafter, it is really the former, and not the latter, class which is sought to be relieved under this law. It may be remarked, in passing, that it was claimed by counsel as one of the objections to this act that, under the rule, "expressio unius, exclusio alterius," inasmuch as the constitution casts upon the respective counties the care of the destitute, there was an implied prohibition upon casting it elsewhere. Much might be said, and with great force, in support of this objection; but we do not care to decide whether it be well taken or not, much less to rest this case upon it, for such a decision might be construed as an implied recognition of the validity of the principle which we are constrained to believe cannot be sustained.

The purpose of the act, as expressed in the section quoted, is to provide the destitute with provisions, and with grain for seed and feed. This legislation must be construed in the light of known facts. For reasons unnecessary here to recount, in some portions of the state last season there was a total, and in others a partial, failure of the crops. It was generally understood that many farmers would come to this spring's sowing with little or no seed, and with stock weakened for lack of grain. To make good this lack is the evident purpose of the act,—to provide grain for seed and feed. Its aim is not to furnish food to the hungry, clothing to the naked, or fuel to those suffering from cold. It is not the helpless and dependent whose wants are alone sought to be relieved. If it were, the fact that many who are neither helpless nor dependent might obtain assistance through its administration, would be no valid objection to the constitutionality of the law. It contemplates a class who have fields to till and stock to care for, and proposes to help them with seed for their fields and grain for their stock, that thus they may pursue with better prospects of success their ordinary avocations. It taxes the whole community to assist one class, and that, not for the purpose of relieving actual want, but to assist them in their regular occupations.

These people are engaged in the business of farming. This *424 business cannot *be successfully carried on without seed, nor without stock strong enough to do the ordinary work. They are destitute of seed, and their stock require grain. Hence the tax upon the community. The principle would be the same if their supply of grain was sufficient, but, through the prevalence of the epizooty, or some other disease, their stock had all died. Could a tax be sustained to purchase stock for their ordinary farm work? Or, again, suppose some prairie fire, driven by a fearful wind, sweeps through a county, consuming its fences and farming tools, can a tax be sustained to supply this loss, and enable the farmers to prosecute their labors? Nor need the inquiry be limited to a single class. Were the carpenters or shoemakers, or any other industrial class, located in a separate quarter of a city, and their tools and stock in trade swept away by fire, could a tax be sustained to purchase new sets of tools, and new stock in trade, to enable them to re prosecute their business, and secure support for themselves and families? No distinction in principle can be made between these different supposed cases and the case at bar. They all rest upon this proposition: that a tax is laid upon the public to furnish to one class the means of carrying on its regular occupation. A further examination of this act will but strengthen the views herein expressed. The four succeeding sections are as follows:

"Sec. 6. Each person receiving any portion of the aid provided for in this act shall take and subscribe the following oath:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am buying the aid, this day furnished to me, for myself, and not for speculation, but in good faith, for the use of myself and family, and that I am unable to procure the same on my own account. (Name.)

"Attest: _____.

"Sec. 7. Each person receiving any part of the aid provided for in this act shall execute his or her note to such township for an amount equal to the cost of the aid received by him; and if the maker of such note be a married man, the same shall be signed by his wife; which note shall bear the same date as the bonds herein provided for; shall bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually; and the principal of the note shall be payable in *425 *two equal annual installments; and the said note shall be payable at the treasury of such township; and such township shall have a lien against the real and personal property of the makers of such note until the amount thereof is fully paid. Said township clerks shall immediately make a register of all such notes, in a book to be kept for that purpose, showing the names of the maker or makers of such note or notes, the number and dates thereof, and the amounts of the same; and, so soon as such register is made, such notes shall be delivered to the several treasurers of such township, who shall immediately make a like record of such notes, and shall file such notes in their respective offices; and within thirty days after the making of the abstract aforesaid, by the township clerks as aforesaid, said clerks shall make out and deposit in the office of the register of deeds of their respective counties a full and complete certified copy of such abstracts; and such register of deeds shall enter such abstract in a book to be kept by him for that purpose. The note provided for in this section shall be in form substantially as follows:

"$ _____, 187—.

"For value received _____ promise to pay to the township of _____, in the county of _____, the sum of _____ dollars, payable in installments as follows: _____ dollars on the _____ day of _____, 187—, and _____ dollars on the _____ day of _____, 187—, with interest on said sums at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid; and this note shall be a lien upon the real and personal property now owned, or hereafter acquired, by _____, until the said note is fully paid.

“Sec. 8. The treasurers of such townships shall collect said notes as they become due, and credit the amounts so collected to the ‘relief fund’ of such township; and it shall be the duty of such treasurers to take all proper and needful action for the purpose of enforcing the claims of such township against the property of the makers of said notes.

“Sec. 9. Upon the recommendation of the proper officers of such townships, the proper officer or officers of the county in which such township is situated shall annually, when other taxes are levied, levy and collect, as other taxes are levied and collected, a sufficient tax to pay the interest on the bonds provided for in this act, as the same falls due, and to provide a sinking fund for the final payment of the principal of said bonds; but in no case shall any such tax be levied if the payments made on the notes provided for in the seventh section of this act shall be sufficient to meet the interest and principal of such bonds as they fall due.”

*426 *These various provisions show that the idea of the legislature was not the relief of the helpless and dependent, but the assistance of a class temporarily embarrassed. The recipient is required to make oath that he is buying the aid for himself, and not on a speculation. He is to give a note for the amount received, and, if a married man, the note must also be signed by his wife. The note is to bear the same date, and draw the same interest, as the bonds, and the interest is payable at the same time as the interest on them. This note is to be a mortgage as well, and the most sweeping kind of a mortgage, too, embracing all the real and personal property of the maker, whether owned at the time of its execution or subsequently acquired. And, finally, it is made the express duty of the township treasurer to see to the collection of this note, and to take all proper and needful action therefor. Nothing is contemplated but a loan, and a secured loan at that. The credit of the township is invoked to procure funds for the accommodation of a single class temporarily, and through unexpected calamity, embarrassed in the prosecution of its ordinary business. Can this be called a public purpose? Clearly not. It would doubtless relieve the temporary wants of that class, would enable it to enter upon the business of the year with increased hope, and a reasonable expectation of ordinary success in that business, and thus indirectly result in great benefit to the general public. But a similar result would follow the success and prosperity of any other class in business. And if the principle be once recognized in its application to this class, who can tell how soon it may be invoked in aid of another? If one hundred farmers may receive seventy-five dollars each to assist them in their farming, why may not one hundred mechanics with equal propriety receive seventy dollars each to assist them in their business? or a single manufacturer, who employs one hundred hands, receive seventy-five hundred dollars to assist him in his manufacturing? A difference in amount makes no difference in the principle:

*427 But it may be said that this legislation can be defended *as preventive and anticipatory. To prevent the spread of disease, quarantine regulations are enforced, and ships coming from certain places are, with all their passengers, detained in quarantine, even when not a solitary case of sickness exists on board. To prevent ignorance in the voter, the child is compelled to be educated. To prevent crime in the man, the boy is sent to the reform school. To prevent the spread of fire, valuable buildings are pulled down and destroyed. Grant that these parties are not now helpless and dependent; that they are not a public charge. Unless they are able to make and harvest a crop they may become so the ensuing winter. Is it not the part of wisdom to expend a little now to purchase seed and feed, rather than run the risk of having them become paupers hereafter? Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, this argument is a strong one. We are not disposed to belittle the magnitude of the calamity, or make light of the hardships of those upon whom it has principally fallen. If we consulted simply our own feelings, we should gladly approve of this as of every effort to mitigate the severity of the blow. But though this calamity is great, and though by reason thereof it may seem wise to appropriate out of the public funds a little now to guard against the risk of future want, yet the principle is dangerous and unsound. Let the doorways of taxation be opened, not merely to the relief of present and actual distress, but in anticipation of and to guard against future want, and who can declare the result? How certain must be the expectation of want? How nigh its approach? What efforts must the individual make to ward it off? May he do nothing, and demand that the public make provision to guard against the possibility of future suffering? Must widespread and general calamity precede the granting of such anticipatory relief, or is it enough that individual misfortune or indolence render probable the approach of want? The mere mention of these questions suggests the dangers which would follow the adoption of this as a rule of public conduct.

But the attendant dangers of such a rule are not the sole or *428 the controlling *considerations. The relief provided in this act is only indirect, and contingent. There is no direct appropriation to meet future want. The appropriation is for present use, and the relief is contingent on the successful prosecution of the business of the recipients during the ensuing year. If the crop proves a failure, the public funds are lost, and no relief is secured. It is a speculation, which, however proper and reasonable for individuals, is not a legitimate part of public duty. The same principle would justify assistance to a mechanic destitute of tools, to enable him to purchase tools, and through their use in his regular calling prevent his becoming a public burden. Indeed, it would be difficult to deny its application in any case where, by present assistance, either in the purchase of implements or stock in trade, the recipient might reasonably be expected to earn a subsistence in the prosecution of his regular business. We should expect to find but few authorities to throw any light upon this question. The case of the Citizens' Sav. & L. Ass'n v. City of Topeka, heretofore cited, decides that taxation cannot be invoked to assist private manufacturing establishments. The propositions laid down by Mr. Justice MILLER in reference thereto are broad. It matters not how great may be the necessities of such an establishment, or how much it may indirectly benefit the community, it cannot be aided by taxation. The same propositions were asserted by the supreme court of Maine in the case of Allen v. Inhabitants of Jay, 60 Me. 124. That was a case of an attempted loan of the credit of a town to certain parties in consideration of their engaging in some manufacturing enterprises for their private emolument. In delivering the opinion of the court APPLETON, C. J., uses this strong language: "But whether the money raised is to be distributed per capita or loaned can make no difference in principle. If towns can assess and collect money to be again loaned to such persons as the majority may select, for such purposes as it may favor, with such security, or without security, as it may elect, property ceases to be protected in its acquisition or enjoyment. * * * If the loan be made to *429 *one or more, for a particular object, it is favoritism. It is a discrimination in favor of the particular individual, and a particular industry thereby aided, and is one adverse to and against all individuals—all industries—not thus aided. If it is to be loaned to all, then it is practically a division of property under the name of a loan. It is communism incipient, if not perfected." But the case most nearly in point is that of Lowell v. City of Boston, 111 Mass. 454, recently decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts. In that, as in this, it was the circumstance of a great public calamity,—the Boston fire,—and a praiseworthy effort on the part of the legislature to provide assistance for the sufferers thereby. An act was passed authorizing the city of Boston to loan its credit to assist in rebuilding the burnt district. But this was declared to be outside the purposes for which taxes could be levied or bonds issued. We have been able to find nothing more in point than these authorities, and they all point in the same direction as the considerations we have heretofore adverted to.

It is with reluctance that we have reached the conclusion that this act cannot be sustained. But ours is an unmixed duty, to declare the law as it is, and not as we might wish it to be. Especially imperative is that duty when, as in cases like the present, there is in the surrounding circumstances a strong appeal to overlook permanent rules in favor of a present and pressing want.

The judgment of the court below is reversed.

*JOSEPH G. MCCOY v. H. H. HAZLETT.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

1. Payment: Promissory Note: Pre-existing Debt. The mere giving and receiving of a note of the debtor does not operate as a satisfaction and discharge of a pre-existing judgment.
2. ———: Judgment: Alleged Payment: Conflict of Testimony. Where an action is brought to restrain the collection of a judgment on the ground that it has been satisfied by the note of the judgment debtor; and the parties testify positively and directly contradictory to each other,—one that it was agreed that the note should be taken in satisfaction and discharge of the judgment, and the other that it was not so agreed; and there is some testimony supporting each of the parties, but none conclusive upon the question; and it appears that the note has not been paid, but is filed with the clerk of the district court: held, that this court will not reverse the findings of the district court that the note was not so taken in discharge.

Error from Dickinson district court.

The case is stated in the opinion. There was judgment in favor of Hazlett in the district court.

Case & Putnam, for plaintiff in error, contended that the testimony showed that the note was taken by Hazlett in satisfaction of the judgment.

N. C. McFarland, for defendant, cited Merrick v. Boury, 4 Ohio St. 60; Porter v. Talcott, 1 Cow. 380; and Tobey v. Barber, 5 Johns. 72,—that a note given by a debtor for a pre-existing debt is no payment of the original demand, unless it is agreed that the note shall be taken as satisfaction; and when such "agreement" is alleged, it must be proven by clear and undoubted testimony, to avail the party who alleges it.

*431 *BREWSTER, J. The facts in this case are as follows: Hazlett commenced an attachment suit against McCoy in the district court of Dickinson county, and at the April term, 1870, recovered a judgment for $649.29. On the same day McCoy paid $500 in cash, and gave his note for the balance, payable on or before the first of August next ensuing. In consideration of this, Hazlett released his attachment lien, and credited the $500 on the judgment. McCoy claims that he paid, and that Hazlett received, the cash and note in full satisfaction of the judgment, and that the latter agreed to cancel and discharge it of record. This Hazlett denies. Afterwards Hazlett brought suit on the note before a justice of the peace, and was beaten, McCoy testifying in such action that the judgment was still in force to the amount of the note, and that the plaintiff had levied on property to satisfy it. Hazlett took no appeal from this judgment of the justice. The note itself was filed with the clerk of the district court, never having been paid by McCoy. This action is brought by McCoy to restrain Hazlett from proceeding to collect the $149.29 as balance due upon the original judgment. A temporary restraining order was made, but, upon final hearing, the district court found in favor of Hazlett, and discharged the order. To reverse this ruling this proceeding in error is brought. It seems to us that there is but a single question in the case, and that one of fact, and one upon which there was contradictory testimony. Was it agreed between McCoy and Hazlett that the $500 and the note should be in full payment and satisfaction of the judgment? If it was, the restraining order should have been made perpetual; if not, it was properly discharged. The mere giving and receiving of a note of the debtor does not operate as a discharge of a pre-existing judgment. This will not be questioned. Upon the trial Hazlett testified positively that he never agreed to take this note in satisfaction. McCoy testified to the contrary. McCoy's testimony before the justice tended to support Hazlett's testimony here. *The fact of Hazlett's bringing suit on the note tended to support McCoy's evidence. There was no other testimony bearing upon this question. The district court having upon this evidence found in favor of Hazlett, and it being ample to support such finding, well-settled rules of procedure in this court forbid us to interfere with the decision.

The judgment will be affirmed.

ISAAC SHELLABARGER and another v. J. W. BISHOP and others.

January Term, 1875.

Mechanic's Lien: Law of 1872: Filing Statement: Time. Under the mechanic's lien law of 1872 a party furnishing materials for the erection of a building had four months from the completion of the building in which to file his statement for a lien.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Shawnee district court.

Shellabarger & Leidigh sold and delivered to Bishop, in October, 1872, lumber to be used in the erection of a building on real estate then owned by Bishop. On the first of November, 1872, Bishop gave S. & L. his note for the lumber. Said building was completed in December, 1872. On the twenty-first of March, 1873, S. & L., the note being unpaid, filed their statement, under the mechanic's lien law then in force, for a lien on said building and lands for the amount due on said note. In October, 1873, S. & L. commenced their action to foreclose said lien, making Bishop and a subsequent purchaser of the premises defendants. Trial at the June term, 1874. The district court held that, as the lien statement had not been filed within four months from the delivery of the lumber, no lien had been acquired, and that plaintiffs were entitled only to a judgment in personam against Bishop. Judgment accordingly.

*433 *N. C. McFarland and J. G. Slonecker, for plaintiffs.

The lien law of 1872, § 3, says, "Such statement shall be filed within four months after the completion of the building," which is decisive of the question, unless the law is held to mean differently from what it says. The completion of the building means the completion of the whole building; and the lien may be filed within the time limited after the completion of the whole. Squires v. Fithian, 27 Mo. 139; Holden v. Winslow, 18 Pa. St. 160.

Martin & Case, for defendants.

Under the mechanic's lien law of 1872 a person who furnishes lumber for the erection of a building, in order to avail himself of the provisions of said law, must file his lien within four months from the time of delivering the last item of lumber. Sections 2 and 3 of said act. The four-months limitation commences to run whenever the contract between the parties is completed. The contract is completed when the last item of material is furnished. This is the construction which other statutes of limitation have received; and we cannot conceive of any reason why we should depart from all analogy to give this statute a different interpretation, nor can we understand how a better or juster rule can be made. Bartlett v. Kingan, 19 Pa. St. 341; Stine v. Austin, 9 Mo. 558; Viti v. Dixon, 12 Mo. 479; Pond v. Wyman, 15 Mo. 176.

BREWER, J. The question in this case is on the construction to be given to a portion of the mechanic's lien law of 1872. The plaintiffs in error furnished lumber to be used in the erection of a building belonging to one of the defendants. They filed their papers for a lien within four months from the completion of the building, but not within four months of the time of delivering the lumber. Have they a lien? This is purely a question of the construction of the statute. The first section provides that "any mechanic or other person who shall, under contract, * * * perform labor or furnish *434 material for erecting, altering, or repairing any building, or the appurtenances of any building, or any erection or improvement, or shall furnish or perform labor in putting up any fixtures or machinery in or attachment to any such building or improvement, or plant and grow any trees, vines, and plants, or hedge fence, or shall build a stone fence, or shall perform labor or furnish material for erecting, altering, or repairing any fence on any tract or piece of land, shall have a lien upon the whole tract," etc. Section 3, after describing the statement that must be prepared, adds: "Such statement shall be filed within four months after the completion of the building, improvements, or repairs, or the furnishing or putting up of fixtures or machinery, or the planting of such hedge, or the building of such fence, or the furnishing of such material or labor for the building of such fence."

It seems to us that the only time given from which to date, in a case like the one at bar, is the completion of the building. The latter part of the quotation is of course inapplicable, referring, as it does, specifically to fixtures, machinery, hedge, and fence, so that we must look to the first clause. That says, "after the completion of the building, improvements, or repairs." Now, in this there is nothing which, by any sort of fair construction, can be held to refer to the delivery of material. It obviously refers to the completion of the work for which the material was furnished, and upon which the labor was performed. If it was a matter of repairs, the time dated from the completion of the repairs, and not from the time each separate contractor completed his part of the repairs. And the same, if it was the erection of a building. It is true that this may in some cases give a long time in which a secret lien is preserved, and that the law looks with disfavor upon secret liens. But with the wisdom of such legislation we have nothing to do. The legislature prescribes the time, and we are not authorized to limit it. This construction gains some little support from the last clause of the quotation from section 3, that in reference to the building of a fence. Here the furnishing of the material, as well as the doing of the labor, is made a point from *435 which to date the four monthls. So that *the matter was before the attention of the legislature, and for reasons which we do not know a distinction was made between fences and buildings. The authorities cited from Missouri and Pennsylvania have little application, as the terms of their statutes are different.

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WILLIAM H. CLARK v. WASHINGTON LIBBEY.

January Term, 1875.

Indian Lands: Ottawa Treaty of 1862: Lands Inalienable for Five Years. Lands patented to the chiefs, councilmen, and head-men of the Ottawa Indians, under the first clause of article 3 of the treaty with said Indians, proclaimed July 28, 1862, were inalienable to others than Ottawa Indians during the five years succeeding the ratification of such treaty.

Error from Franklin district court.

Ejectment, brought by Clark, for 160 acres of land. The case is stated in the opinion. Libbey had judgment at the November term, 1873, of the district court.

C. B. Mason and A. W. Benson, for plaintiff.

Welsh & Meigs, for defendant.

BREWER, J. This was an action of ejectment for a tract of land *436 in Franklin county. Both parties claimed title under *the same patentee, one William Hurr, an Ottawa Indian. Defendant holds under a deed executed December 1, 1865; and the question is whether this deed was void under article 7 of the Ottawa treaty of 1862, (12 U. S. St. at Large, 1239.) There is no dispute but that if this deed is void plaintiff's title is good, and he ought to recover. It was conceded that William Hurr, the patentee, was a councilman and head-man of the Ottawa Indians, and that the lands in controversy were patented under the provisions of article 3 of the said treaty. The treaty provided in its first article that the Ottawa tribe should be dissolved at the expiration of five years from its ratification, and that the individual Ottawas should be deemed and declared to be citizens of the United States from and after that time. Article 3 reads as follows: "It being the wish of said tribe of Ottawas to remunerate several of the chiefs, councilmen, and head-men of the tribe, for their services to them many years without pay, it is hereby stipulated that five sections of land are reserved and set apart for that purpose, to be apportioned among the said chiefs, councilmen, and head-men as the members of the tribes shall in full council determine; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the interior to issue patents in fee-simple of said lands, when located and apportioned to said Indians." Said article also grants to these parties, and to all heads of families, 160 acres, and to all other members of the tribe, 80 acres each. By article 6, twenty thousand acres are given for the endowment, and one section for the site, of a school. Article 7 provides that ten acres shall be set apart for the Ottawa Baptist Church, and eighty acres to each of the two children of a former missionary among the Ottawas, which last two tracts are to be selected and located as the other allotments provided for are to be selected and located, and to be "inalienable, the same as the land allotted to the Ottawas." It then continues as follows: "And all the above-mentioned selections of lands shall be made by the agent of the tribe under the direction of the secretary of the interior. And plats and records of all the selections and locations shall be made, and, upon their completion and approval, proper patents by *437 the United States *shall be issued to each individual member of the tribe, and person entitled, for the lands selected and allotted to them, in which it shall be stipulated that no Indian, except as herein provided, to whom the same may be issued, shall alienate or incumber the land allotted to him or her in any manner until they shall, by the terms of this treaty, become a citizen of the United States; and any conveyance or incumbrance of said lands, done or suffered except as aforesaid by an Ottawa Indian, of the lands allotted to him or her, made before they shall become a citizen, shall be null and void."

Does this apply to the lands patented under article 3? It seems to us that it does. It says: "All the above-mentioned selections." Upon what shall be founded an exception in favor of this selection? It must refer to lands selected under article 3, because it speaks of allotments to Indians, and only in that article are such allotments provided for. Indeed, there are no personal allotments provided for except in article 3, and those to the children of the missionary, and as to them we have seen that it is expressly mentioned that they are to be inalienable, the same as the allotments to the Ottawas. Referring, then, necessarily to selections under article 3, and declaring that it embraces "all the above-mentioned selections," it must include this, unless there be something to make this an exception. It is said that the restriction contemplates some exception, because it says, "no Indian, except as herein provided," and that there can be no other exception than these selections for the chiefs, etc. The use of the term, "except as herein provided," would naturally refer to some express exception, and not to one arising by mere implication; and we find in the treaty, as originally made by the Indians, the express exception attached to the first article was a proviso "that John T. Jones, now a member of the Ottawas, being an educated and experienced man, * * * is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, exempt from the restrictions hereinafter provided concerning the purchase, alienation, or incumbrance of the Ottawa lands." Here, then, was the express exception, and the only express exception,—one which might properly be said to be *438 "herein provided." When the *treaty was presented to the senate this proviso was stricken out, and the treaty as thus amended finally ratified. Striking out the proviso to which this term of exception could alone properly apply did not have the effect of creating an exception elsewhere, but left the term nugatory and meaningless.

Again, it is said that patents are to be issued for these lands in fee-simple, and this implies a full title, free from any restrictions upon alienation. This expression, at least when used in Indian treaties, carries no such necessary implication. See the briefs of counsel and the opinion of the court in the case of Blue-jacket v. County of Johnson, 3 Kan. *299, and the subsequent opinion of the supreme court of the United States reversing this case, (The Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. 737.) Again, it is said that this restriction only applies to selections made by the agent, and that the selections for the chiefs, etc., were to be made by the Indian counsel. We do not so understand the treaty. The seventh article declares that "all the above-mentioned selections of lands shall be made by the agent," while article 3 does not provide for any selection. It says that five sections are to be apportioned among the chiefs, etc., as the council shall determine. This we understand to mean that the council shall determine the amount each chief and councilman shall receive. It also provides that the secretary shall issue patents "of said lands when located and apportioned." The location is not given to the council,—only the apportionment.

It follows from these considerations that the restrictions of article 7 applied to this land, and that the deed under which the defendant holds is null and void. The judgment of the district court must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring.

*DANIEL HORVILLE v. LEVI L. NORTHRUP.

January Term. 1875.

Bills and Notes: Principal and Surety. The maker of a negotiable promissory note is prima facie the principal debtor, and the payee and indorser the surety, to the holder thereof, in respect to the indebtedness evidenced by the note.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Allen district court.

Northrup brought suit against Faulkner as maker, and Northrup as indorser, of the following note:

"$1,339.45. .

IOLA, KANSAS, July 22, 1872.

"Ninety days after date I promise to pay to the order of Daniel Horville thirteen hundred thirty-nine and 45-100 dollars, at the bank-house of L. L. Northrup, Iola, Kansas, for value received, with interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum after maturity.

"JAMES FAULKNER,

"Executor of Estate of Gabriel Dressback, Deceased."

This note was indorsed, "Daniel Horville," and it was duly protested for non-payment, and notice given, October 23, 1873. Defendants answered separately. Horville's answer was a general denial; and, second, "that when he indorsed the said note to the plaintiff he did so for the accommodation and as surety for defendant Faulkner, and that no consideration for such indorsement passed from defendant Faulkner or said plaintiff to him (Horville) therefor, and that there was no consideration whatever for said indorsement, and that said note was made, indorsed, and delivered to plaintiff as one and the same transaction," etc., alleging plaintiff's knowledge of all the facts. Reply, general denial. Trial at November term, 1873. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff against both defendants for $1,602.19.

Thurston & Keplinger, for plaintiff in error.

J. B. F. Cates, for defendant in error.

*440 *BREWER, J. Defendant in error sued one James Faulkner and plaintiff in error upon a promissory note. Faulkner was the maker, and plaintiff in error the payee and indorser. The indorsement was in blank, and the error complained of is in the refusal of the court to permit the plaintiff in error to show by parol testimony that he was liable simply as surety and not as indorser on the note. As the record comes before us, we think no error is apparent. It was proved that demand and notice had been legally made and given, so that Horville's liability as indorser was fixed beyond dispute. Nor was there at any time any effort to question the fact of due demand and notice. But during the introduction of the evidence for the defendant, the counsel for plaintiff and Horville discussed before the court the question whether Horville could introduce parol testimony "to show that his liability on the note sued on was that of surety merely," and the court decided "that the rule of law which did not permit parol evidence to vary or contradict the terms of written instruments admitted of no exceptions except upon equitable grounds, as in case of fraud, accident, mistake, and the like, and that in this case defendant Horville, not having brought himself within any of these equitable exceptions, could not introduce evidence to vary or contradict the terms of the contract sued on." It would be a sufficient disposition of this matter to say that it appears by the record to have been a discussion upon no actual present question before the court, and a decision followed by no exception.

But, waiving these suggestions, and considering the ruling as properly before us, we think, as the case stands, it must be sustained. We confess to a little embarrassment in determining in what manner to construe the claim of counsel. It cannot, of course, be that he claims that Horville could show that he was, as surety, liable on the note, without any proof of demand and notice,—the ordinary steps to charge an indorser,—for that would be a claim it were idle *441 to make, as the record states that due proofs *of these matters had already been made. And, besides, it would be a claim against Horville's interest,—a waiver of any objection that could be made to the sufficiency of the proof already made upon these matters, as well as of any counter-testimony he might have thereon. It would be a concession of one of the points otherwise necessary to be proved to establish his liability. On the other hand, if the claim was simply that, after the liability of Horville was fixed by proof of demand and notice, then he could show that, as between himself and Faulkner, the latter was the principal debtor, and himself only the surety, the law implied that to be the relation of the parties, and no testimony was necessary to change this implied relation. While it may not be correct to say that the contract of indorsement is merely one of suretyship, for "one who is technically a surety on promissory paper is generally an original promisor, and primarily liable, which an indorser never is," yet the relation of indebtedness of the maker and indorser of a note to the holder is prima facie that of principal and surety. Whatever releases the maker discharges the indorser. Any new contract with the maker upon valid consideration, which changes the nature and extent of his liability, releases the indorser. In Byles on Bills (marginal page 190) it is said that "the acceptor is the principal debtor, and all the other parties are sureties for him, liable only on his default. But though the other parties are, in respect to the acceptor, sureties only, they are not, as between themselves, merely co-sureties, but each prior party is a principal in respect of each subsequent party." And, again, on the succeeding page: "As the acceptor is at law in all cases the principal debtor on a bill, so the maker is at law the principal debtor on a note, though it be given by the maker to the payee without consideration, and the holder take it with notice of absence of consideration. The indorsers of a note severally stand as principals or sureties in the same situation as the indorsers of a bill." So that the relation which, by implication of law from the note itself, Horville sustained to this indebtedness, *442 was precisely that which he claimed the *right to show to the court by parol testimony. The ruling of the court, therefore, whether correct or not, was in his favor, and he has no grounds of complaint therefor in this court.

After this ruling of the court, Horville asked leave to amend his answer so as to allege that he signed his name on the back of the note under the impression that the note was payable to the order of the plaintiff, and not, as was the fact, to the order of himself. No showing was made upon this application, and we cannot see that the court abused its discretion in denying it. A good deal of testimony was admitted as to the circumstances attending the execution of this note, and as to its consideration. Upon that testimony, and independent of the instrument itself, it may be doubtful whether either party could properly be said to be the security of the other. This note was given in renewal of a prior note, and there appear to have been several renewals. The note first given was by Gabriel Dressback as maker, and Horville as security. The consideration of this was a loan from plaintiff to Dressback. The sole consideration for each succeeding note was the preceding. Intermediate the first and the last, Dressback died, and Faulkner was appointed his executor. Faulkner signed this note, describing himself as executor, and evidently supposing he was simply binding the estate, but really rendering himself personally liable. Was either Faulkner or Horville then in fact the surety of the other, or were they both simply co-sureties for an unnamed principal, the estate of Gabriel Dressback? We forbear pursuing this inquiry further, for Faulkner is interested in the question, and should properly be brought before the court before it is determined.

The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

*443 *H. D. SHEPARD and another v. M. B. HAAS and another.

January Term, 1875.

1. Evidence: Contemporaneous Parol Agreement. Where a written agreement is obscure and uncertain, and clearly does not cover all the points which would ordinarily be settled between parties in an arrangement concerning the subject-matter of such agreement, it is error to refuse to permit inquiry as to whether there was or was not some independent contemporaneous parol agreement concerning it.<sup>1</sup>
2. Error: Sufficient Assignment of. An assignment of error in these words: "That the court erred in ruling out the evidence offered by A. B., [the plaintiff in error,] on the trial of said action, to which said A. B. at the time excepted,"—is sufficient.

Error from Osage district court.

Action by M. B. Haas and H. B. Haas, as partners, against Shepard & Playford, as partners. Trial at the November term, 1873. Verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and Shepard & Playford bring the case here.

James Rogers, for plaintiffs in error.

It was not irrelevant and incompetent to introduce verbal testimony to show what the contract between Haas & Co. and Wheat was relative to the purchase of the note and mortgage; that the papers called a "contract" are so vague, indefinite, and uncertain, of themselves, that they are meaningless without explanation; and that the court should have allowed them to be explained. The papers, of themselves, are only receipts; but they refer to an agreement which may be conditional, or positive, or both, and which plaintiffs in error had a right to prove in support of their set-off.

Ellis Lewis, for defendants in error.

The petition in error only assigns as error "that the said court, *444 in ruling out the evidence offered by the said H. D. *S. and J. J. P., on the trial of the said action, to which they at the time excepted." This is not a good assignment under the statute. Civil Code, § 544. The assignment of errors relied upon must be specific. Wright v. Potter, 38 Ind. 61; Waggoner v. Liston, 37 Ind. 357; Jolly v. Terre Haute Drawbridge Co., 9 Ind. 419.

Wheat and Haas & Co. had entered into a written contract in reference to a particular matter, and whatever rights Wheat had acquired under that written contract with Haas & Co. he might assign, and nothing more; and the court did nothing but "exclude parol evidence tending to vary a written contract." Such evidence can be given to explain a written contract, and Wheat was allowed to do this. A written instrument may be both a receipt and a contract. Anything that needed explanation was explained. But when plaintiffs in error offered to show a contract different from the writing, it was properly excluded.

<sup>1</sup>See Babcock v. Deford, ante, *408, and note. *A contract, which is not required by statute to be in writing, may be partly expressed in writing and partly in an unwritten understanding between the parties; and, if so, such understanding may be proved by parol. St. Louis, L. & W. Ry. Co. v. Maddox, 18 Kan. 546.

BREWER, J. Defendants in error brought an action on an account for merchandise sold and delivered to plaintiffs in error. The correctness of this account was not disputed, but plaintiffs in error claimed an offset as follows: They alleged, in substance, that Haas & Co. (the defendants in error) sold, and agreed to assign, to one Joseph Wheat a note and mortgage of the value of $351.25; that the money paid by Wheat therefor was the money of H. D. Shepard & Co., and that all claims for the money and the note and mortgage were assigned to plaintiffs in error, and that defendants in error refused to return the money, or assign the note and mortgage. Upon the trial it appeared that these papers were executed at the time of the negotiations between Haas & Co. and Wheat:

"BURLINGAME, August 13, 1872.

"Rec'd of Joseph Wheat one draft at sight, dated August 13, 1872, for $200, on Messrs. Gregory, Strader & Co., Kansas City, Mo., which, if said draft of $200 is paid and promptly honored, and be placed to the credit of Joseph Wheat, in full of the account of Craig & Wheat.

"HAAS & Co.

"Otherwise this receipt to be of no effect, and void.

*445 *"Which, if said property is foreclosed, to be bought by Haas & Co., and make a deed to Joseph Wheat.

"August 13, 1872.

HAAS & Co.

"The expense to be paid of foreclosing and costs by Jos. Wheat."

Upon the presentation of these papers (for they are spoken of as two exhibits) the court ruled out all evidence tending to show any agreement between the parties other than as therein expressed, and this is the alleged error. The direct question was asked the witness Wheat whether there was any other and further agreement between Haas & Co. and himself than is expressed in these writings; but the court sustained an objection to the question. It appeared from the evidence that the property referred to in the exhibits was a mortgage on some property in Newton, Kansas. The witness Wheat testified that the last clause in the second exhibit referred to the costs of foreclosing this mortgage. He was also asked at whose option this mortgage was to be foreclosed, and whether the mortgage was to be foreclosed without his request, and whether Haas & Co. were to do anything in case there was no foreclosure. All these questions were objected to, and the objections sustained. In these rulings we think the court erred. Doubtless these exhibits are something more than receipts. They are, in some parts at least, evidently contracts, and thus within the rule which forbids parol testimony to vary or contradict written agreements. But the existence of a written contract does not always exclude the possibility of a contemporaneous parol agreement bearing upon the same general subject-matter, yet referring to some point or phrase of it not expressed in the writing. And this written agreement, obscure and uncertain as it is, evidently does not reach to all the matters of ordinary consideration in a transaction like the one at bar. Without noticing others, it is enough to refer to the question at whose option the foreclosure was to be had. Upon this the written agreement is silent, and nothing can be implied from the language used concerning it; yet it was a proper matter of agreement, and one ordinarily determined in such an agreement.

*446 But whatever were *the facts of the case, it is possible that there was some contemporaneous parol agreement, not contradicting nor varying the written, and yet having some bearing upon the matters in issue. The court refused to let the witness testify whether there was or not, and in this erred. It is true that the first part of the exhibits speaks of the receipt of the $200 as in full payment of an account; but it is also evident, from the remaining portion, that either in consequence or as a part consideration of the payment the witness Wheat had some rights in a note and mortgage in the possession of Haas & Co. What the extent of those rights was, is, from the papers, doubtful. Perhaps it would have been made clearer if the rejected testimony had been admitted.

But it is insisted by counsel for defendant in error that the assignment of error is insufficient. The assignment is "that the said court erred in ruling out the evidence offered by the said H. D. Shepard and J. J. Playford, on the trial of said action, to which they at the time excepted." And it is objected that it does not specify the particular evidence whose rejection is assigned for error. Notwithstanding the authorities cited from Indiana by the learned counsel, it seems but a necessary deduction from questions already decided in this court to hold the assignment sufficient. Da Lee v. Blackburn, 11 Kan. *190.

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

F. W. NEITZEL v. CITY OF CONCORDIA.

January Term, 1875.

1. Appeal: Criminal Action: Municipal Corporation: Prosecutions under City Ordinances: Appeal. A prosecution in a municipal court under a city ordinance for a matter which is penal by the laws of the state, or made penal because of its supposed evil consequences to society, is a criminal action; and if after an appeal to the district court, and a
*447 judgment therein, it is sought *to bring the case to this court for review, it can be done only by appeal, and not by proceeding in error.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———. Whether the rule would be different if the prosecution was simply to enforce a private right of the city is a question left open for further consideration.

Error from Cloud district court.

At the August term, 1873, of the district court, Neitzel was convicted of "selling, and consenting to be sold, bartered, and drank upon premises occupied by him, in the city of Concordia, fermented, vinous, and distilled liquors, by the glass, without having obtained a license from said city, and contrary to the ordinance of the city of Concordia in such case made and provided." The action was commenced in the police court in the name of the city of Concordia as plaintiff. Neitzel brings the case to this court by "petition in error," and the city moves to dismiss such petition.

C. K. Wells and F. W. Sturgis, in support of the motion.

BREWER, J. Neitzel was convicted in the police court of the city of Concordia upon a charge of selling liquors without a license, and fined one dollar. He appealed to the district court, where he was again found guilty, and sentenced to pay a like fine. This judgment he seeks to reverse in this court, and he has brought it here by case made and petition in error; and the first point made is that this is a criminal case, and can be brought to this court only by appeal, and by notice to the clerk and attorney. No notice appears in the record; and it is well settled that notice to the clerk is essential to perfect the removal of a criminal case to this court for review. State v. King, 1 Kan. *466; Carr v. State, Id. *331; State v. Brandon, 6 Kan. *243; State v. Baird, 9 Kan. *60; State v. Boyle, 10 Kan. *113. The only question, then, is whether a prosecution for selling liquor state two distinct and separate causes of action: the first for a recovery of a money judgment upon the promissory note set *451 forth in the petition, and the second to avail *himself of the contract and bargain verbally made in reference to placing the contracts in escrow. He relies upon the note as the first cause of action, evidenced by writing; and for the second he relies upon the verbal contract made at the time the railroad contracts were placed in the hands of Playter. He separately states and numbers each. He demands a separate judgment in each: the first an ordinary money judgment upon a promissory note; the second a judgment or decree as in actions to foreclose a mortgage. But this is error. There was no mortgage; hence only one cause of action; and the court, on motion of plaintiff in error, should have stricken out the second count, so called, as surplusage.

The record contains all the evidence, and also a special finding of the facts by the court. Let us summarize these facts: One Kerchner owned the several railroad land contracts set forth in the record. These contracts he sells and assigns to Curtis for the sum of $450. Curtis pays $200 cash, and executes and delivers his promissory note to Kerchner for the $250 remaining unpaid. Curtis, to secure this note, talked of executing a mortgage on the land mentioned in these contracts, but desired to avoid the expense of the mortgage. The parties were then informed that this expense could be avoided by a delivery and placing in escrow these several railroad contracts; that this would constitute a mortgage. The contracts are so delivered, and with an agreement that if Curtis paid the note when due he should receive the contracts, otherwise they were to be delivered to Kerchner. The petition alleges a forfeiture, and there seems some dispute about it as to whether, upon failure to pay the note, there was to be a forfeiture, or cancellation of the assignment to Curtis. But the court settles this question by simply finding that the contracts were placed in the hands of Playter as security for the payment of the note, and to be delivered to Kerchner on Curtis' failure. Kerchner transfers the Curtis note to Buckley, with his supposed "lien" on said contracts as security. Now, these railroad contracts are not title papers to this land. They convey no interest in the realty. *452 They are bare and *naked promises to sell in the future,—not a present sale. The contracts pass no title,—no estate. So the conditional transfer by Kerchner of these contracts to Curtis passed no title, estate, or interest in the land to Curtis, and constituted no "mortgage" security for Curtis' note, either in the hands of Kerchner or Buckley. The idea of calling these railroad contracts title papers, and depositing them in escrow, and foreclosing as an equitable mortgage on real estate, would deserve, it seems to me, to be treated by courts and lawyers with ridicule. The so-called second cause of action, then, performs no office whatever. It asks to foreclose nothing. Then, if these contracts gave no interest in the land, how stands the case? The contracts were by Playter turned over to Buckley, Kerchner's assignee. This changed no right. Buckley held Curtis' note, and he held these contracts as "collateral security for what they were worth,"—rather precarious security. But Buckley undoubtedly had a clear right to the possession of these contracts, and the court would have had the right to order and direct a sale of them, subject to all the rights of the railroad company. The only difficult question in the whole case arises on his security, and his remedy thereon. If it was goods and chattels, there is no doubt about his right to sell for payment of the debt. If it was real estate, the right is equally clear. On these two propositions there can be no doubt. If the contracts appeared to be utterly valueless, then of course no order would be made. But they have been treated by the parties to this transaction as of the value of $450. The judgment should have been for the face of the note and interest, and an order directing the sale of these contracts in the same manner as personalty is sold on execution, and the proceeds applied first to payment of the costs of suit, and next to Buckley's debt and interest, and the overplus, if any, paid to Curtis, and, if contracts failed to bring amount of Buckley's claim and costs, then judgment for balance against Curtis.

Another error which we think Curtis justly complained of is the *453 allowance of notarial protest costs and damages. The *notarial protest is void, because there was no notice served under it. There is no evidence in this record showing any notice served, or that one was ever even made out. We have a statute making a proper notarial protest evidence of demand and refusal. But demand and refusal is one thing, and the service of notice another and very different thing; and the interpolation of a statement in this protest that notices were left in some post-office proves nothing. It is not evidence of any fact except as made so by the statute, and the statute does not make it evidence of notices, or of the service thereof, and the court does not find any such notice, yet renders judgment for 6 per cent. damages.

Curtis knew that the title papers had been conditionally delivered to Playter from him, (Curtis,) and that the delivery would become absolute at any time on payment of the purchase money. It is not denied that Kerchner owned the equitable title to the said land. It is not denied that he sold the same to Curtis. It is not denied that Curtis, at the time this action was brought, was in possession of said land. It was not claimed that Curtis had sold the said land to any person. Therefore this judgment and order could not interfere with the rights or equities of any third person. It was purely a question between the grantee and the assignee of the grantor. Buckley was a bona fide holder of the said note given by Curtis for the purchase money. The grantor and grantee expressly stipulated that this purchase money should be a lien on this land. Courts always carry out the intention of the parties to a contract where it can be done.

The judgment and order works no damage to Curtis. It is simply the result of his agreement.

W. C. Webb, also for defendant in error.

The value of Kerchner's title, under his contract, is not a question before the court. Kerchner and Curtis regarded it as valuable, *454 and negotiated accordingly. Afterwards Kerchner *and Buckley regarded it as valuable, notwithstanding the rights and equities of Curtis under the assignment to him, and they negotiated with that understanding. Kerchner is not interested in the contest between Curtis and Buckley. Curtis does not appear (from brief of plaintiff in error) to object to the judgment in personam, and his counsel does not seem to claim that Curtis can have the full benefit of the assignment to him until he pays the $250, (for which said personal judgment was rendered;) but he complains of the decree of the court by which his interest as assignee is held as security for the payment of said debt. There was no error in the decree. Curtis acquired Kerchner's right and title, subject to the payment of the $250 note, in like manner as if Kerchner (having title) had sold by title bond; and the assignment, being deposited in escrow, had the same effect as a title-bond, where the equitable title passes to the vendee, (Curtis,) and the legal title is retained in the vendor (Kerchner) as security for the payment of the unpaid purchase money. The vendor (Kerchner) thus holding the title, (that which the parties have between themselves acted upon and treated as title,) he sells that title to Buckley, and of course could sell only such rights and interests as remained in him. One of these rights was to foreclose the equities of Curtis if Curtis did not pay the note. Such foreclosure is in the nature of a mortgage foreclosure, requiring that the amount of the debt shall be ascertained, followed by a decree that if said debt is not paid, etc., the interest of the debtor (Curtis) in the land shall be sold. Such is legally this case. Curtis has no cause for complaint.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action on a promissory note, and to foreclose a certain supposed equitable lien on certain real estate. The principal question involved in the case is whether any such lien has any actual existence. Some other questions, however, are suggested by counsel, which we shall also consider.

*455 1. Upon the point made by counsel for plaintiff in error *(defendant below) that there were two causes of action attempted to be stated in the petition of the plaintiff below, while only one was in fact stated, and that the court below erred in overruling a motion of the plaintiff in error to strike out the second supposed cause of action, and also erred in overruling a demurrer of the plaintiff in error to said second count, see Andrews v. Alcorn, 13 Kan. *351. That case was a much stronger case for reversal upon such a point than this, but still we held in that case, as we must hold in this, that no substantial error was committed by the court below.

2. The main question in the case is, do the facts of this case constitute an equitable lien upon said real estate? The facts are substantially as follows: The Missouri River, Fort Scott & Gulf Railroad Company sold a certain piece of land to Benjamin Kerchner. The purchase money was not all paid down, and no deed of conveyance was executed, but the parties reduced to writing the nature and character of their transaction. Both parties signed said writing and the instrument embodying the same was then placed in the possession of said Kerchner. The instrument provided for Kerchner taking possession of the land, cultivating it, making improvements thereon, paying the deferred payments for the land, and the company making a deed of conveyance to him or his assignee. Afterwards Kerchner sold said land to Leander Curtis, plaintiff in error, received a portion of the purchase money down, and took a promissory note for the balance. Kerchner himself, having no deed for the land, merely assigned his contract with the railroad company to Curtis. It was suggested that Kerchner should take a mortgage on the land from Curtis to secure the payment of said promissory note, but the parties in lieu thereof finally agreed to deposit said written instrument which Kerchner had received from the railroad company with a third person, to be held by such third person until Curtis should pay said promissory note, and then to be delivered (with the assignment thereon) to Curtis. The parties understood that said written instrument was to be held by said third person as a *456 security for the payment of said promissory note, and to answer the purposes of a mortgage. Afterwards Kerchner sold and assigned said promissory note to Robert R. Buckley, defendant in error. This note was not paid at maturity, was protested, etc., and then Buckley commenced this action against both Kerchner and Curtis, asking for a judgment on the note for the amount thereof, with interest, protest fees, and damages, and also asked to have said land sold to satisfy said judgment. Kerchner was not served with summons, and the trial proceeded against Curtis alone. Judgment was rendered by the court below against Curtis, as asked for by Buckley, and Curtis now asks to have that portion of the judgment reversed which ordered the land to be sold, and which gave to Buckley protest fees and damages.

It seems to be admitted that the railroad company had a good title to said land at the time they sold it to Kerchner; but it is claimed by the plaintiff in error that neither Kerchner nor Curtis ever had any title, legal or equitable. Whether either of them ever had any such title or not, we do not think it is necessary now to decide. Kerchner had a legal and valid contract with the railroad company whereby he could obtain title, both legal and equitable, merely by fulfilling his contract. When he complied with all the conditions of said contract, he would surely have the equitable title; and, having the equitable title, he could surely compel the railroad company to convey to him the legal title. Whatever Kerchner's interest in the land may have been, he had the power, at his own option, to obtain a complete and absolute title. This interest he transferred to Curtis, reserving merely a lien thereon for the payment of said promissory note. This lien, of course, does not amount in law to any estate or title, either legal or equitable; for even a mortgage in this state does not amount to any estate or title, either legal or equitable, (Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. *385;) and an equitable lien of this kind is probably of no higher character than a mortgage. It is claimed by counsel for plaintiff in error, substantially, that an equitable lien on real estate, *457 where it has any real existence, is an interest in land, and cannot be created merely by parol; that the statute of frauds (Gen. St. 505, § 5) prohibits such a thing. All of this we agree to; but still the statute of frauds does not attempt to prohibit the creation of equitable liens by operation of law, nor does any other statute. Stevens v. Chadwick, 10 Kan. *406. Such a lien should, of course, be in accordance with the contract and understanding of the parties affected by it, but still it may sometimes result, by operation of law, from the transactions of the parties, almost wholly independent of the contract that may be made between them. It results, however, from the whole transaction, including all the contracts, agreements, and understandings of the parties, parol or otherwise. The lien in the present case was not created merely by parol. It resulted, by operation of law, from the whole transaction between the parties. It can hardly be said, however, to have been created at all when Kerchner sold his interest in the land to Curtis. It was more properly reserved by Kerchner at that time as a part of the interest which he already had.

3. The evidence shows that the note was protested for non-payment by authority of Buckley, the owner thereof. This was sufficient. But the evidence does not show that any notice of the demand of payment, or the failure to pay, was ever given to Kerchner, the indorser of the note. Indeed, there was no legal evidence even tending to prove this, offered to be introduced. While the statute provides that "a notarial protest shall be evidence of a demand and refusal to pay a bond, promissory note, or bill of exchange, at the time and in the manner stated in such protest, until the contrary is shown," (Gen. St. 117, § 18,) yet no statute provides that such protest shall be any evidence that the indorser ever received any notice of such demand and refusal. And, in the absence of such a statute, no mere statement of the notary, in his notarial protest, that he gave the required notice, can be any evidence of such fact, or, indeed, of any fact material to the case. And where no such notice has been *458 given, and the indorser, through want of such notice, has not been made liable on the note, no protest damages can be allowed. Noyes v. White, 9 Kan. *640. The court below, in this case, allowed protest damages, and for this error the judgment must be reversed and new trial ordered, unless the plaintiff below will remit the protest damages. If the plaintiff below shall remit protest damages, then the judgment will be affirmed.

The costs of this court will be equally divided between the parties. (All the justices concurring.)

MARY V. SANDERSON and others v. JAMES STREETER and others.

January Term, 1875.

Fraud: Voluntary Conveyances: When Upheld. Where G., who holds the title to certain real estate, conveys the same to J., and J. holds the title over four years, and then conveys the same to the wife of G., and G. was not indebted at the time these conveyances were executed, and there was no intention on the part of any of the parties to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor of G., prior or subsequent, and said conveyances were duly acknowledged and immediately recorded, and some time subsequent thereto G. contracts a debt, held, that the real estate thus conveyed is not liable for said debt, although G. may now be insolvent, and the conveyances may have been voluntary, and without any consideration.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Davis district court.

At the November term, 1872, of the district court said court found and decreed that a certain deed of conveyance from Jonathan Sanderson to Mary V. Sanderson was made without any consideration whatever passing from the said Mary V. to the said Jonathan; that at the time of said conveyance the said Jonathan Sanderson held said real estate in his name as the trustee of George Sanderson; that *459 said conveyance by Jonathan Sanderson to said Mary V. was made, at the instance and request of said George, in fraud, to cover up and conceal the same from his creditors, and that said Mary V. holds said real estate as a naked trustee of the said George Sanderson, who is the equitable owner; that said real estate is subject to the payment of a certain judgment for $622, and interest and costs, recovered by the plaintiffs herein, Streeter and Rizer, against said George Sanderson and Evander Light; and that unless the said defendants should pay the said judgment, interest, and costs within ten days from the date of such decree, said lands and tenements should be sold to satisfy said judgment. Defendants Mary V. and George Sanderson bring the case here on error.

*VALENTINE, J. In September, 1872, James Streeter and Robert O. Rizer were the owners of a certain judgment which they had previously recovered against George Sanderson and Evander Light. This judgment they could not collect in the ordinary way, or on execution, on account of the insolvency of Sanderson & Light. So they, therefore, commenced this action against Sanderson & Light and Mary V. Sanderson for the purpose of having certain real estate (the title to which was in Mary V. Sanderson) declared subject to the payment of said judgment. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendants, as plaintiffs in error, now bring the case to this court. The property which the court below ordered to be subject to the payment of said judgment was the undivided half of lots 12, 13, and 14, in block 27, in Junction City. The order of the court below was made upon the ground that the property really belonged to George Sanderson, and not to Mary V. Sanderson, (his wife,) and that the title to the property was kept in her name merely for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding creditors.

*461 It appears from the record that in *1866 the title to the property was in fact in George Sanderson; that on June 13, 1866, he and said Mary V., his wife, conveyed the same for the expressed consideration of $965 to Jonathan Sanderson. The deed of conveyance was acknowledged on the same day, and was recorded on June 15, 1866. The title thus conveyed remained in Jonathan Sanderson for over four years, when Jonathan conveyed the same to Mary V. Sanderson by two deeds; one of which was for the undivided half of lots 11, 12, and 13, in said block 27, consideration expressed $1,000, dated August 11, 1870, acknowledged the same day, and recorded August 26, 1870; and the other deed was for lot 11 and the undivided half of lot 14, in said block 27, consideration expressed $1,000, dated September 9, 1870, acknowledged the same day, and recorded September 10, 1870. It does not appear that at the time these deeds were executed, acknowledged, and recorded, George Sanderson was indebted to any person, or that he even contemplated contracting any debts. Nor has he since contracted, or attempted to contract, any debts of any considerable amount except the one for which said judgment was rendered. On May 10, 1871, George Sanderson was arrested on a charge of misappropriating government property. The time when said offense was supposed to have been committed, is not shown or stated. The charge, however, was tried upon its merits, and Sanderson was acquitted. At the time he was arrested he promised one James H. Brown that he would pay Brown $500 for going on his recognizance as bail for his appearance at the next term of court. Afterwards, on December 5, 1871, Sanderson as principal, and Light as surety, gave to Brown their promissory note for $600, due January 1, 1872, the consideration therefor being said $500 agreed to be paid to Brown for going Sanderson's bail, and $100 more for other debts recently incurred. This note was transferred by Brown to Streeter and Rizer, and upon this note Streeter and Rizer recovered their said judgment against George Sanderson and said Light.

There was direct and positive evidence in abundance, outside *462 of the several deeds of conveyance, that *said deeds from George and Mary V. Sanderson to Jonathan Sanderson, and from Jonathan Sanderson to Mary V. Sanderson, were made in good faith, and for a sufficient consideration. But suppose that they were not made in the best of faith,—suppose that they were made without any consideration; that they were purely voluntary,—and still we cannot see how the plaintiffs (Streeter and Rizer) can question their validity. The deeds were not made to defraud them, nor in any manner to delay or hinder the collection of their claim. It cannot be supposed that the parties to the deeds could have had in contemplation, at the time the deeds were made, the state of things which afterwards occurred, and out of which the plaintiffs' cause of action arose. It cannot be supposed that the parties expected, when said deeds were executed, that some time in the future George Sanderson would be charged with the misappropriation of government property; that Brown should afterwards go his bail, and that Sanderson & Light should afterwards give their promissory note to Brown for $500 therefor. It was nearly five years after George Sanderson conveyed away his title to said lots before he was arrested on said charge; and there is no evidence in this case that he ever did misappropriate government property, or that he was even suspected of such a thing until he was arrested therefor. Said deeds could not have been executed to defraud prior or existing creditors, for it does not seem that George Sanderson had any such creditors. And they could not have been executed to defraud subsequent creditors, for there is no evidence that any of the parties ever contemplated that George Sanderson would have any of that kind of creditors. And the deeds were all, immediately after their execution, put on record, so that all persons dealing with any of the parties might know where the title to the property was. When Streeter and Rizer purchased said note of Brown they had had about five and one-half years in which to ascertain from the county register's office the fact that George Sanderson had conveyed away his title to said lots. Under such circumstances, it would hardly seem that they could have *been very badly deceived or defrauded. The suspicious circumstances of this case are about these: It would seem that George Sanderson has a great deal of property in his possession, and that he does a large amount of business, but that the title to all the property is held by his wife, Mary V. Sanderson, and all the business is done in her name. Any person who will trust such a man, perhaps, ought to lose occasionally, in order to learn a proper lesson. But the courts cannot, in such case, take property held, for a long time, openly, notoriously, and publicly by the wife, and pay debts subsequently contracted by the husband. We shall decide this case upon the theory that all of said deeds were voluntary, and that the title to said lots was a gift from George Sanderson to his wife, Mary V., through the intervention of Jonathan Sanderson. And even upon that theory we must reverse the judgment of the court below.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

CHARLES E. OLMSTEAD v. CHARLES F. KOESTER, Treasurer, etc.

January Term, 1875.

1. Petition: As an Affidavit and as a Pleading. When a verified petition is used as an affidavit, its allegations must be construed as those of an affidavit, and must be such statements of fact as would be proper in the oral testimony of a witness. Allegations which are simply conclusions of law, whether sufficient or not as matter of pleading, are incompetent as testimony.
2. Preliminary Injunction: Discretion. A preliminary injunction is not a matter of strict right. Its issue rests with the sound discretion of the judge; and before one is issued there should be such a full showing of all the facts that the judge acts with a thorough understanding of the entire case.<sup>1</sup>
3. ———: To Restrain Collection of Taxes. Where an application is made for a preliminary injunction to restrain the collection of certain *464 taxes levied to pay for bonds, and the only evidence of the invalidity of the bonds is the general allegation in a verified petition that the bonds were illegally issued, and were never issued by the township in which the property of the plaintiff is situate, held, that this court cannot say that there was error in the refusal by the district court of any preliminary injunction.

Error from Marshall district court.

On the sixth of December, 1873, Olmstead, "who sues as well for the other tax-payers of Blue Rapids City township as for himself," applied to the judge of the district court for a temporary injunction against Charles F. Koester, as treasurer of Marshall county, to restrain him as such treasurer from collecting a certain tax levied upon the real property of the plaintiff, and other citizens of Blue Rapids City township. The application was made and heard upon plaintiff's verified petition, and the injunction was refused.

The only question to consider is, does the petition, on its face, present a case upon which an injunction should be granted? The petition shows that the treasurer is attempting to collect a tax which is illegal in two respects: (1) That it is levied to pay bonds that were illegally issued; (2) that this township never issued said bonds. Certainly, if these propositions are true, the tax must be illegal, and section 253 of the Code gives Olmstead the right to enjoin the treasurer from taking any steps to collect this tax on the lands specifically described in the petition. Such being the case, it was error for the court to refuse to grant the injunction. If he had not the right to sue for the others, it was the duty of the court to give him, or any other plaintiff, the rights which the petition showed him entitled to, and not to refuse all relief. We think this view of the law is substantially the same as that taken by this court in the cases of County of Leavenworth v. Lang, 8 Kan. *284, and City of Atchison v. Bartholow, 4 Kan. *124.

*465 **J. D. Brumbaugh*, for defendant in error.

The petition presents two questions: (1) That the bonds were never issued by the said Blue Rapids City township; (2) that the bonds were illegally issued, and are void in law.

The bonds in question were issued under a special law of 1870, c. 23, p. 57, at a time when Blue Rapids City township was included in, and formed a part of, the township of Blue Rapids. The parties now seeking to avoid the payment of the tax participated in the election authorized by the act above cited. Chapter 142, Laws 1873, p. 267, authorized the county clerk to place upon the tax-rolls the seven-mills tax to pay the interest, etc., of said bonds upon the real estate that was embraced within Blue Rapids township at the time said bonds were authorized to be and were issued. The county clerk did nothing more than the law required him to do. The petition in this case being sworn to, is used as the affidavit, and does not allege that said bonds were not issued by another municipal township in Marshall county, at a time when said Blue Rapids City township formed a part of such township. If the act of 1873 is valid, then all the real estate in Blue Rapids township, as it existed at the time said bonds were authorized to be issued, is held for this tax, the same as if no change in the boundary line of said township had been made.

The petition is insufficient in not alleging in what the illegality consists. The allegation in the petition is that the "tax was levied upon all the real estate in Blue Rapids City township for the purpose of paying certain pretended bonds illegally issued for the purpose of building a bridge," etc. The petition should state facts showing the illegality. The statement that the bonds were "illegally issued" is a conclusion of law, and not sufficient. A court of equity ought not to interfere with the speedy and ordinary collection of taxes, unless the plaintiff makes a showing coming within some acknowledged heads of equity jurisdiction. Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 534; Susquehanna Bank v. County of Broome, 25 N. Y. 312.

*466 *As the tax complained of was levied for paying bonds issued by Blue Rapids township to build a bridge, said township should have been made a defendant. Allen v. Turner, 11 Gray, 436. Koester, as county treasurer, the only defendant, has no interest in the adjudication. He is merely the agent to collect the money, and pay it out to the parties entitled to receive it. To adjudicate upon a question of such vital importance without the parties in interest being before the courts, would work untold hardships. The bondholders should be made parties defendant. State v. Anderson, 5 Kan. *90.

BREWER, J. This was an action to restrain the collection of a tax of seven mills levied to pay certain bonds. An application for a temporary restraining order was refused, and this ruling is the alleged error. It does not appear that any evidence other than the verified petition was presented upon such application, though so far as anything in the record is to the contrary there may have been abundance of contradictory testimony. Upon this verified petition ought a temporary restraining order to have been made? The only allegation bearing upon the illegality of the tax is that the defendant, the county treasurer, is threatening to collect a tax levied on the real estate in "Blue Rapids City township for the purpose of paying certain pretended bonds illegally issued for the purpose of building a bridge across the Big Blue river, at the foot of Main street, in or near the city of Irving, in the said county of Marshall; and plaintiff further alleges that the said bonds were never issued by the said Blue Rapids City township; and that neither the hereinbefore described property of this plaintiff, nor any property in the said township of Blue Rapids City, is liable for the said bonds, or any part thereof; and that the said levy of the said tax on the said real estate of this plaintiff, and on all other real estate of said township, is illegal and void at law." Counsel contend that "the petition shows that the treasurer is attempting to collect a tax which is illegal in two re-*467 spects: First, that it is levied to pay bonds which were illegally issued; second, that this township never issued said bonds," and that therefore, the tax being illegal, its collection should be enjoined. We think counsel errs in the conclusion he draws, and from overlooking two considerations: First, that the petition is made in this case to subserve two purposes,—that is, that of a pleading, and that of evidence; and, second, that there are oftentimes considerations which, upon the same testimony, will forbid a temporary restraining order, when upon final hearing they will require a permanent injunction. Now, it may be sufficient to state in a petition that bonds were "illegally issued," but it would manifestly be improper for a witness to so testify. It is not a fact of which he may speak, but a conclusion of law to be drawn from the facts to which he testifies. Doubtless, witnesses do often speak of matters being duly and legally done, but it is either where there is no objection, or where the matter is collateral, or not seriously questioned, and never where it is the substantial matter in dispute. Where the petition alleges illegality, and the time to answer having passed, and none has been filed, or one tendering no issue upon the illegality, the illegality may be taken as admitted, and the court may act upon such admission. But where the answer-day has not arrived, the illegality is not admitted; and the petition, though verified, is to be construed as any affidavit or other testimony.

We have in several cases, of late, referred to the fact that often a court is justified in refusing a temporary restraining order, and requiring the plaintiff to wait until the final disposition of the case, even where the preponderance of the evidence on the application is in favor of the right to a restraining order. A preliminary injunction is not a matter of strict right. It is not like an order of attachment, which goes upon the filing of a statutory affidavit and bond. Its issue rests with the sound discretion of the judge. If the rights of the plaintiff can be as well secured by the final injunction, and are not prejudiced by a refusal of the temporary restraining order, it *468 ought to be refused. If the injuries *which will result to the defendant if the order is erroneously granted will greatly exceed the benefits which will issue to the plaintiff from its issue, if properly issued, the court may sometimes properly decline to grant it. And in all cases there should be a full and clear showing of the facts, that the court may act advisedly, and upon a clear understanding of the whole case, otherwise there is the liability, not only to commit an error, but also thereby to inflict a wrong upon the defendant which cannot be adequately compensated. See Stoddart v. Vanlaningham, ante, *18; Akin v. Davis, ante, *144; Conley v. Fleming, ante, *381. Now, in this case, there is far from that full showing of the facts which ought to be made to require the issue of a temporary restraining order. We feel, after reading the petition, that we are illy informed as to the real facts of the case, or matters of actual contest. The petition alleges that the bonds were never issued by Blue Rapids City township. Counsel for defendant in error refers to an act of the legislature of 1870, (Laws 1870, c. 23, p. 57,) authorizing Blue Rapids township to issue bonds to build a bridge at the place named in the petition; and also cites an act of the legislature of 1873, (Laws 1873, c. 142, p. 267,) which declares that all bonds heretofore or hereafter issued by any county or township shall be a lien upon all the real estate of such county or township; that no change in the boundaries shall affect this lien; and provides, in case of a change of the boundary of a county, for the collection of the tax upon the real estate which has ceased to be a part of the county issuing the bonds. But whether the contest is upon the constitutionality of these acts, or whether, indeed, either of them has any application to the bonds in question, is mere matter of conjecture; and it would be manifestly improper for us to be deciding questions which are not in the case, and may never actually arise. It seems evident, from the fact that the regular collecting officers are attempting to collect a tax for these bonds, that there is at least some pretense of their validity; and before a court should interfere to restrain the collection

*469 of taxes for their payment, it should *be fully advised of the circumstances under which they were issued, or are claimed to have been issued, and the facts, whatever they may be, which are claimed to invalidate them.

For the reason that we are not so advised, we cannot say that the district judge erred in refusing the temporary restraining order, and his decision and order of refusal will be affirmed.

It is understood that the case of Means v. Koester is similar to this, and the same judgment will be entered therein.

PACIFIC RAILROAD CO. v. R. H. BROWN.

January Term, 1875.

1. Instructions: In Supreme Court: Insufficient Record. This court has repeatedly held, and again decides, that, where the record fails to show that all the instructions which were given are preserved, we cannot say there was error in refusing any, because those refused may have been so refused because already once given.<sup>1</sup>
2. Negligence: When Contributory, will not Prevent Recovery. In an action for damages for killing stock on a railroad track, where it appears that the stock was killed through the negligence of the train-men on a passing train; that the stock was running at large, and strayed on the track; that the night preceding the injury it had been shut up in the plaintiff's barn, but without his knowledge had gotten out of the barn into the barn-lot, and thence through a gate into the road, and thus strayed away to the place of injury: held, that the fact that plaintiff had another horse which was in the habit of opening the gate of the barn-lot, and did in fact open the gate at that time, did not amount to such contributory negligence as to defeat the plaintiff's recovery.<sup>2</sup>

Error from Wyandotte district court.

Action by Brown to recover damages for the alleged killing of two horses by the railroad company, "by so carelessly and negligently running and managing its locomotive and cars that the same ran against and over said horses," etc. Answer, general denial, and negligence on the part of plaintiff. Trial at the October term, 1873. Verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for $368.

Bartlett & Hale, for plaintiff in error.

The court erred in refusing to give the fifth instruction asked for by plaintiff in error. The act of 1870, c. 33, (St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Grover, 11 Kan. *302,) has not changed the rule of law as to the negligence of the owner of stock in allowing them to roam at large in the vicinity of an unfenced railroad. The statute, and the rule adopted in the cited case, only affect the question of negligence, and the relative rights of the parties. It is still gross negligence on the part of the owner of stock to allow them to run at large in the

<sup>2</sup>Where the owner of a colt confines it in an inclosure surrounded by a sufficient and safe fence, and in the night-time, without any fault or negligence on his part, a gate is opened, and left open through the misconduct or negligence of some unknown party, and through this open gate the colt escapes, and goes upon the track of a railroad company, held, that the company is bound to use ordinary care to prevent any injury to such colt from its trains. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Davis, 31 Kan. 645; S. C. 3 Pac. Rep. 301. Liability of railroad companies for injuries to stock, see notes to Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Webb, 24 N. W. Rep. 709; *Atchison, T. & S. F. immediate vicinity of a railroad in this state, and which the owners thereof are not bound to fence; and hence the ruling of this court in Union Pac. R. Co. v. Rollins, 5 Kan. *167, is of binding force, except in relation to the relative rights of the parties on the question of negligence. Previous to the act of 1870 the defendant, in cases like this, was only liable for gross negligence. Now, however, it is held liable for ordinary negligence. Still, if there is negligence on the part of the plaintiff which contributed to the injury, there can be no recovery. Bemis v. Connecticut & P. R. R. Co., 42 Vt. 375; Railroad Co. v. Skinner, 19 Pa. St. 298; 29 Me. 397; Sullivan v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 6 Amer. Law Reg. 342.

The court refused to give to the jury the sixth instruction asked. The plaintiff in error had the undoubted right to submit this question of contributory negligence to the jury. The act of 1870 gives no authority to the owner of horses and cattle to allow them to run at large and trespass with impunity on the lands and possessions of others. It was important that the jury should be instructed as to the law on this point. The answer of plaintiff in error set up contributory negligence on the part of Brown by suffering his horses *to run at large in the immediate vicinity of the railroad. The court in refusing to give the instruction virtually gave to the jury the converse of the proposition, viz., that the defendant in error had the right to allow his horses at the time of the accident to run at large in the immediate vicinity of the railroad, and the jury undoubtedly drew this conclusion. Shear. & R. Neg. § 363; Waldron v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co., 85 Me. 422; Marsh v. New York & E. R. Co., 14 Barb. 364; Lafayette & Q. R. Co. v. Shriner, 6 Ind. 141. And by refusing the seventh instruction the court gave the jury to understand that it was a part of the law of the case that it was a duty of the employes on moving trains to watch for horses and cattle trespassing on the railroad of plaintiff in error; or, in other words, it is the duty of the employes to divide their time between the operation of the cars and the cattle or horses of negligent owners trespassing on the track of the railroad. The servants of the plaintiff in error on the train were not employed to watch trespassing cattle and horses, but to devote their whole time and attention to the train, passengers, and property of plaintiff in error.

Plaintiff in error asked the court to instruct the jury that "it is a presumption of law that the employes of moving trains do their duty in all respects, as well as to those on their own train and the property of the company, as those off the train and their property." This instruction was refused, thereby giving the jury to understand the converse of the instruction asked for was the presumption of law, viz., that the presumption of law is that the employes on moving trains do not do their duty in all respects, as well as to those on the train and the property of the company, as those off the train and their property, thus reversing the whole course of authority. Gonzales v. New York & H. R. Co., 39 How. Pr. 420; Williams v. East India Co., 3 East, 192; Grippen v. New York Cent. R. Co., 40 N. Y. 34; Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. 70; Hartwell v. Root, 19 Johns. 345.

The jury found that Brown had a horse "that was in the habit of opening the gate at his lot, and that this horse opened the gate, and let the horses in question out of the lot after they got out of the barn."

Defendant in error is as much responsible for the acts of his *472 vicious horse, of which *he has previous knowledge, as for those of his servants. The accident would not have happened but for the singular propensity of the horse in question, and as defendant in error was well aware of this he must be held responsible for all the results flowing directly therefrom. He contributed to the accident, and hence the verdict should have been set aside, and a new trial granted.

Scroggs & Bartlett, for defendant in error.

Every legal proposition contained in the fifth instruction asked by plaintiff in error, and refused, is contained in said plaintiff's fourth instruction, which was given; and when the court has once given the law upon a point it is not necessary to repeat it when asked. Kansas Ins. Co. v. Berry, 8 Kan. *159; Abeles v. Cohen, Id. *180; Lobenstein v. Pritchett, Id. *213.

There was no error in refusing to give the special instructions asked by the defendant below. Said instruction embodies a question of fact, controverted by both the pleadings and the evidence, as to whether defendant in error did allow his horses to stray upon the track of plaintiff in error, or whether they got there through the negligence of his servants. The testimony all shows that the horses did not get upon the track by any permission of Brown, nor by any negligence of his servants. And it appears from the evidence that the giving of the instructions refused could not have affected the verdict. The refusal to give such instructions is no ground of error. 3 Mich. 55, 70; Sinclair v. Murphy, 14 Mich. 392; Sheehan v. Dalrymple, 19 Mich. 239.

BREWER, J. This was an action to recover damages for the killing of a span of horses. The errors assigned are in refusing certain instructions asked by the plaintiff in error, and in overruling a motion for a new trial. So far as the first of these errors is concerned, it would be sufficient to say that the record fails to give the charge of the court, or the instructions (if any) given at the instance of the defendant in error, or to show that the instructions preserved were the only ones given. It may be that the instructions refused were so *473 re*refused because already once given. Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. *176; Da Lee v. Blackburn, 11 Kan. *190; Furguson v. Graves, 12 Kan. *39.

We think the rulings of the court in this matter would, however, have to be upheld upon other grounds. It seems to us that the instructions refused were incorrect, or inapplicable, or in substance already sufficiently given. Thus, the sixth instruction, viz., "that it is carelessness on the part of the owner of horses and cattle to allow them to roam at large in the vicinity of an unfenced railroad," was clearly inapplicable. The only testimony in the case showed that Brown was not in the habit of letting his horses run at large, and that on the night preceding the injury he had shut them up in his barn, from whence they had gotten out into his barn-yard, and thence through the gate into the street, and wandered away; so that whatever of blame might attach to the plaintiff, it did not lie in the direction of this instruction. The seventh instruction asked for was as follows: "It is no part of the duty of those in charge of moving railroad trains to keep watch for cattle or horses that may accidentally have strayed upon the track of the railroad." Now, whatever of truth there may be in this, as an abstract proposition, it would, under the circumstances of this case, have been apt to convey a wrong impression. The place of the accident was visible for half a mile in either direction along the track. There was testimony to show that the speed of the train was not slackened; that no warning was given by whistle, or bell, or letting off of steam. There was no testimony offered for the defense, and none for the plaintiff, from which the jury could infer that any of the train-men knew of the presence of these horses on the track before the moment of injury. Would not a jury gather the impression from such an instruction, then, that there was no breach of duty—no negligence—on the part of the train-men, even if they remained thus wholly unaware of the presence of the horses on the track until the very moment of striking them, and therefore took no measures to prevent the injury? We think, *474 therefore, that the *court properly refused the instruction.

It could have subserved no proper purpose, and was liable to mislead. A similar criticism may be passed upon another instruction, asked, viz., that "it is a presumption of law that the employes of moving trains do their duty in all respects, as well to those on their own train and the property of the company, as to those off the train and their property."

The motion for a new trial was also properly overruled. The testimony of the plaintiff tended to show negligence on the part of the defendant, and the defendant introduced no testimony. Defendant claims that the answer of the jury to a certain question showed contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. That answer stated that plaintiff had a horse which was in the habit of opening the gate of his barn lot, and did on the night in question open the gate, and let the team that was killed out into the road. There was no testimony tending to show where the plaintiff resided, or how near to the railroad track. We cannot think that this is such contributory negligence as to defeat the plaintiff's recovery. If negligence at all, it was both slight and remote.

Upon the whole record we see no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

L. C. CHALLISS v. WILLIAM HEKELNKEMPER.

January Term, 1875.

1. Taxation: Assessing Lands: Uniting Separate Lots. Where two adjacent lots are of different sizes and values, and belong to different owners, the one open and unimproved, and the other inclosed and improved, it is improper to assess them together, and as one parcel or tract of land.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———: Apportionment. The owner of the larger and more valuable lot cannot in such case, by paying one-half the joint tax, cast the burden of the remaining half upon the other lot.
- *475 *3. Equity: Rule for Relief. Equity will assist a party to cast off from his property an inequitable and unjust burden, but in so doing will require that he pay what is fairly and justly due.<sup>2</sup>

Error from Atchison district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

W. W. Guthrie, for plaintiff.

The tax deed was void on its face, but was nevertheless a cloud upon the title. Dean v. City of Madison, 9 Wis. 402. It shows that two distinct parcels were assessed and valued and taxed as one tract. Each parcel must be separately assessed. Section 32, Tax Law. Here these two parcels had been separate since the plat was filed in 1868, and had been many times conveyed by separate deeds, all of record. Lot 28 was 40 feet front, with a house on it; lot 29, but 25 feet front, and vacant. The two lots were assessed at $1,200 for 1868, and taxed $61.19, and lot 29 was sold for the full half. For 1869 total tax was $66.60, and the half charged to lot 29. Hence the sale was for an excessive tax. McQuesten v. Swope, 12 Kan. *32.

Section 32 of the tax law provides means for ascertaining the description of property, and the owner cannot be chargeable with laches in this respect, nor made to suffer for the errors of the county officials, resulting from their negligence only. The board of equalization have no power to divide up or apportion valuations; only to raise or lower on descriptions as returned.

BREWER, J. This was an action to set aside a tax deed, and re-
*476 move the cloud on plaintiff's title arising therefrom. *The court made a conditional decree, that, upon payment by the plaintiff of $201.47, the defendant should be barred from setting up any claim under said tax deed, and that each party should pay half the costs. Plaintiff excepted to this decree, or to so much as required payment of $201.47 and half the costs, but tendered judgment for $70, and now asks that the ruling of the district court be modified to that extent. Of course, as a basis for this decree, the court found against the regularity and validity of the tax proceedings,—found the existence of some substantial defect therein; for no mere irregularity would defeat the deed. Gen. St. 1057, § 113. With this ruling we need not trouble ourselves, for the plaintiff cannot, and the defendant does not, complain of it. The question for us is, what, if anything, upon the basis of the invalidity of the tax proceedings, ought the plaintiff to pay? And as bearing upon that question the following are the important facts: The tax deed was upon a sale for the non-payment of the taxes of 1868. The premises in controversy were known as "lot No. 29, in block 15," in Challiss' addition to city of Atchison. It and the adjacent lot were assessed together, and as one parcel, for both 1868 and 1869. One-half the tax was paid by the owner of the adjacent lot, leaving one-half unpaid, and for which it was sold. It appeared that lot 29 was 25 feet front, and unimproved and uninclosed, while the adjacent lot was 40 feet front, inclosed, and improved with house, etc. The value of the improved lot was three times that of the lot in question. Subsequent to 1869 the lot was assessed separately, and of those subsequent taxes plaintiff makes no complaint, but tendered judgment therefor in his offer of $70. Of the tax of 1868 and 1869 he complains, and says that, by reason of the facts above stated, no lien was cast upon the lot, but that the whole tax must be treated as void. On the other hand, the district court held that the unpaid tax on the two lots, being the one-half of the entire tax thereon and interest, should be paid, basing the decision evidently on section 117 of the tax law, (Gen. St. 1057,) which provides that if the holder of a tax *477 *deed be defeated in an action for the recovery of the land the successful claimant shall be adjudged to pay the full amount of all taxes paid, with interest and costs.

We think the court erred in its conclusions. The two lots, jointly assessed, were equal neither in size nor value. The owner of the larger and more valuable could not, by payment of one-half the tax, cast the burden of the remaining half on the other lot. There was nothing in the condition of the two lots to justify this joint assessment. They were not owned by the same person; they were not covered by a single improvement, nor inclosed with the same fence. The one was open and unimproved; the other inclosed and improved. No laches can be imputed to the owner. The joint assessment was through no fault of his. It is the duty of the assessor to make out a correct description of each parcel of real property, and not the duty of the owner, unless required by the assessor, to furnish such description. Gen. St. 1032, § 32. So that to require the plaintiff to pay one-half the tax on the two lots is to cast on him an unjustifiable burden, and to make him pay for the mistakes of the assessor. The court, therefore, erred in requiring the plaintiff to pay the whole of the unpaid tax.

On the other hand, it does not seem to us that the claim of the plaintiff can be sustained. While a court of equity may assist a party to cast off an inequitable burden from his property, it will not assist him to remove that which is fair and just, or to avoid bearing his due share of the burdens and expenses of government. Now, the plaintiff, claiming that this tax is excessive, seeks to be relieved from it altogether. He would not simply rectify the blunders of the officers, but he would make those blunders the means of his own profit. Because too much is asked, he would not pay that which fairly and justly he ought to pay. This a court of equity will not tolerate. It appears from the unchallenged findings that the value of the adjacent lot was three times that of the one in controversy. There is no pre-*478 tense that the joint assessment was excessive, or the tax in*equitable. Clearly, therefore, as taxes are based upon value, the lot in controversy should have paid one-fourth, and only one-fourth, of the joint tax. City of Ottawa v. Barney, 10 Kan. *270. This, as we figure it, makes the amount of the taxes and interest properly chargeable on this lot at the time of the decree $140.02, and the decree will be modified by reducing the amount required to be paid to that sum.

As to the matter of costs, it does not appear that any tender was made by plaintiff prior to the commencement of the suit, so that it seems to us eminently fair that he pay one-half the costs. The costs of this court also will be divided.

PHILIP CASEY v. J. KILGORE and others.

January Term, 1875.

1. Roads and Highways: Statutory Construction. Chapter 181 of the Laws of 1872, being an act declaring section lines in certain counties public highways, did not take away the power to open highways in those counties upon other than section lines, where the public interest required it, or set aside the mode of proceeding to establish and open such highways provided by the general road law of 1868.
2. ———: Bond to Secure Costs: Misrecital. A misrecital of one of the termini of the proposed road in the bond given in such proceedings to secure the costs and expenses in case the road be not opened, will not, after the road has been established, and ordered opened by the commissioners, avoid the proceedings, or be sufficient error to set them aside.
3. ———: Description of Road in Petition, Etc. Proceedings to lay out and establish a road will not be held illegal and void merely because the petition omits to designate whether the road proposed is east or west of any particular meridian.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Miami district court.

*479 **W. R. Wagstaff*, for plaintiff in error.

Look at section 4, p. 365, Laws 1872, and interpret the plain and obvious meaning of the legislature in declaring section lines public highways. Under the law, when the petition for the road in question was filed with the county board the section line intended to be designated was already a public highway. It is not disputed that where the law points out a mode of accomplishing anything, that mode, and no other, must be adopted. In this case there is a mode pointed out of changing a road from a section line. The proposed road is nothing more or less than the changing of a road from a section line. While the law of 1872 may not, in terms, repeal the old road law, yet it provides for a new condition of things, and renders the old law inoperative when in conflict with its designs, purposes, objects, and ends. In this case the county board and the court rejected the mode pointed out by the law in force. The county board and the court find, from the papers in the case, that notice was given on the twenty-seventh of February, one month prior to the taking effect of the said act of 1872; and also find that the petition was in due form of law governing highways at the time said proceedings were commenced; and further find that the proceedings for the location of roads and highways are deemed and held to be commenced by this court when the notice of the filing or intention of filing a petition is made. Are such findings authorized by law? Suppose application had never been made to the board by petition, under section 1 of the general road law, would the board have acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter stated in the notice? If the board had no jurisdiction, which it had not, then the jurisdiction attaches, and the proceedings are commenced upon filing petition, executing bond, *480 *and giving notice. The finding of the court that "giving of notice" is the commencement of proceedings before the commissioners, within the meaning of the law, is erroneous.

The bond given in the case is for the location of a road beginning at north-east corner section 20, etc. The road prayed for and ordered located begins at south-east corner section 20, etc. The court finds that the said petitioners have given bond in such cases provided by law. The finding on this point is against the fact as shown by the bond itself. The finding of the court is against the law.

There is another defect apparent. The description of the road as proposed does not show it to be east or west of any particular meridian, nor the county or state in which the purposed road is to be located. To determine this fact, it is necessary to look beyond the record.

The records fail to show that the court found said proposed road to be of public utility. The law appropriating private property for public uses ought to be strictly construed; and, under the application of this rule, even the old road law of 1868 has not been complied with, and this without modification by subsequent legislation. The intention of the law of 1872 is to put roads on section lines. It is the duty of the court to carry into effect its intention. When it is made to appear to a court by petition and remonstrance, in a manner provided by law, that an application for a new road is in fact only for the alteration of an established road, it seems the mode pointed out for the alteration should be carried into effect.

B. F. Simpson, for defendants in error.

This court will not examine into the merits of the road, but will only examine the record in order to determine the regularity of the proceedings, and to see that the necessary jurisdictional facts appear. People v. Goodwin, 5 N. Y. 572. The notice of the application for the road was posted on the twenty-seventh of February, 1872. This, then, was the commencement of the proceedings, and it was *481 under the old law. All the *statutes require to be recorded is the report of the viewers, the survey and plat of road; and, in the absence of anything else from the record, or the presence of other matter in the record, is not error. General Road Law, (Gen. St. c. 89, § 6;) Anderson v. County of Hamilton, 12 Ohio St. 635; Beebe v. Scheidt, 13 Ohio St. 406; Dunross v. Francis, 15 Ill. 543; Davenport M. S. F. & L. Ass'n v. Schmidt, 15 Iowa, 214; McCollister v. Shuey, 24 Iowa, 368; State v. Lane, 26 Iowa, 225.

BREWER, J. Proceedings were had before the county commissioners of Miami county, under the general road law of 1868, which resulted in the establishment of a road through the land of plaintiff in error. Being, as he thought, wronged by such proceedings, Casey filed his petition in error in the district court of that county to set them aside. The district court found no error, and affirmed the action of the commissioners. That ruling he now brings to this court on error.

The record of the proceedings before the commissioners is full, and contains the notices, with proof of posting and advertisement, the petition, bond, order appointing viewers, notice to viewers, notice to plaintiff in error of time and place of meeting of viewers, plaintiff's claim for damages, report of viewers, with plat of road, etc., remonstrance of Casey and others, and order of commissioners approving report of viewers, and ordering road established and opened. The principal question presented by counsel for plaintiff in error is as to the effect of chapter 181 of the Laws of 1872 upon these proceedings. That act in the first section declares that all section lines in certain counties, among them the county of Miami, are public highways. The second and third sections provide for the contingency of a hedge or other valuable improvement being upon the section line, and the steps that must be then taken to open the road. Section four provides that when it shall be impracticable to open a road on any part of a section line the commissioners shall direct the road-overseer to take three disinterested freeholders, and view the part said to be impracticable, and lay the road as near to the section line as practicable. There is *in this act no express repeal of the general road law. So far from it, upon the same day, by the same legislature, was passed an act amending that law. And waiving the question discussed by counsel as to whether these proceedings were or were not commenced before the law of 1872 took effect, it seems to us there is nothing in that law which in any way militates against their legality and sufficiency. Both the laws may stand. Neither conflicts with the other. Because certain lines are declared to be highways, no restraint is thereby put upon the power to open other roads where the public interest demands it. This is not a case where the maxim, "expressio unius, exclusio alterius," applies. The law of 1872 does not purport to cover the whole ground. It is in no sense, even for the counties therein named, a general road law. It simply as to those counties aims to supplement that law. Effect must, if possible, be given to both enactments. Repeals by implication are not favored. No attempt was made in this case to lay out a road upon the section line, or upon the nearest practicable route thereto. It starts at the north-east corner of plaintiff's quarter section, and ends at the south-west corner of the same quarter, passing in its intermediate course, in a very circuitous and zigzag manner, through this and an adjacent quarter. The entire proceeding was under the general road law of 1868, and that law remains in full force, so far as anything in this case is concerned, notwithstanding the section-line road law of 1872. It is useless to inquire what effect the latter law would have had if the application had been to open a road upon the section line.

A second objection is that the bond which was given did not in its description of the road conform to the petition, etc. The road prayed for and located commenced at the south-east corner of section 20, etc. The bond referred to a road begining at the north-east corner of section 20, etc. This was doubtless a clerical error, and would probably under no circumstances have vitiated the bond, other matters therein showing clearly for what it was given. But, even *483 if the bond were fatally defective, that would not now *vitiate the proceedings; for this, like all such bonds, was only conditioned to pay the costs and expenses in case the application for the road failed. It did not fail, but was sustained. If the objection had been made pending the proceedings, and the bond had been fatally defective, it might have stayed the proceedings until a sufficient bond had been given. But after the proceedings had terminated successfully, and in the establishing of the road prayed for, the bond ceased to have any value, and became wholly immaterial.

Another objection made is that "the description of the road as proposed does not show it to be east or west of any particular meridian, nor the county or state in which the proposed road is to be located." We think this objection not fully borne out by the record, or, at least, that there is sufficient description to make clear and certain the location of that road. The petition recites that "your petitioners are all residents of the county of Miami, and along and near the proposed line of said road;" gives the location of the road as "commencing at the south-east corner of section 20, town 16, range 23," without, it is true, there giving the county or state, or stating whether the range was "range east" or "range west" of any meridian; states, as one of the intermediate points, "the crossing of Rock falls, on Bull creek," and as the terminus the "Paola and Marysville road." There seems to have been no difficulty in ascertaining the location of the road, and we think the description was sufficient.

These are the principal matters complained of, and, in them appearing no error, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

*A. M. ROBINSON v. CHARLES T. MELVIN.

January Term, 1875.

1. Supreme Court: Examination of Questions of Fact. Where all the material testimony on a motion to discharge an attachment is in affidavits, or other written evidence, the questions thereon are presented to this court under nearly the same conditions as to the district court; and while the judgment of that court is entitled to consideration, and may, in doubtful cases, turn the balance in favor of affirmance, yet this court may properly, in many cases, proceed to examine the questions as though they were in the first instance presented here. [Keith v. Steller, 25 Kan. 101; Macfarland v. Buck, 27 Kan. 784.]
2. Attachment: When not Authorized. Where it appeared that the defendant, subsequently to the contract upon which the plaintiff's cause of action arose, had made purchases of three different tracts of land in his wife's name, paying therefor less than $500 in cash and personal property; that his indebtedness outside of plaintiff's claim was about $2,200; that part of this indebtedness was secured by mortgage on real estate in the same county in which the controversy arose and the parties resided, worth $2,000; and it also appeared that these purchases in his wife's name were in pursuance of a promise made years before, and at the time of his marriage with his wife, that he, a minister of the gospel, would give her all the fees received from performing the marriage ceremony, and that such fees exceeded the amount of such purchases; that the property owned by himself and wife was the proceeds of their mutual labor; and that he was possessed of property in his own name within the reach of the process of the court more than sufficient to pay all his indebtedness, including the plaintiff's claim; and that in addition he was at the time exchanging property outside of the state for real estate in that county of greater value than the amount of plaintiff's claim, and the title to which he was taking in his own name: held, that the allegation that the defendant was about to convert a part of his property into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of creditors, and had assigned, removed, and disposed of a part with the intent to defraud, hinder, and delay his creditors, was not sustained, and that the attachment should be discharged.

Error from Lyon district court.

Robinson sued Melvin to recover $1,150, and upon an affidavit therefor obtained an order of attachment against defendant's property. On motion, supported by affidavits, the district court, *485 at the March term, *1874, discharged said attachment.

J. V. Sanders and E. S. Waterbury, for plaintiff.

Buck & Cunningham and R. M. Ruggles, for defendant.

BREWER, J. We are asked to review an order of the district court of Lyon county discharging an attachment. The grounds for the attachment were that the defendant was "about to convert a part of his property into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors, and had assigned, removed, and disposed of a part of his property with the intent to defraud, hinder, and delay his creditors."

The cause of action stated in the petition grew out of a contract between the parties, of date March 17, 1873, whereby the defendant agreed to build a house on a certain lot, and then convey the lot and improvements to plaintiff. At the time of the contract defendant received a gold watch and chain valued at $200, and $32.50 in cash, as part payment. Nothing further was paid by plaintiff directly to defendant, though, relying on the contract, plaintiff built a barn upon the lot. Subsequently the defendant conveyed the lot to a third party, and hence arose this action for breach of contract. Defendant claims by his affidavit that the plaintiff was the party which broke the contract, and that the latter has no claim upon him for any amount whatever. That, however, is a question properly to be determined by a jury, and upon oral testimony rather than upon affidavits, and on this motion. In support of the attachment plaintiff introduced several affidavits showing indebtedness on the part of the defendant to different parties amounting in the aggregate, and exclusive of plaintiff's claim, to about $2,200. Some of this was secured by mortgages, and some had been standing for several months. He also showed that the only property *486 he had been *able to find standing in defendant's name was a farm which was valued by real-estate men at $2,000, and upon which were the mortgages spoken of; also that, since the contract with plaintiff, defendant had bought one lot, for which he gave the gold watch and chain received from plaintiff, another lot, for which he paid $101, and ten acres, for which he gave a horse valued at $150, and his note and mortgage upon said ten acres, for $200; and the title to all these pieces of property he had taken in his wife's name. On the other hand, the defendant's affidavit showed that he was a minister, and authorized to perform the marriage ceremony; that when he married his present wife he promised to let her have for her own use all the fees he might receive for such services, and that these fees had amounted to $500 or $600; that at the time of his marriage he was worth about $400, and she nothing, and that all the property they had since owned or controlled had been the proceeds of their mutual labor; that the property which had been placed in his wife's name at no time exceeded or even equaled in value the amount of the marriage fees above named; that he himself was solvent, and had property in this state not exempt from execution worth at least $2,000, and probably $3,000, over and above all his debts, exclusive of the plaintiff's claim, the validity of which he denied, (though the items of his property, other than the farm heretofore spoken of, were not designated;) that in addition he owned 320 acres of land in Wisconsin, which he had traded to a party in Emporia for 640 acres of land in Lyon county and two lots in the city of Emporia; that the deeds had been made out, and were in the possession of Almerin Gillett, of Emporia, waiting to be delivered whenever a defect in the chain of title to the Wisconsin lands was removed, and that he had received information from Wisconsin that a missing deed, the only defect, had been found, and would be immediately recorded; that the deed to said lands and lots was to himself, and not his wife, and that said property was worth $1,500 to $2,000. Other matters appeared in the *487 several affidavits, (for they were many, and quite lengthy,) *but these are the principal facts.

Upon these facts ought the attachment to have been sustained or discharged? We have examined the question as though it were an original question first presented to us, and not as reviewing the ruling of the district court. This we may properly do, for, except as to some immaterial matters, the whole testimony was in writing, and therefore comes to us in about the same way as to the district court. It is doubtless true that the judgment of the district court, even upon written testimony, is entitled to consideration, and in many doubtful cases may sometimes turn the balance in favor of affirmance; but, for reasons to be hereafter noticed, we have preferred to examine this as an original question. And it seems to us that the attachment ought to have been discharged. It is unnecessary to affirm the validity of the agreement between defendant and his wife that she should have the marriage fees as her individual and separate property, and yet it would be difficult to deny the justice or propriety of setting apart to the wife some portion of the property which is the proceeds of their joint labor. At any rate, such an agreement tends to overthrow the evil intent which might otherwise be inferred from the fact of placing property in her name, and to show that the act was in pursuance of a purpose formed long anterior to the present difficulties, and not in consequence of those difficulties. Especially is this significant in view of the solvency of the defendant, as shown by his own testimony, and the exchange by which he was at the time placing an additional amount of property within the jurisdiction of the court in which this controversy was pending. Not only has he means in this state with which to pay any judgments that may be rendered against him in this action, but at the very time he is charged to have been disposing of his property with intent to delay, hinder, and defraud his creditors he is trading property outside of the state for real estate in Lyon county worth more than the plaintiff's claim. Such conduct is so manifestly at variance with any evil intent as against his creditors that it clearly overthrows any that might be in- *488 ferred from the purchases in *his wife's name. And in addition, in reference to such purchases, while the amount invested is small, (only $400 or $500,) he is thereby converting property easy of concealment, and easy of sale, such as a watch and chain, and a horse, into real estate, incapable of concealment, and difficult of sale. On the whole evidence it seems to us that the allegations of the affidavit for attachment are not sustained, and that it ought to have been discharged.

One other question is raised by counsel. After the dissolution of the attachment plaintiff moved to have the order dissolving the attachment set aside, and the matter referred to a judge pro tem., on the ground of the interest of the judge, and in support of such motion filed an affidavit alleging that subsequent to the dissolution he had ascertained that the judge was security for defendant on a past-due note of $125, and that while the motion to dissolve was pending before him he had received from defendant a chattel mortgage on a span of horses worth not over $120 to indemnify him. We have taken this case as if originally presented to us, and considered it independent of any prior adjudication, because, even though the judge was disqualified by reason of interest, it would be wrong to the parties to remand it for examination before a judge pro tem. if it was reasonably clear to us that the attachment ought upon the evidence to have been discharged. That would be simply making additional costs with the same ultimate result. We do not mean to decide that the judge was actually disqualified by interest, the showing having been entirely ex parte; but we cannot forbear remarking that it is the duty, as it is generally the wish, of a judge to avoid sitting in judgment upon questions in which he has a direct, even though slight, pecuniary interest.

The judgment will be affirmed.

January Term, 1875.

1. County-Seat Elections: Notice of Second Election. Where two elections are necessary to determine the question of a county-seat, the failure of the sheriff to give notice of the second election does not vitiate said election.
2. ———: Mistake in Canvass: Failure to Contest in Due Time: Second Election: Laches: Estoppel. At an election for the relocation of a county-seat, A., B., and C. were candidates. At the first election neither place received a majority of the votes. The commissioners met, canvassed the vote, rejecting part of the returns, and declared that A. and B. had received the highest votes, and were the candidates at the second election. If a full canvass of all the returns had been made, A. and C. would have been found to have received the highest votes, and would have been declared the subsequent candidates. Notwithstanding the error, the second election was had, A. and B. being the places voted for. A. received the highest vote, and was declared the county-seat. Subsequently the friends of C. obtained an alternative writ of mandamus, commanding the commissioners to meet and make a correct canvass of the first vote, or show cause why they had not so done. In obedience to this alternative writ, and without attempting to show cause, the commissioners met, canvassed the entire vote, declared A. and C. to have received the highest votes, and ordered an election to decide between them. Such election was held, and C. received the majority, and was declared the county-seat. Held, that inasmuch as no proceedings to contest the validity of the first canvass were had until after the second election, that that election was final; that the subsequent recanvass of the first vote, and the following election, were unauthorized and void; and that A. was the legal county-seat.

Error from Howard district court.

Mandamus, brought in the name of the state as plaintiff, by Samuel Donelson, county attorney, as relator, to compel M. B. Light, as county clerk, to remove his office, and the books, records, and papers thereto belonging, from the town of Boston to the town of Elk Falls, and there hold and keep the same. The action was tried at the May term, 1874. The court determined that Elk Falls was the *490 county-seat, and gave judgment *in favor of the state. A peremptory writ of mandamus was awarded, requiring Light to remove his office to Elk Falls.

Charles J. Peckham, York & Humphrey, and J. D. McCue, for plaintiff in error.

Samuel Donelson, Co. Atty., and R. H. Nichols, for the relator, defendant in error.

BREWER, J. The material facts in this case are these: On the twelfth of August, 1873, the town of Peru was the county-seat of Howard county. An election was on that day held for the relocation of the county-seat. Boston, Elk Falls, and Peru were candidates. No place received a majority. By the canvass of the commissioners, Elk Falls and Peru were declared to have received the highest number of votes, and to be the two candidates to be voted for at the second election. This election was ordered to be held and was held on the twenty-sixth of August. No notice was given by the sheriff of this election. On the day for the canvass of the votes cast at this election the commissioners were summoned to appear before the district judge, and were unable consequently to attend and make the canvass. But afterwards, and on the twenty-sixth of September, 1873, they met, canvassed the votes, and declared Elk Falls to have received the majority, and to be the county-seat. At the canvass of the votes cast at the first election the commissioners rejected some of the returns, and thereby changed the result; for, if all the votes had been canvassed, Boston and Elk Falls would have received the highest number of votes, and been the competitors at the second election. Subsequently one of the justices of this court issued an alternative writ of mandamus, commanding said commissioners to canvass the entire vote cast at said first election, or show cause, on the first Tuesday of January, 1874, why they did not. On the *491 receipt of this *alternative writ the commissioners met on the twenty-ninth of October, 1873, canvassed the entire vote, declared Boston and Elk Falls to have received the highest vote, and to be the competitors at a new election ordered to be held on the eleventh of November. On the eleventh of November, in obedience to this call, an election was held, and Boston received the majority, and was declared by the commissioners the county-seat. All the county officers but the county clerk, the plaintiff in error, hold their offices at Elk Falls. He moved his to Boston after the last canvass, and this action was to compel him to move it back to Elk Falls.

Upon these facts counsel for plaintiff in error claim, "(1) that a partial canvass of the votes cast at the first election is not a compliance with the law; (2) that a canvass of the entire vote is essential to the validity of the second election; and (3) that proclamation of the result, and notice of the time of holding the second election, is necessary to make such election valid; and, all these elements being wanting in this case, that Elk Falls takes nothing by the second election." In reference to the last point it may be said that it is very doubtful whether the omission of the sheriff to give notice of any election would vitiate that election, provided the people generally participated in it. And again, while section 10 of the act respecting county-seat elections (Gen. St. 298) declares that all such elections "shall be conducted in all respects as provided for by the general election laws of the state," yet the provisions in the latter laws concerning notices seem inapplicable. The sheriff is to give, "ten days before the holding of any special election, * * * public notice by proclamation, * * * one copy of which shall be posted up at each of the places where the elections are appointed to be held, and inserted in some newspaper published in the county, if any be published therein." By the county-seat election law, § 6, the commissioners are to meet on the Saturday succeeding the first election to make the canvass; and by section 7, if a second election is necessary, it is to be held on the second Tuesday thereafter. The *492 day of the *canvass is thus itself only the tenth day before the day of the election. The practical difficulties in the way of giving the notice indicate that the legislature did not intend to make that essential to the validity of such second election.

The other is, however, the more important and difficult question. Suppose that the commissioners ignorantly or willfully reject a part of the returns of the first election, and in consequence declare that A. and B. have received the highest vote, and are therefore the candidates at the second election, when in truth and upon a full canvass A. and C. received the highest vote, and are entitled to be the subsequent candidates, what remedy, if any, has C.? Can the commissioners thus nullify the will of the people? and if not, how can the wrong be righted? It may be that there is no direct, full, and adequate remedy; that it is one of those wrongs which can only indirectly be remedied. Perhaps in case of glaring omission or misconduct, the friends of the candidate improperly left out might ignore the canvass of the commissioners, and vote for that place on the second election, and thus right the wrong. But this, if legal, would manifestly come far short of being adequate, because many would be loth to believe wrong or mistake on the part of the canvassers, and would be controlled by their proclamation of the result rather than by any evidence which in the brief time intervening could be collected and presented to the voters at large. Mandamus will lie to compel a correct canvass; but whether it will lie after the dissolution of the canvassing board is a question perhaps doubtful under the authorities. People v. Supervisors of Greene, 12 Barb. 217; Hadley v. City of Albany, 33 N. Y. 603; S. C. in Bright. Elect. Cas. 307; Bowen v. Hixon, 45 Mo. 340; People v. Hilliard, 29 Ill. 413. These authorities seem clearly to show that a canvassing board, having met at the legal time and place, made the canvass, and adjourned, cannot of their own will thereafter come together and make a second canvass.

Their powers are exhausted by the first action. If, however, *498 the board has not met, or having met, *has refused to act, its action can be compelled. Hagerty v. Arnold, 13 Kan. *367.

Doubtless the correctness of the canvass, at least of the final election, can be determined in mandamus proceedings under section 2, c. 79, Acts 1871, (Laws 1871, p. 191,) and section 7, as amended in 1872, (Laws 1872, p. 271, § 1.) But these mandamus proceedings do not run against the canvassers, and are not directly to compel a recanvass. But, whatever may be the rule as to the power of the court by direct proceeding to compel a recanvass after the dissolution of the canvassing board, it seems to us that any proceedings to compel such recanvass as to the first election should be had before the second. In other words, parties cannot accept the canvass of the first election as correct, enter into the contests of the second upon the basis of such prior canvass, and then, when disappointed in the result of the second election, obtain a recanvass of the first, or contest the result of the second on the ground of an incorrect canvass of the first. This, while it has manifest fairness on its side, seems also warranted by the legislation of 1872 above cited. That amendment, after declaring that in any action or proceeding under the act the validity of the election, and of any votes cast or refused at such election, may be inquired into, adds this proviso: "Provided, however, that in no case shall the validity of any election be inquired into beyond the one last had, and upon which the proceeding is based." This proviso, which was first added in that year, contemplates proceedings in which two elections are provided for as sometimes necessary to a final determination; and the only proceedings named in the act requiring two elections are county-seat elections. It therefore obviously refers to such elections, and plainly indicates that a contest made after the second election must be limited to that election. It is true that the proceedings named in the act are not directly to compel a recanvass, and a proviso cannot be extended beyond the reach of that to which it is a proviso. Yet this is evidence of the legislative will in the matter, and sustains us in the *494 conclusions otherwise reached. It seems *to us therefore that the second meeting and canvass by the commissioners of the votes cast at the first election availed nothing, and that, no proceedings having been taken to correct the first canvass prior to the second election, all parties must be held concluded by that canvass. It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the court below is correct, and must be affirmed.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J. I think perhaps the decision of this case is correct, but still I have no doubt of the power of any proper court to allow a writ of mandamus to be issued to compel a board of canvassers to canvass or recanvass election returns where such board has in the first instance neglected or refused to canvass the same, or to canvass some definite and ascertainable portion thereof. And this I think may be done, although a particular day is fixed by law for the canvass, and the board has met on that day, and canvassed a portion of the returns and adjourned. The canvassing board are simply ministerial officers, having no judicial power, and therefore, when they neglect or refuse to canvass election returns, they thereby create a cause of action against themselves, to-wit, the action of mandamus, and they cannot, merely by an adjournment of their board, defeat or destroy that cause of action.

D. R. ANTHONY v. R. F. HERMAN and others.

January Term, 1875.

Contract: Consideration: Promise to Third Party. An action can be maintained upon a promise made by a defendant, upon valid consideration, to a third party, for the benefit of the plaintiff, although the plaintiff was not privy to the consideration.<sup>1</sup>

*495 *Error from Cloud district court.

Action by Anthony against Mark J. Kelley, R. F. Herman, and four others, on a certain contract. Kelley made default. Herman and the other four defendants demurred, and their demurrer was sustained at the August term, 1873. The facts are stated in the brief of plaintiff, and in the opinion.

<sup>1</sup>Whatever may be the rule in other states, it is well settled in this state that third parties not privy to a contract, nor privy to the consideration thereof, may sue upon the contract to enforce any stipulations made for their especial benefit

Byron Sherry, for plaintiff in error.

On the twenty-second of July, 1870, Kelley made his promissory note, payable to one Young, for the sum of $435, with interest, which note was by said Young indorsed and delivered to Anthony. To secure the payment of the note Kelley, on the twentieth of August, 1871, executed and delivered to Anthony a chattel mortgage on one Washington hand-press, ten thousand pounds type, office fixtures, and good-will in and appertaining to the Republican Valley Watchman, a paper printed and published in the city of Clyde, Cloud county, with the usual conditions, which chattel mortgage was filed in the office of the register of deeds of Cloud county. The lien obtained by virtue of the chattel mortgage was continued by the making and filing of the necessary affidavit. Kelley in the mean time sold the mortgaged property to Nat. Baker and Samuel Enfield, with the understanding and agreement that they would pay the note in the hands of Anthony. Upon their failure to do so, Kelley instituted suit against them for the possession of the mortgaged property, and it was during the pendency of the suit of Kelley that the defendants in this action, in consideration that Kelley would dismiss and discontinue the prosecution of the case commenced by him, executed and delivered the bond now sued upon. The bond was an obligation to assume the payment of the note to Anthony; and Kelley, in consideration of this bond of indemnity, turned over to the defendants the property mentioned. It was a consideration passing between Kelley and defendants, by which they agreed to pay the note.

The demurrer was interposed upon the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and upon the theory that defendants had not agreed in writing with Anthony. The only point in the case is, was the promise of defendants, as set forth in the bond, sufficient upon which to maintain an action by the plaintiff? Or, in other words, was the bond, as between plaintiff and defendants, void for want of consideration? The rule as laid down in the case of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, is that an action will lie on a promise made by a defendant, upon valid consideration, to a third person, for the benefit of the plaintiff, although the plaintiff was not privy to the consideration. Such promise is to be deemed made to the plaintiff, if adopted by him, though he was not a party nor cognizant of it when made. That was a case where money was borrowed and paid over to a third party upon the promise that this third party should pay a certain indebtedness of the party making the loan, and interest. Life Assur. Soc. v. Welch, 26 Kan. 642; Brenner v. Luth, 28 Kan. 588; Strong v. Marcy, 33 Kan. 109; S. C. 5 Pac. Rep. 866. Rights of beneficiary to sue, see full notes to Winninghoff v. Wittig, 24 N. W. Rep. 914; Baker v. Elgin, 8 Pac. Rep. 280.

BREWER, J. This was an action commenced in the district court of Cloud county, by D. R. Anthony, as plaintiff, on a certain bond, of which the following is a copy:

"Know all men by these presents that I, Mark J. Kelley, of Osborne county, Kansas, in consideration of R. F. Herman, B. V. Honey, F. K. Teter, David Keller, and E. Kennedy assuming the payment of a certain chattel mortgage given by the said Mark J. Kelley, to D. R. Anthony, dated August 20, 1871, and filed August 30, 1871, in Cloud county, Kansas, and holding the said Mark J. Kelley harmless and indemnified therefrom, which by the said R. F. Herman, B. V. Honey, F. K. Teter, David Keller, and E. Kennedy is agreed, as is shown by their becoming parties hereto, and signing these presents, *497 and in consideration of one *dollar in hand paid, do hereby sell, assign, transfer, and set over unto the said R. F. Herman, B. V. Honey, F. K. Teter, David Keller, and E. Kennedy the following described property, viz., one Washington hand-press, and all the type, being about four hundred pounds of type, and one lot of office fixtures, being the same which were formerly in and about the office of the Republican Valley Watchman, heretofore published at Clyde, Cloud county, Kansas. Witness our hands and seals at Concordia, June 24, 1872.

"R. F. HERMAN.	[Seal.]	MARK J. KELLEY.	[Seal.]
"B. V. HONEY.	[Seal.]	F. K. TETER.	[Seal.]
"DAVID KELLER.	[Seal.]	E. KENNEDY."	[Seal.]

A demurrer was sustained to the petition, and of this ruling plaintiff in error complains. No brief has been filed by counsel for defendants in error, so we are not advised as to the point upon which the district court placed its ruling. Counsel for plaintiff in error states in his brief that the only question in the case was whether the promise of the defendants, as set forth in the bond, was sufficient to sustain an action by the plaintiff, and it seems probable that the ruling was based upon this question. In it, we think, the court erred. That the defendants received ample consideration, is evident. Indeed, if none were expressed, the promise in writing imports a consideration, under our statutes. For this consideration they agreed to assume the payment of the chattel mortgage to plaintiff. True, the consideration of this promise did not proceed from the plaintiff; but, notwithstanding some conflict in the authorities, we think the rule is settled that an action will lie on a promise made by a defendant, upon valid consideration to a third party, for the benefit of the plaintiff, although the plaintiff was not privy to the consideration. Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 385, 388; Schemerhorn v. Vanderheyden, 1 Johns. 140; Cleaveland v. Farley, 9 Cow. 639; Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 45; Delaware & Hudson C. Co. v. Westchester Bank, 4 Denio, 97; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268; Arnold v. Lyman, 17 Mass. 400; Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575; Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Metc. 381; Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337. But *498 see, on the other hand, **Mellen v. Whipple*, 1 Gray, 317. It may be proper to state that Kelley, one of the parties to this agreement, is not party to the controversy in this court, he not having joined in the demurrer below.

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer.

DAVID S. RICE v. SOPHIA NAGLE.

January Term, 1875.

Trespass: Injuries Committed by Cattle: Fence. Where roaming cattle, belonging to one person, break through a lawful fence, enter upon the land of another, and there commit injuries, the owner of the land may recover from the owner of the cattle for such injuries, notwithstanding such land may not have been entirely surrounded by a lawful fence.

Error from Jackson district court.

Sophia Nagle sued Rice to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's growing crops. On appeal to the district court the case was there tried at the January term, 1872. The following instruction was given: "If, however, you find from the evidence that the cattle belonging to the defendant did break into and enter the inclosed land of the plaintiff, and injure her fence, or growing crops, you will decide from the evidence whether, at the places where said cattle broke in, the plaintiff had a legal and sufficient fence. Then, if at those places she had a legal and sufficient fence, she is entitled to recover; and you will then ascertain from the evidence what injury was done by said cattle to the fence and crops, and return a verdict *499 for the plaintiff for that amount." *The defendant asked the court to give the following instruction, which was refused: "Before the plaintiff can recover in this action the jury must find from the evidence that cattle belonging to the defendant, or in his charge, did break into and enter the inclosed land of the plaintiff, and injure her fence, or her growing crops, and that at that time the plaintiff's field or inclosure was surrounded by a legal and sufficient fence."

Verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $33 damages, and judgment on the verdict for such damages, and for $220.85 costs.

Martin, Burns & Case, for plaintiff in error.

Hopkins & Hayden, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. The only question presented by the record in this case is as follows: Where roaming cattle, belonging to one person, break through a lawful fence, enter upon the land of another, there commit injuries, can the owner of the land recover from the owner of the cattle for such injuries, notwithstanding such land may not have been entirely surrounded by a lawful fence? This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

WILSON C. TURNER and others v. OSCAR CRAWFORD and another.

January Term, 1875.

1. Judgments: Setting Off: Rule Stated. Where two persons have judgments against each other, either may maintain an action against the other to have the two judgments compensate, and pay each other up to the amount of the smaller judgment.
- *500 *2. ———. And where C. and T. have judgments against each other, and C. assigns his judgment to B. as collateral security to secure the payment of a debt, and B. afterward assigns it back to C., held, that as C. never parted with his entire interest in the judgment, he may, after the reassignment of the judgment to him, maintain an action against T. to have one judgment compensate the other, up to the amount of the smaller judgment.
3. Attorney's Lien: Subject to the Right to Set Off Judgments. And in such a case, where T., after C.'s judgment was rendered, assigned his judgment to H., and H., also after C.'s judgment was rendered, had obtained an attorney's lien on said T.'s judgment, held, that neither such assignment to H., nor the attorney's lien of H., nor both together, can destroy or defeat the right of C. to have one judgment compensate and pay the other up to the amount of the smaller judgment.
4. ———. The case of Leavenson v. Lafontane, 3 Kan. *523, is considered and overruled, so far as relates to attorney's liens.

Error from Wyandotte district court.

Action by Oscar Crawford and James T. Johnson, plaintiffs, against Wilson C. Turner, Hadley & Glick, and William B. Bowman, as defendants. The object was to compel a compensation of the judgments which Turner had recovered at the October term, 1871, of said district court against said Crawford, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $261.65, debt and costs, against a judgment which Crawford had recovered against Turner in the same court, at its June term, 1870, for the sum of $511.95, debt and costs, and that Crawford have judgment for the balance. Said suits of Turner against Crawford had been commenced originally before a justice of the peace, where judgment was given in favor of Turner. Crawford appealed both cases to the district court, and Johnson became his surety in the appeal-bonds. After the issuance of executions (from the district court) on said judgments in favor of Turner, and the return thereon of "no goods," Turner, with Hadley & Glick, (who claimed an interest in said judgments as assignees,) commenced an action as plaintiffs before Bowman, a justice of the peace, against Crawford and Johnson, on said appeal-bonds. This action was thereupon commenced by Crawford and Johnson, and a part of the relief de-*501 manded was that the defend*ants should be forever enjoined from prosecuting their action on said appeal-bonds. Trial at the October term, 1872. The district court found generally in favor of the plaintiffs, and gave judgment in their favor, and against the defendants, as prayed for in their petition.

VALENTINE, J. It would seem from the record in this case that in 1870 Crawford and Turner each had claims for money against the other. Judgments were subsequently rendered on these claims,—one in favor of Crawford and against Turner, and two in favor of Turner and against Crawford. The judgment in favor of Crawford was greater in amount than both of the judgments in favor of Turner. Afterwards, said Crawford and one Johnson, as plaintiffs, commenced this action against Turner and the other plaintiffs in error for the purpose of having the Turner judgments applied (so far as they would go) in partial payment of the Crawford judgment, and also for the purpose of perpetually enjoining the collection of the Turner judgments. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, (Crawford and Johnson,) as prayed for in their petition, and the defendants below (Turner and others) now bring the case to this court. If no assignment of any of said claims or said judgments had been made, or if no right of third persons had intervened, we suppose such an action as this might properly be maintained. And in such a case the judgment rendered by the court below would be upheld by this court.

But it is claimed by the plaintiffs in error (defendants below) that said judgments were assigned, and that the right of third persons had intervened, before this suit was commenced. The plaintiffs in error claim that the Crawford judgment was assigned to Bartlett & *502 Hale, and that the *Turner judgments were assigned to Hadley & Glick, and that Hadley & Glick also had an attorney's lien upon said last-mentioned judgments. Now, as Crawford is seeking to have the Turner judgments and his judgment compensate each other to the amount of the Turner judgments, it would certainly seem necessary that Crawford should still be the owner of the Crawford judgment. A previous assignment by him of all his interest in the Crawford judgment would certainly destroy his right to have it pay and cancel the Turner judgments. But did he so assign the same? As the record is brought to this court we cannot say that he did. The findings of the court below were general, and in favor of the plaintiffs, Crawford and Johnson, and against the defendants, Turner and others. The findings of the court below were therefore, in effect, that no such assignment was made. And we cannot say that the findings were not supported by sufficient evidence. The evidence undoubtedly tends to show that Crawford at one time assigned his said judgment to Bartlett & Hale, and that Bartlett & Hale afterwards, but before the commencement of this suit, assigned the judgment back to Crawford. But what kind of an assignment was this? Did Crawford assign said judgment to Bartlett & Hale merely as a collateral security for a debt, and himself still retain an interest in the judgment, or did he assign the judgment absolutely? The evidence does not show what kind of an assignment was made, with any degree of certainty. It tends, however, to show that the assignment was merely as a collateral security for a debt. Crawford himself testified "that in the spring of 1871 he assigned his judgment against Turner for $403.25 to Bartlett & Hale to secure fees he owed them, and the same was not assigned back to him until just before the commencement of this suit." Now, if the assignment of the judgment to Bartlett & Hale was merely an assignment to secure attorney's fees, and was not an absolute assignment of all the property in the judgment, then we think that Crawford had the right after the judgment was reassigned to him to commence this action. *And under the evidence and the findings of the court below we must consider that the assignment was made merely to secure attorney's fees, and not as an absolute assignment.

We do not think that the assignment of the Turner judgments to Hadley & Glick, or their attorney's lien on said judgments, can make any difference in this case. Crawford's claim and judgment existed prior to the Turner judgments, prior to the said assignment to Hadley & Glick, and prior to their attorney's lien. Turner could therefore not assign his judgments, nor the claims upon which they were rendered, nor incumber such claims or such judgments with attorney's liens, or any other kind of liens, so as to defeat Crawford's right to have his judgment or his claim compensate and pay the Turner judgments or claims. A judgment is not like negotiable paper. It may be assigned, but will still be subject to all the defenses, counter-claims, or set-offs which the judgment debtor might, at the time of the assignment, have against it. This right of Crawford to have his judgment compensate and pay the Turner claims and judgments existed from the time the Crawford judgment was rendered down to the present time, and still exists, except that possibly, during the time the Crawford judgment was pledged to Bartlett & Hale to secure attorney's fees, Crawford's right to so use said judgment would have been subject to the consent of Bartlett & Hale. If Turner had not assigned his judgments, or incumbered them with attorney's liens, his right to have his demand compensate that of Crawford up to the amount of his demand would have existed, notwithstanding the assignment of the Crawford judgment to Bartlett & Hale.

The view we have taken of this case is in accordance with our statutes. An action may be maintained in this state on a domestic judgment. Burnes v. Simpson, 9 Kan. *658. If either Turner or Crawford had commenced an action against the other on his judgment, the other could have set up his judgment as a set-off, (Gen. St. 648, 649, §§ 94, 98;) and section 100 of the Code provides that *504 "when cross-demands have *existed between persons under such circumstances that, if one had brought an action against the other, a counter-claim or set-off could have been set up, neither can be deprived of the benefit thereof by the assignment or death of the other, but the two demands must be deemed compensated, so far as they equal each other." Gen. St. 649. The view that we have taken of this case is also in accordance with equitable principles. So far as this decision conflicts with the decision made in the case of Leavenson v. Lafontane, 3 Kan. *523, that decision is overruled.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

ST. JOSEPH & D. C. R. Co. v. THOMAS CASEY.

January Term, 1875.

1. Attachment: Discharged by Defendant's Appeal. Where a case in a justice's court, in which an attachment has been issued and levied upon property of the defendant, is taken by the defendant on appeal to the district court, the attachment is thereby discharged, and the attached property should be delivered to the defendant.
2. ——: Motion to Discharge: Effect of Appeal. In such a case, where a motion which had previously been made in the justice's court to discharge the attachment, and there overruled, was "called up" by the defendant in the district court, and affidavits offered to be read in support thereof, held, that such motion could not rightfully be entertained by the district court, and therefore that the district court did not err in refusing to permit the affidavits to be read, and in overruling the motion.

3. ———: Costs on. And in such a case, although a motion might properly have been made in the district court to tax the costs made on the attachment against the plaintiff, because the attachment was wrongfully obtained, yet said motion "to discharge the attachment" could not be considered merely a motion to tax the costs of the attachment, and especially not, as the motion was "called up" before the trial in the district court was commenced.

Casey, as plaintiff, had judgment, at the June term of the district court, 1874, for $112.20, and costs, and the railroad company brings the case here on error.

John Doniphan, for plaintiff in error.

Nathan Price and W. D. Webb, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This action was originally commenced by Thomas Casey against the St. Joseph & Denver City Railroad Company before a justice of the peace. An attachment was issued in the case. From the record we learn that, on the day set for trial, the "case was called, and parties appeared, and the defendant, by its attorneys, Messrs. Hawkins & Baldwin, filed affidavit and motion to discharge the attachment issued in this case. Motion was argued by counsel, and thereupon the said motion was overruled by the court upon the ground that plaintiff did not (in the opinion of the court) have reasonable notice of the filing of the same, as the law contemplates." Now, suppose that reasonable notice of said motion was in fact given, and still there is nothing to show that the motion should have been sustained. What did the motion or the affidavit contain, and whose affidavit was it? Was it the affidavit of Casey, Hawkins, Baldwin, or some one else? The justice of the peace rendered judgment in favor of Casey, and against the railroad company, for $200.55, and costs, and ordered that the attached property be sold to satisfy said judgment. The railroad company then appealed to the district court. We suppose the appeal-bond was an ordinary appeal-bond, but we cannot tell, as no copy of the same is given in the record. What, then, became of the attached property? The record does not show, but we would infer from the briefs of counsel

- *506 *that it was delivered by the officer to the railroad company. This we think was right.

Section 52 of the justices' act provides that "if the defendant, or other person in his behalf, at any time before judgment, cause an undertaking to be executed to the plaintiff by one or more sureties, resident in the county, to be approved by the justice, in double the amount of the plaintiff's claim, to be stated in his affidavit, to the effect that the defendant shall perform the judgment of the justice, the attachment in such action shall be discharged, and restitution made of any property taken under it, or the proceeds thereof. Such undertaking shall also discharge the liability of a garnishee in such action for any property of the defendant in his hands." Gen. St. 787. Section 213 of the Civil Code is precisely like the foregoing section of the justices' act, except the words which we have put in italics are changed as follows: "in" is changed to "on;" "justice" is changed in two places to "court;" and "to be" is changed to "as." The appeal-bond, where the defendant appeals, is in spirit substantially the same as the bond mentioned in the foregoing sections. Section 121 of the justices' act provides that "the party appealing shall, within ten days from rendition of the judgment, enter into an undertaking to the adverse party, with at least one good and sufficient surety, to be approved by such justice, in a sum not less than fifty dollars in any case, nor less than double the amount of the judgment and costs, conditioned—First, that the appellant will prosecute his appeal to effect, and without unnecessary delay; second, that, if judgment be rendered against him on the appeal, he will satisfy such judgment and costs. Such undertaking need not be signed by the appellant." Gen. St. 800.

Now, as the defendant who appeals gives ample security for the prosecution of his appeal to effect, and for the payment of any judgment that may be rendered against him, it would seem to be hardly necessary that the attachment should continue any longer in force. And as no provision is made by law for the officer who holds the attached property at the time the appeal is taken to turn the property over to some officer of the district court, it would hardly seem *507 that it was *intended that the district court should take charge of the attached property. And it can hardly be supposed that after all the proceedings of the justice's court are taken by appeal to the district court, that any officer of the justice's court will continue to have possession and control of the attached property; and the appeal-bond, in spirit and substance, certainly answers all the requirements of section 52 of the justices' act, and section 213 of the Civil Code.

It has been held in this court that where a justice has discharged the attachment, and the plaintiff has appealed by filing an ordinary appeal-bond, the attachment is not thereby taken to the district court. Gates v. Sanders, 13 Kan. *411. The proceedings of the district court with regard to the attachment issued in this case will appear from the following quotations from the record brought to this court: "Be it remembered that, on the call of the above [case] action for trial, defendant called up the motion to discharge attachment made in the court below, and read the said motion and affidavit of H. C. Hawkins, as follows: [Here follows motion and affidavit of Hawkins.] No motion was made in this court to discharge attachment. The defendant then read the following notice of filing counter-affidavits, [here follows notice;] and tendered and offered to read the affidavits of L. D. Suthill and E. H. Saville filed in said action in this court, which affidavits are in the following words, [here follow affidavits of Suthill and Saville;] but the court refused to hear the affidavits read, and overruled the motion, which order is in the following words and figures: '[Title, etc.] The motion of said defendant to discharge attachment in this case being argued by counsel, the court, upon due consideration, overruled said motion;' to which defendant duly excepted. To all of said rulings of the court, in refusing to hear the affidavits read, to discharge, and in disallowing said motion, the defendant then and there duly excepted."

The parties then proceeded with the trial, and the court, at the close of the trial, rendered judgment in the following words, to-wit:

"It is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court *508 here that the said plaintiff have and recover of and *from the said defendant the said sum of $112.20, and interest as aforesaid, and also his costs in and about this suit expended, taxed at $——, and that execution issue therefor;" to all of which the defendant then and there excepted.

It is not stated in the record why the district court refused to hear said affidavits read, nor why the court overruled said motion to discharge said attachment. But we would infer from the briefs of counsel that the same was so done because the court considered the attachment discharged by the appeal-bond. If this was the view of the court below, we think the court below was right. When the railroad company gave the appeal-bond we think the company became entitled to the immediate custody of the attached property, and we presume, from the briefs of counsel, that it immediately obtained such custody. The district court did not make any order with reference to said attached property. This we think was right.

But it is claimed by the railroad company that the attachment was wrongfully obtained; that costs accrued thereon; and that judgment has been wrongfully rendered against the company for such costs. This, in fact, is the only ruling of the court below of which the plaintiff now complains as substantial error. Now, in our opinion, the entire judgment of the justice of the peace was wholly vacated by the appeal and trial and judgment in the district court. The attachment was also discharged by the appeal. The question of damages for the wrongful suing out of the attachment cannot be heard in this case; and hence the question of who shall pay the costs which have accrued on the attachment is the only question left having any connection with the attachment proceedings which could have been heard by the district court in this case. And this question, we think, should have been submitted to the district court, if any ruling were desired upon the question. Nothing that transpired either in the justice's court, or the district court, would have precluded the defendant from submitting the question to the district court.

*509 But the defendant did not *submit the question to that court in any proper mode. A motion made in the justice's court to discharge the attachment, and "called up" in the district court, where no such motion could rightfully be entertained, can hardly be construed to be a motion made in the district court to tax costs; and especially not as the motion was "called up" in the district court before the trial in that court was commenced. And although the court below rendered judgment against the defendant for the costs of the plaintiff in general, yet it does not seem that any costs—those on the attachment, or others—have ever yet been taxed. Except for the affidavits of Hawkins, Suthill, and Saville, it would appear from the record that the costs of the attachment should be taxed against the defendant below. And as these affidavits were merely read, or offered to be read, on a motion which the district court could not rightfully entertain, we think the affidavits can hardly be considered as in the case. If the defendant had offered to read them upon a motion to tax the costs of the attachment against the plaintiff, the plaintiff would probably have opposed them with counter-affidavits.

The judgment will be affirmed.

JOSEPH R. NELSON v. JOHN C. BECKER.

January Term, 1875.

Judgment: Voidable Judgment: Justices' Courts. A judgment of a justice of the peace, rendered upon a service of summons made only two days prior to the rendering of such judgment, is not void, but only voidable, and must be held valid and binding in all cases until reversed, vacated, or set aside by some direct proceeding instituted for that purpose.<sup>1</sup>

*510 *Error from Butler district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

R. M. Ruggles, for plaintiff in error.

H. T. Sumner and A. J. Miller, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. The principal, if not the only, question involved in this case, is whether a judgment of a justice of the peace, rendered upon a service of summons made only two days prior to the time of rendering such judgment, is to be deemed valid and binding, when attacked collaterally, or whether such a judgment must be deemed void in all cases. We think that such a judgment is never void, but only voidable, and must be held valid and binding in all cases until reversed, vacated, or set aside by some direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. It is not like a judgment rendered upon no service. The service was good, except that it was made only two days before the time set for trial, while it should have been at least three days before that time. Gen. St. 777; Justices' Act, § 12.

The service was merely irregular, it was not no service, or a void service, and a judgment rendered thereon was not void, but, at most, was only voidable. Ballinger v. Tarbell, 16 Iowa, 491; Freem. Judgm. § 126. See, also, in this connection, Dutton v. Hobson, 7 Kan. *196; Armstrong v. Grant, 7 Kan. *285; Claypoole v. Houston, 12 Kan. *324, *327; Meisse v. McCoy's Adm'r, 17 Ohio St. 225.

In the present case the facts are these: One C. W. Donaldson sued one William Hoy before a justice of the peace, and obtained an order of attachment. The summons and order of attachment were issued on October 14, 1872. Both were made returnable on *511 October 25th. The order was served on *the same day that it was issued, by levying the same on some corn standing in a field. The summons was served, as appears from the record, on October 25th, but from the brief of the defendant in error we suppose it was served October 23d. It probably, however, makes but little difference whether it was served on the 23d or 25th, as it was served and returned before the case was called for trial. The summons and the order of attachment were both returned on October 25th. The plaintiff appeared for trial, but the defendant did not appear. The justice then, upon the evidence of the plaintiff, rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and against the defendant. The attached property was afterwards sold at constable's sale to satisfy this judgment, and Nelson, the plaintiff in error in this case, (defendant below,) bought it. Nelson afterwards took the corn away. Becker, the defendant in error, (plaintiff below,) also claimed to own the corn. He claimed that he purchased it direct from the said William Hoy, the judgment debtor, before said suit was commenced against Hoy. He also claimed that he had possession and control of the ground on which said corn stood. He therefore commenced this action against Nelson for entering the premises and taking away said corn. It was shown on the trial of this case that Hoy did in fact, at one time, own the corn. He had a lease of the ground, and raised the corn, and was to pay one-half of the corn raised for the use of the premises. Nelson did not take away more than one-half of the corn. It was also shown on the trial that Becker, subsequent to the time when he claims to have purchased said corn from Hoy, admitted and stated to various witnesses, and at different times, that Hoy owned the corn. Nelson then offered to introduce a transcript of judgment, and the proceedings connected therewith, for the purpose of showing that he, Nelson, had obtained all the interest in said corn that Hoy ever had; but the court below excluded the evidence, and afterwards, on the other evidence, rendered judgment in favor of Becker, and against Nelson.

We think the court below erred in excluding said evidence. It *512 was competent and material, and *should have been received.

The only ground for excluding it seems, from the brief of defendant in error, to have been said irregular service of summons, which we have already discussed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

KANSAS PAC. RY. CO. v. MARGARET SALMON, Adm'x.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

1. Amendments: Pleading: Amending Petition: Changing Nature of Claim. This action was brought by Margaret Salmon, as administratrix of the estate of Daniel Salmon, deceased, against the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, under section 422 of the Civil Code, for damages resulting from the death of said Daniel, claimed to have been wrongfully caused by the said railway company. In the original petition it was alleged that Salmon was killed through the negligence of the railway company while he was being transported by them as a passenger, but afterwards the petition was so amended as to make it allege that Salmon was killed through the negligence of the railway company while he was being transported by them as an employe of the company. Held, that the court below did not err in allowing said amendment to be made.
2. ———. A pleading may be amended by inserting allegations material to the case, and every material amendment of a petition must of necessity change more or less the nature of the cause of action.
3. Evidence: Railroads: Non-Residence of Officials. In an action against a railway company to recover damages for wrongfully causing the death of an employe, it is not error to admit testimony which tends to show that the president and directors of such railway company reside in other states, and give very little personal attention to the operating of the road.
4. ———: Incompetency of Conductors and Engineers. It is not error for the court to admit testimony tending to show incompetency on the part of conductors and engineers of colliding trains.
- *518 *5. Negligence: Contributory: Question of Fact: Effect of Verdict. A verdict that the death of the deceased "was caused by the gross negligence of the defendant, without any fault" of said deceased, is substantially an affirmative finding that the deceased, during the whole transaction resulting in his death, exercised due care and diligence to protect himself from injury, and to do his duty towards his employer.
6. Verdicts in Supreme Court: Approval by Trial Court. Where a jury return a verdict against the weight or preponderance of the testimony, and the trial court, upon a motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial because the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence, approves such verdict, and gives judgment thereon, if there is

The defendant in error, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, Daniel Salmon, brought suit against the Kansas Pacific Railway Company to recover damages sustained by the widow and heirs of said deceased by reason of his death. The action was commenced in October, 1871, and was here on error two years ago, and will be found reported in 11 Kan. *83, where a full statement of the facts, agreed and admitted, will be found in the statement and opinion. The original petition (11 Kan. *84) alleged that Daniel Salmon was a passenger, riding on defendant's cars, on their railroad, and that his death was caused by the gross carelessness and negligence of the defendant, by its agents and employes, and through no fault or want of care on the part of said Daniel. On being remanded to the district court, that court gave plaintiff leave to amend her petition. This was done. The substantial amendment was the omission of the allegation that the deceased was a passenger, and the inserting, in lieu thereof, an allegation that, "at the time of the death of said Daniel Salmon, the said Daniel was in the employ of said defendant as a locomotive engineer, and as such had charge of an engine from Brookville west, for one run west of said point; and that, by request and permission of said defendant, said Daniel and other employes of the said defendant were, *and had for a long time *514 been, accustomed to ride on the car on which the said Daniel was then being carried without other compensation than the good offices of said defendant and its employes toward each other; that the said Daniel had no office or duty to perform on said train, and no authority thereon; and that the death of the said Daniel Salmon was caused and produced by the gross negligence of said defendant." This amendment was objected to by defendant, "because and for the reasons—First, that the said amended petition substantially changes the cause of action of plaintiff; second, the cause of action stated in said amended petition is another and different cause of action from that alleged in the original petition filed in said cause; and, third, the cause of action on which this suit was brought is abandoned by the said amended petition, and a new cause of action substituted and alleged." The district court refused to strike off the amended petition. The answer was a general denial. Trial at the January term, 1874. An agreed statement of facts was filed, (the same as given in 11 Kan. *89, *90.)

Plaintiff called J. P. U. to testify as to place of residence of president and directors of the road, and what officers had personal charge and supervision in operating defendant's railroad. The depositions of the engineer of one of the colliding trains at the time of the collision, and the conductor of the other of said trains, were read, to show the condition of the road, negligence, want of care, and that the weather was foggy, etc. Another witness was called to prove the incompetency of one of the engineers, but he testified, on cross-examination, that said engineer (Sheldon) "operated his engine as well as the average engineers on the road."

Plaintiff then called W. H. Brownhill, who testified as follows:

"My occupation is that of locomotive engineer. Have been in that business twenty years. Am at present employed on the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, between Sedalia and State Line. From April to September, 1870, I was on the Kansas Pacific road, at Brookville, in charge of the round-house, as foreman. Brookville is 200 miles west of the Missouri river, and the terminus of the Kaw Valley division, and the Smoky Hill *division. Before that I had run an engine about four years on the K. P. road. I was appointed foreman by B. Marshall, who was division superintendent of the Smoky Hill division. I had a general supervision of everything at that point,—men and engines; to see that the engines were got ready, and that the men did their duty. I was on duty on the thirteenth of September, 1870. I knew Daniel Salmon. He occupied at that time the position of locomotive engineer on a freight train. He ran on the Smoky Hill division, from Brookville to Ellis. He was killed on the thirteenth of September, at Clear Creek, a point between Ellsworth and Brookville, on the line of the Kansas Pacific Railroad. I had last seen Salmon before he was killed, the night previous, at Brookville. His family resided at that time at Ellsworth. He had been home to visit his family, and I instructed him to return on the first train in the morning. His family was sick, and he had been up late at night, and he got into the caboose to ride back to his daily labor. I was not there, (at Ellsworth,) but know he went home from Brookville to Ellsworth the night of the 12th. I saw him last alive on the night of the twelfth of September, at Brookville; and saw him dead, in the forenoon, the next day, at Brookville. His body was brought in, I think, on the same train he was killed on. It was the first train coming east on the morning of the 13th. James Massey was the conductor of that train. E. M. Sheldon was the engineer. The morning of the 13th was very foggy,—more so than usual.

I had known James Massey, the conductor of the train on which the accident occurred, about a year or so. He was mostly employed as a brakeman; occasionally he ran as a conductor. He was not employed as a regular conductor, but occasionally ran a trip or two as a conductor. From my experience as an engineer on a railroad I should say I was capable of judging of the capacity of a man to run a train as conductor. I had no knowledge of Massey running trains as conductor; only an occasional trip, as I have stated. I should say he was not a fit man to run a train, from his lack of judgment and ability, and dissipation. I had known him on the road about a year. I mean by dissipation: that he was in the habit of drinking too much liquor,—getting drunk. I had seen him in that fix a great many times. I have not seen him drunk while on duty, because I had no chance to. He was away from me when on duty.

*516 *Smoky Hill division,—the same division that the accident occurred on by which Salmon lost his life. Marshall had the sole power to employ and discharge employes in that division. He was the chief officer of the company in that division,—the highest authority we knew of. I knew E. M. Sheldon. He was at that time engineer of a freight train. He was the engineer of the train on which Salmon was killed. I had known him then about two years and a half. He was fireman about two years, and engineer about six months. From my experience as a locomotive engineer, and my knowledge of E. M. Sheldon, I could form a judgment as to his capacity as an engineer. I considered him an incompetent man. He lacked judgment and ability in running an engine. He was strictly moral and temperate. He had no bad habits. Mr. Marshall asked me why the engineer that was running that engine could not do better. This was before the death of Salmon. My reply was that it wanted an engineer, that he was no engineer, and never would be, and he had better get rid of him. Those were my words to Mr. Marshall. This conversation between myself and the division superintendent in reference to Sheldon was about two months before Salmon's death. Mr. Sheldon was retained on the road, in the capacity of an engineer, after that statement to Mr. Marshall. He remained on the road from the time of that conversation till the death of Salmon in the capacity of engineer. It was a wood or construction train that collided with the train upon which Salmon was at the time he was killed. I know this, because I furnished the engineer to run it. The engineer of that train was J. W. Wever. He resides now at Beardstown, Ill. The wood train did not have any conductor that day. The accident by which Salmon lost his life occurred at Clear Creek. At that point the track is crooked, and the grade very steep,—probably 75 feet to the mile either way from where the accident happened.”

On cross-examination witness testified as follows: “I guess I was not the only competent man on that road. I don't know as Mr. Marshall was as competent to judge of the fitness of the men as I was. He had been a railroad man as long. He had a better opportunity of knowing the way Mr. Massey run on the road than I had. My principal business was at a particular point. I had charge of the engines and men there. I know Salmon was killed at Clear Creek, because the men came in and gave an account of an accident,—told me all about it. I was not there. I only know his *517 *family was sick by being told so,—they told me so, and he told me so. It was customary for Salmon, whenever he wanted to, to go home, when he got permission, and on any train he pleased.”

The cross-examination was very long, and went over the whole ground of his testimony in chief, and as to his means of knowledge, etc., which was oftentimes mere hearsay.

Defendant called E. M. Sheldon, who testified that he had been railroading since 1867; was a locomotive engineer, and as such engineer was in employ of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company from 1869 to 1872. He further testified: "I was the engineer of the train on which Salmon was riding when he was injured. The train was the regular freight, running between Ellis and Brookville. We left Ellis in the night-time, before the morning on which the accident happened. We were at Ellsworth at about daylight, and stayed about 25 minutes, and then started east. James Massey was conductor on the train. He had been running from Ellsworth to Sheridan, and from Brookville to Ellis, on the same division with me. Salmon was injured about one mile east of Summit siding, and about 15 miles from Brookville. The accident occurred about half after seven o'clock in the morning, near a place called Clear Creek. The train of which I was the engineer had broken in two. We had to stop to make a coupling. After the coupling was made the conductor gave a signal to back up to get a start at the hill, of which we were at the bottom. We had backed up about fifteen car lengths—were backing very slow, about four miles an hour—when I saw a train and engine approaching us from the west, (we were backing west.) I immediately put my engine in the forward motion, blew one whistle for brakes, and had my train stopped, or nearly so, when we were struck by the train that I had seen coming. I did not get off from my engine before they struck us, but immediately after left my engine, and ran to the scene of the wreck. The train I saw coming was approaching us on a down grade. It was a very dewy, foggy morning, and the rails wet. During the time I was backing, up to the time of the collision, any person in the caboose of the train could have safely got off from it onto the ground very easily, and without danger of being hurt. All the persons that were on the caboose except Salmon did get off. The caboose was situated at that time on the hind end of the train of which I was the engineer. The *518 train *which collided with mine was hauling wood, and was an irregular train. I was not aware that there was any such train on the track, and had no notice thereof. After coupling my train I do not think we could have ascended the grade without backing up to get the headway. The track was very slippery,—impossible for an engine to use any great amount of steam without slipping. Aside from blowing one whistle for brakes, I know of no efforts the approaching train made to stop. I heard them whistle for brakes. At the time of the collision I was on my engine. We can feel the effect of the stroke of a collision at the rear end of a train on the engine. The jar was not very heavy on the engine,—not as hard as I have seen it on engines backing into trains to make a coupling. No other person was injured on that train nor by the collision except Salmon. John Wever was the engineer of the train that collided with my train. I was on the road when he came onto the road, and at the time of the accident I had known him about two years. I think they did not have a conductor on the train. Wever is a competent engineer. Massey is a competent conductor. I think I was a competent engineer at that time. At the time of this collision, and for some time before, Brownhill was the foreman of the round-house at Brookville."

The deposition of B. Marshall, a witness for defendant, was read. He testified that he was one of the assistant superintendents upon defendant's railroad for more than three years before the fourteenth of September, 1870, and continued such superintendent until the winter of 1871; that at the time of the accident mentioned, and for several months prior thereto, he had been in the charge and superintendence of the division of the defendant's railroad between Brookville and Ellis, and of that part of the road where said accident occurred; that he was well acquainted with Sheldon, engineer, and Massey, conductor, of the train on which Salmon was injured; that he was also well acquainted with Wever, the engineer of the train colliding with the said train on which Salmon was; that he employed all of said persons; that he used due diligence in the employment of each of them; that he knew the qualifications of each of said persons, and that each of them was entirely competent for the business in which he was at that time engaged; that Sheldon was in all respects a competent engineer; that Massey was a competent conductor; and that both of them were competent, careful and temperate; that he never had any notice from Brownhill, or any other *519 *person, that either the said Sheldon, Massey, or Wever was incompetent or negligent, or that they were, or that either of them was, intemperate, or addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors.

M. D. Smith, a witness for defendant, testified that he was a locomotive engineer, and had been about ten years; had been on the Kansas Pacific Railroad ever since the spring of 1867. He had known E. M. Sheldon about five years. Sheldon's intelligence, habits of industry, competence to perform his duties, etc., were all good. He performed his duties well in every respect. Witness also testified that Massey was "called a good man," "did not neglect his business," etc.

Other testimony of like import was given on the part of the defendant. (The transcript is printed, and occupies two hundred pages.) The instructions given by the court of its own motion were very full. The defendant asked sixteen special instructions, of which all were given but the sixth and ninth, which are as follows:

"(6) Negligence cannot be inferred, but must be proved. The simple fact of the collision of these trains which caused the injury to Salmon is no evidence of negligence in this case on the part of defendant, although the employes in charge of said trains were negligent; and, before the jury can find the defendant guilty of negligence which caused the injury to Salmon, they must find that by the preponderance of the evidence the plaintiff has established—First, that some of the employes in charge of the colliding trains were guilty of negligence which caused the collision by which deceased was injured; second, that the employes whose negligence caused the injury were not fit and proper persons to hold the positions they then occupied, and that the defendant employed them without using due care to ascertain their qualifications and fitness for their several positions, and did not believe them to be competent for the same; and, third, that the person employing them did not, of his own knowledge, know them to be competent; and unless the jury find from the preponderance of the evidence that the defendant neglected some duty as above indicated, they must find that the defendant was not guilty of negligence."

"(9) If Salmon went into said caboose, and went to sleep, when *520 if he had been awake, and careful of his safety, he could *have left the car, and escaped injury, his so being asleep in said car is negligence which contributed directly to his own injury, and the jury are warranted in finding that his negligence proximately contributed to the injury which he received."

The jury returned a special verdict, stating the facts found by them; and they added to such finding "that if, as matter of law, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, we find for the plaintiff, and assess her damages at $9,600." New trial refused, and judgment on the verdict.

J. P. Usher, for plaintiff in error.

Stillings & Fenlon, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This is the second time that this action has been brought to this court. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Salmon, 11 Kan. *83. When here first it was reversed, and sent back to the court below, for a new trial. On being returned to that court the plaintiff below, (Margaret Salmon,) with leave of the court, but over the objections of the railway company, amended her petition. This is the first ruling of the court below now complained of as error. It is claimed that such ruling was erroneous because the amendment, as is claimed, changed substantially the cause of action and defense.

Section 139 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "The court may before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process, or proceeding by adding or striking out the name of any party, or correcting a mistake in the name of a party or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or conform the pleading or proceedings to the facts proved, when such amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense; and when any proceeding fails to conform, in any respect, to the provisions of this Code, the court may permit the same to be made conformable thereto by amendment." Gen. St. 655.

With the view that we have taken of the question now under consideration we do not think that it is necessary for us to determine whether the phrase, "when such amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense," applies to and qualifies all that precedes it, or whether it merely applies to and qualifies the words, "or conform the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved." That it does one or the other seems to be evident, and yet, whichever way we view it, we are led into serious difficulties. It is certain, however, as we think, that under said section any pleading may be amended by correcting any mistake therein, "or by inserting other allegations material to the case, when such amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense." In the present case we do not think that the amendment changes substantially the claim or defense. The action under the original petition was an action brought by Margaret Salmon, as administratrix of the estate of Daniel Salmon, deceased, against the railway company, under section 422 of the Civil Code, (Gen. St. 709,) for damages resulting from the death of said Daniel, wrongfully caused by said railway company, and the action as now prosecuted is still precisely the same. The parties are the same. The action is still prosecuted by the same plaintiff, in the same capacity, against the same defendant, for wrongfully causing the death of the same person, at the same time and place, by the same means, and in the same manner. The amendment is simply this: The original petition stated that Salmon was killed by the railway company while being transported by the company as a passenger. The amended petition states that he was killed by the railway company while being transported by them as an employee of the company. In all other respects the two petitions are alike. And as to the proof: Under the original petition the plaintiff had the right to prove that the death of Salmon was caused by the railway company through the negligence of any one or more of its servants, agents, or officers, superior or inferior. Under the amended petition the plaintiff had to show that the death was caused by the railway company through the negligence of some one or more of its superior agents, servants, or officers. Under the amended petition, if the death had been caused merely through the negligence of some fellow-servant,—some co-employee,—then the plaintiff could not recover. Dow v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., 8 Kan. *642; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Milliken, Id. *647; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Salmon, 11 Kan. *88. These are the only differences required in the proof. The amended petition simply restricts the plaintiff's right to recover by making it necessary for her to show that the death was caused through the negligence of some superior officer, agent, or servant of the company, instead of allowing her to show that it was caused through the negligence of any officer, agent, or servant of the company, superior or inferior, as the original petition did.

But suppose the amended petition has made such a change that the negligence required to be proved under it is the negligence of an entirely different set of officers, agents, or servants, from that required by the original petition, and still such a change does not necessarily change the cause of action or defense. It is not the officers, agents, or servants of the company that are sued, and it is not their negligence, as such, of which the plaintiff complains. But it is the railway company that is sued, and the negligence of the railway company, (through its officers, agents, or servants,) of which the plaintiff complains. It can certainly make but very little difference whether the railway company was guilty of negligence through one set of employes, or through some other set, for, if the company was guilty of negligence at all, it is liable for the same kind and character and amount of damages in one case as in the other; and in either case it devolves upon the plaintiff to show the negligence. The substantial question in the case is whether the company was guilty of negligence at all, and this was sufficiently charged in either petition.

But it is said that the contract under which a passenger is carried differs widely from the contract under which an employe is carried, and therefore that as the original petition alleged that Salmon was carried as a passenger, while the amended petition alleges that he was carried merely as an employe of the company, the cause of action must necessarily have been changed. This need not necessarily be so. In neither case would the obligation of the railway to carry Salmon safely rest wholly, or even mainly, upon the contract between the parties, but in each case it would rest principally upon the laws of the state. But, wherever it might rest, this action was not brought for any breach of contract. The action is not founded upon contract at all. It is more in the nature of an action of tort. It is an action for damages, resulting from a neglect on the part of the railway company to perform a duty imposed upon it by law. It is true, the contract may be shown. Indeed, it must be shown, not for the purpose of recovering for a breach of the contract, however, but incidentally, for the purpose of showing the status of the parties with relation to each other,—of showing the legal obligations resting upon each with respect to the other, and of determining whether either has been guilty of negligence or wrong towards the other. And whether Salmon was a passenger or an employe, the contract between him and the company must thus be incidentally shown merely for such purpose. The legal obligation resting upon railway companies to exercise care and diligence towards their employes does not differ so very much from the legal obligation resting upon them to exercise care and diligence towards their passengers, except in extent. It is the duty of a railway company towards both passengers and employes to see that all its officers, agents, and servants, of whatever grade, who have the power from the company to employ, retain, or discharge other employes, or who have the power from the company to furnish implements, machinery, or materials to the other employes, for them to operate with, shall exercise reasonable care and diligence in furnishing a sufficient number of competent employes for the work to be done, and in furnishing a sufficient number and amount of proper implements, machinery, and materials *524 for *the employes to operate with in accomplishing such work; and the company is liable to either passengers or employes for any injury resulting to them from any want of care or diligence in these respects. Laning v. New York Cent. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 521; Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co., 53 N. Y. 549. (The latter case is very much like the case at bar.)

These officers, agents, or servants of the company, upon whom such powers are bestowed, are what we would designate as the higher or superior officers, agents, or servants of the company; and these higher officers, agents, or servants cannot, with any degree of propriety, be termed fellow-servants with the other employes who do not possess any such extensive powers, and who have no choice but to obey such superior officers, agents, or servants. Such higher officers, agents, or servants must be deemed in all cases, when they act within the scope of their authority, to act for their principal, in the place of their principal, and, in fact, to be the principal. We also think that it is the duty of a railway company, with reference to both passengers and employes, to exercise reasonable care and diligence in making sufficient regulations for the safe running of trains, so as to avoid danger from collision, or from any other source. Shear. & R. Neg. § 93, and cases there cited. And a railway company is also responsible for the negligence of its higher or superior officers, agents, and servants, even to other employes, when they act within the scope of their authority. Thus far the duty of the railway company towards its passengers and employes is about the same, and here the similarity of duty probably ends. The duty towards employes here stops, while the duty towards passengers extends further. A railway company is not responsible to one employe for the negligence of another employe, where they are both engaged in the same common employment. But a railway company is always responsible to a passenger for the negligence of any employe. The grade of the employe within the particular employment does not generally make much difference.

If the employe performs the duties of one of the higher officers, *525 agents, or servants, of *which we have already spoken, the company is generally responsible for his negligence, whatever may be his grade. But if he is engaged in the same common employment with other employes, the company is generally not responsible for his negligence to the other employes, although he may be in fact the foreman for that particular work. The main issue in the present case is whether the railway company was guilty of negligence or not towards Salmon; and whether Salmon was a passenger, or merely an employe, is a question of fact, brought into the case merely for the purpose of showing the status of Salmon towards the company, and thereby of showing whether the things charged against the company amount to negligence or not, and, if they do amount to negligence, its nature and character. The fact of Salmon being a passenger, or an employe, is not the cause of action, or the foundation for the cause of action. The negligence of the company, whereby the injury occurred, may more properly be termed the foundation of the cause of action. The fact of Salmon being a passenger, or an employe, is simply one of the facts which enter into the description of the cause of action. It of course is a material fact. The allegation in the petition which sets it forth is a material allegation. But said section 139 of the Code authorizes a pleading to be amended "by inserting other allegations material to the case." Immaterial amendments need not be made at all, and every material amendment of a petition must of necessity change more or less the nature of the cause of action. But if the amendment does not change the cause of action, or the defense, from one thing to another, we think it may be made. That material amendments may be made, where the amendments are merely of facts descriptive of the cause of action, and do not change the cause of action from one thing to another, we would refer to the following authorities: Prater v. Snead, 12 Kan. *447, *449, and cases there cited; Spice v. Steinruck, 14 Ohio St. 213; Knapp v. Hartung, 73 Pa. St. 290. If the plaintiff should state a cause of action in a petition, and the defendant should take issue upon *526 one of the *facts only, stated therein, then whether the plaintiff could so amend his petition as to abandon that fact, and set up an entirely new and distinct fact, and thereby wholly change the issue, we are not called upon to decide, as such question is not in this case. In this case the defendant filed a general denial to the plaintiff's petition, denying every fact alleged by the plaintiff. Before passing from this subject it is proper to say that the power of trial courts to allow or refuse amendments to pleadings rests to some extent within the sound judicial discretion of such courts, and that appellate courts will seldom reverse the rulings of the trial courts in such cases unless such discretion has been abused. Therefore a decision of an appellate court, sustaining the ruling of a trial court where the amendment has been refused, is but very little evidence that the appellate court would reverse the ruling of the trial court if the amendment had been allowed.

We have now disposed of the main question involved in this case, and in discussing it we have discussed some of the other questions propounded by counsel. The questions which we have already discussed we shall not again refer to, and those which we have not yet discussed we shall merely decide, without discussing them in detail.

It was not error for the court below to allow evidence to be introduced which tended to show that the president and directors of the railway company resided in other states, a long way from the railroad, and that they gave but very little personal attention to the operating of the road. The witness Brownhill was so obviously a "fast witness" that we suppose the jury knew it, and that they gave to his testimony only such credit as it was properly entitled to. We think, however, that his testimony sufficiently showed him to be such an expert that the court below did not err in permitting it to go to the jury, and be weighed by them, along with the other evidence in the case, for what it was worth, although it afterwards appeared that he testified concerning some things as though he had knowledge of them, when *527 in fact he had no knowledge of them whatever. A *small portion of his testimony was stricken out, on motion of the railway company. But there was no motion made to strike out any other portion of his testimony, after it became apparent that it was incompetent. It was not error for the court below to permit evidence to be introduced tending to show incompetency on the part of the conductors or engineers operating the colliding trains, as such evidence, along with other evidence tending to show that the collision occurred from such incompetence, and that the railway company was aware of such incompetence, would be strong evidence against the company. As to the order in which the various portions of the evidence should be introduced, where it takes various and distinct portions of evidence to prove any particular fact in issue, the trial court is clothed with a very large discretion.

Whether Salmon was guilty of contributory negligence or not was a question of fact, properly submitted to the jury for their consideration, and the finding thereon by the jury that "the death of said Daniel Salmon was caused by the gross negligence of the defendant, without any fault of the said Daniel Salmon," was a sufficient finding with regard to said fact. It is substantially a finding of the affirmative fact that Salmon during the whole transaction exercised due care and diligence to protect himself from injury, and to do his duty towards the railway company. It is not an uncommon thing for adverse counsel to characterize a broad and comprehensive statement of a fact, or perhaps what might more properly be termed a simple but comprehensive statement of a compound fact, as a conclusion from facts, a conclusion of law, or a conclusion from facts and of law, forgetting, of course, that every fact that comes within our comprehension, however simple and diminutive it may be, must be composed of a vast number of other facts, more simple and more diminutive. There can probably be no such thing as an ultimate fact, or an absolutely simple fact. All are compounded of other facts. And *528 the division of facts into smaller facts is philosophically as *il-limitable as the division of time or space into smaller portions. It takes events to make facts, and events must occur within time and v.14k.—26 space, and must therefore be equally divisible with time and space. As to the extent of the detail with which the statement of any particular fact must be governed, the trial court must always be vested with a very broad and extended discretion. More detail is probably required in the statement of facts in the introduction of evidence than anywhere else in judicial proceedings.

The whole of the sixth instruction asked for by the railway company, and refused by the court, was substantially given in other instructions. The ninth instruction asked for by the defendant, and refused by the court, is not, as there asked, good law for this case. It attempted to make the court, upon a single fact, find that Salmon was guilty of contributory negligence, and withdraw the question from the jury, while this single fact could not conclusively prove contributory negligence, and there were other facts that should have been taken into consideration along with it. The court properly instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover if Salmon was guilty of contributory negligence. If the court below erred as to what should constitute the measure of damages, it was the fault of the railway company. The court adopted the theory of damages suggested by the railway company, and, whether right or wrong, we shall not now reverse the judgment of the court below because of any supposed error committed by it with regard to the measure of damages.

This case was very fairly tried in the court below, so far as the judge had anything to do with it, except, possibly, that he ought to have granted a new trial because the verdict of the jury was not sustained by sufficient evidence. The jury made the principal mistake that was made in the case, in finding a verdict for the plaintiff against the weight or preponderance of the evidence. The verdict ought probably to have been set aside by the court below, and a new trial granted for this reason. But as the court below sustained *529 the verdict, and rendered judgment thereon, thereby *presumptively approving the verdict, and as there was evidence to sustain the verdict in every essential particular, we cannot now reverse the judgment merely because the verdict does not seem to be sustained by sufficient evidence. Numerous decisions of this court may be found laying down this doctrine.

G. M. SIMCOCK and others v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF EMPORIA.

January Term, 1875.

1. Service: Of Summons on Return-Day: Irregular. A service of a summons made on the defendant on the return-day thereof is irregular and voidable, and a judgment founded on such a service may be reversed, vacated, or set aside, at the instance of the judgment debtor, in any proper proceeding therefor, provided no waiver of service has been had in the case by appearance or otherwise.
2. Appearance. Where the defendant appeared by his attorneys, and moved the court to set aside the summons, and to dismiss the action, because the service was made on the return-day of the summons, and the appearance was made expressly for the purpose of such motion only, and the motion was signed by the attorneys as attorneys for the purposes of the motion only, and no other appearance was made by the defendant in the case, held, that said appearance did not have the effect to waive service, or to cure the irregular service already made.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Morris district court.

Action upon a promissory note, brought by the First National Bank of Emporia against Simcock and two others. The plaintiff had judgment, as upon default, at the April term, 1874.

*530 **Hughes & Bradley and Ruggles & Sterry*, for plaintiffs in error, contended that the service of the summons on the return-day thereof was defective and bad. The entry of judgment upon such defective service, over the objection and exception of plaintiffs in error, and as upon a default, was an error affecting the substantial rights of plaintiffs in error. Code, § 64; Dutton v. Hobson, 7 Kan. *196; Meisse v. McCoy's Adm'r, 17 Ohio St. 229.

VALENTINE, J. In this case the service of the summons was made on the defendants below (plaintiffs in error) on the return-day thereof. Such a service is irregular and voidable, and a judgment founded thereon may be reversed, vacated, or set aside, at the instance of the judgment debtor, in any proper proceeding therefor, provided no waiver of service has been had in the case by appearance or otherwise. Dutton v. Hobson, 7 Kan. *196; Armstrong v. Grant, 7 Kan. *285. In the present case there was an appearance by all the defendants below in about the same form. The appearance of G. M. Simcock is in the following form, to-wit:

"And now comes the defendant, G. M. Simcock, by his attorneys, Hughes & Bradley, and, appearing for the purpose of this motion only, moves this court to dismiss the above-entitled action, and to set aside the summons in said action so far as Simcock is concerned, for the reason that said summons in said action was served upon said Simcock on the return-day of said summons. Said summons was issued by the clerk of said court on the nineteenth of February, 1874, and was made returnable on the twenty-third day of February, 1874, and was served on said Simcock on said twenty-third of February.

HUGHES & BRADLEY,

"Attorneys for G. M. Simcock for the Purpose of this Motion only."

The appearance in this motion was a special appearance merely for the purpose of contesting the jurisdiction of the court,—merely for the purpose of contesting the regularity of the service of the summons,—and cannot be construed into a waiver of jurisdiction, or a waiver of service. The motion *itself shows that the appearance was for the purpose of the motion only, and that the attorneys were attorneys for the purposes of the motion only; and it also shows that the purposes of the motion were to contest the jurisdiction of the court and the service of the summons, and not to waive jurisdiction and service. And we do not think that jurisdiction or service, or indeed anything else, was waived by said appearance; nor did said appearance cure the irregular service already made. Possibly the court below did not err in overruling said motion as it was made; the motion not being to set aside the service of the summons, (as it should have been made,) but to set aside the summons itself, and to dismiss the action. But after the motion was overruled, then what was the court below to do? The plaintiff gave the court no alternative but to render judgment on said service, or to dismiss the action. Now, if the court had dismissed the action under such circumstances, probably it would not have erred. Branner v. Chapman, 11 Kan. *121. But to render judgment upon such a service as upon a default, as the court below did, was such an error that this court must reverse the judgment. Dutton v. Hobson, supra.

We have taken no notice of the irregularity in issuing the summons, in making the return-day thereof only four days from the date thereof, instead of ten days, as neither counsel has called our attention to it. We have considered the summons as though it was regular in every respect, and the full time given in which to return the same and in which to answer.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

*532      *COMMISSIONERS OF CHASE Co. v. J. S. SHIPMAN.

January Term, 1875.

Taxation: Homestead Claims not Taxable. Improvements made on government lands settled upon and occupied as a homestead under the act of congress of March 20, 1862, are not taxable before final proof of settlement and cultivation is made.

Error from Chase district court.

Injunction brought against the board of commissioners and county treasurer, by Shipman and another, to enjoin the collection of taxes levied upon an alleged illegal assessment. The petition charges that the assessor of Diamond Creek township assessed to plaintiffs, as personal property, "a grist-mill and saw-mill, mill-dam and mill privilege, situate on the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 26, township 19, range 7 east," and valued the same at \$5,225, and that the tax levied on this assessment was \$172.42. The petition also alleged that "the title to said S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of said section 26 is in the United States, and not in the plaintiffs, and that one Mary Sloper has a homestead claim upon said land." The plaintiffs prayed that said taxes might be decreed illegal and void. The defendants demurred. The district court, at the May term, 1874, overruled the demurrer, and decreed a perpetual injunction.

F. P. Cochran and Ruggles & Sterry, for plaintiffs in error.

The district court held that as the improvements of Shipman & Doolittle assessed and taxed were situated upon lands the title to which was in the United States, that neither the land itself, nor any claim or possessory interest therein, or improvements thereon, could be legally assessed or taxed. Can this be the law? The question involves important and wide-spread interests. Vast amounts of property of great value, scattered all over the state, are held, occupied, and enjoyed by settlers and occupants of homesteads, which, if *533 this position **is* tenable, wholly escape the burden of taxation.

That which is property everywhere else ceases to be property, for all practical purposes of governmental use, if it is the law that time, labor, and money may be expended upon, and extensive and valuable improvements attached to, the soil, that can neither be taxed as real estate, nor in any other manner.

We do not claim that lands taken under the "homestead act," while their title remains in the United States, can be taxed by the state, or by any governmental subdivision thereof. Such taxation would be illegal and void, not because of any lack of power so to do as a state, but because of the compact contained in the act of congress admitting the state into the Union, and the acceptance and ratification thereof by the territorial legislature. But we do hold that the possession of such lands, and the improvements erected thereon and attached thereto, are subject to taxation, and should be assessed with other property for that purpose. The general proposition that they should be subject to taxation has been sustained by legislative enactments, and the decisions of courts; and we apprehend there would be no doubt of the correctness of this position were it not for the language and reasoning used by this court in the latter part of its opinion in the case of Parker v. Winsor, 5 Kan. *362. If the court in that case intended to decide the broad proposition that improvements on lands, the title to which is in the United States, could not be taxed by the state, we ask this court to review that decision. In that case the court first decides that, the title to said lands (part of the Kickapoo lands) being in the government, the land could not be taxed; and then (so the court in the case below assumed) decides that the improvements, being part of the real estate, cannot be taxed because the realty cannot. But is not such reasoning somewhat delusive? The occupant has no title to the realty; but has he not a property in the improvements he has erected, and even in the possession he has acquired? Does the mere fact that a building is attached to land make it realty too? Certainly not; for it *534 has been held again and *again that when one person erects a building upon the land of another, with that other's consent, it does not become a part of the realty. It belongs to the erector. Is it real estate? No; because he has no title to the land on which it stands. It is personal property. And in the case at bar this possession, and this class of improvements, cannot be considered real estate, nor has it been considered so by the legislature of this state, or by this court. If it is real estate, it belongs to the United States government; for it follows the title, and there is no dispute as to where that is.

That these improvements are not real estate the legislature has declared; for by section 9, c. 21, Gen. St., it has provided that all contracts for the sale or purchase of such improvements shall be deemed valid and may be sued upon as other contracts; and section 10 provides that a quitclaim deed and other conveyances of improvements on public lands shall be as binding and effective between the parties. And this court, in the case of Moore v. McIntosh, 6 Kan. *39, recognized the validity of this legislation, and declared the sale of a homestead claim, with improvements thereon, a sufficient consideration for a promissory note given in payment thereof. Hill v. Smith, 1 Morris, 70; Clark v. Shultz, 4 Mo. 236. But it will be asked, as was done by this court in Parker v. Winsor, "Is it possible for the legislature to change real estate into personal property?" Is not the question too broadly stated? In one sense, may not the legislature, in effect, do that very thing? Courts have done so. Neither legislature nor courts can change the physical characteristics of things or persons; but can they not change, modify, and regulate their legal status? Courts have repeatedly decided that things attached to, and which under the common law were prima facie, real estate, shall be deemed and taken to be personal property; and legislatures have been equally quick and vigilant in the same direction whenever it became necessary to determine and protect the rights of one class, and enforce the duties and obligations of another. The courts will be ready and vigilant to protect and *585 sustain the title of the govern*ment whenever the question is legitimately before it; but we suggest that that title is not in issue, and that, as between the occupant who claims the title to the property sought to be taxed and the state, the question as to who has the title to the realty has nothing to do with the case. Does it lie in his mouth to say that it is not his property for the purpose of taxation, when, for his individual benefit and profit, he exercises exclusive ownership over it, and at his pleasure sells and disposes of it? Prima facie all is real estate. But this is not uniformly so. The titles to the two may be, and very often are, separate and distinct; and, when so, the improvements are to be regarded and treated as the personal property of the owner thereof. Curtiss v. Hoyt, 19 Conn. 154; Ashmun v. Williams, 8 Pick. 402; Doty v. Gorham, 5 Pick. 487; Aldrich v. Parsons, 6 N. H. 555; Wells v. Banister, 4 Mass. 513; People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 645; People v. Black Diamond C. M. Co., 37 Cal. 54.

C. M. Foster and S. N. Wood, for defendants in error.

The defendants in error are taxed for a grist-mill, saw-mill, mill-dam, and mill privilege situate on certain land occupied under a homestead entry by another party. The title to the homestead is in the United States. What title the defendants in error may claim to the assessed property is not stated in the petition; but, whatever understanding may be had with the owner of the homestead, it is certain that the defendants have no title to said property which can make them the owners thereof in any sense known to the law. A mere license or sufferance by the one holding the homestead entry would not convert a mill, mill-dam, and mill privilege into personal property where the land is owned by the United States. If the occupant of the homestead had erected these mills, and made this dam, there is no doubt, under the decisions of this court, that the same could not be taxed as personal property. Parker v. Winsor, 5 Kan.

*375. If the improvements could be called personal property, the occupier of a government homestead could be taxed in the same extent, in this indirect manner, as if the land itself were taxable.

*586 *That cannot be done indirectly which cannot be done directly. Whether the defendants in error could lawfully build the mills and erect the dam in question, by consent of the occupier of the homestead, is not a question in this case.

But whether the defendants in error have built these mills and erected this dam rightfully or wrongfully, the state has no jurisdiction over the property. It cannot sell the same, and give the purchaser any title that can be asserted as against any one. To sell the same would be to give the purchaser a right of entry and possession to government land. This cannot be done. The California decisions referred to by counsel for plaintiffs in error have this distinction: mining claims are a species of property recognized by the laws of the United States, and enforceable in the courts. Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 510; Basy v. Gallagher, Id. 670. The possession of a homesteader could be protected by the courts, and any person who interfered with it would be liable to him as a trespasser, or, perhaps, might be restrained by injunction. But a mere licensee or trespasser on government land has no such ownership of his improvements as to make them personal property. A mill privilege is only another name for one of the elements of value in government land. It exists in the land itself, and cannot be separated from it, and, of course, cannot be treated as personal property, as against homesteader or trespasser, unless the court holds that the land itself may be taxed under the pretext of its being personal property. If every element and attribute of the realty may be converted into personal property, and taxed as such, the prohibition in the act of admission of the state against interfering with the primary disposal of the soil is nugatory.

VALENTINE, J. The only question presented to us for our consideration and decision in this case is whether the improvements made on government land, settled upon and occupied as a homestead *537 under the act of congress of March *20, 1862, (12 U. S. St. at Large, 392,) are taxable before final proof of settlement and cultivation of the land is made. We must answer this question in the negative. When this state was admitted into the Union, it was agreed between the state and the United States that government lands should never be taxed by the state. See Act of Admission, (12 U. S. St. at Large, 127, § 3, sub. 6;) Joint Resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, (Gen. St. 71.) The word "land" meant and means the land, with all the improvements thereon. This is the legal signification of the term; it is the common-law definition thereof; and it is undoubtedly just what was meant when said act of admission and joint resolution were passed. There are a few exceptional cases where "improvements" on land are not considered a part thereof; but this is clearly not one of those cases. There is nothing to show that the state or United States, at the time of our admission into the Union, considered such improvements personal property; there is no act of congress passed at that time, or before or since, making them personal property; and there is no act of congress attempting to divest the government of the title to them while the government still owns the land, or to place the title anywhere else except in the government. But even if they were personal property, if they belonged to the United States they would not be taxable.

See Act of Admission. There is no act of congress authorizing any person to remove them from the land, and there is no act of congress authorizing them to be taxed. We therefore think it beyond the power of the state to tax them. Calling them by a different name from what they in fact are, does not give the state any additional authority over them. See Parker v. Winsor, 5 Kan. *374, *375.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

*STATE OF KANSAS v. GEORGE W. WHITE.

January Term, 1875.

1. Criminal Law: Rules of Pleading. The common-law rules of construing criminal pleadings have been set aside by our Code of Criminal Procedure, and to that Code must we look for the rules to determine the sufficiency of an information or indictment.
2. Information: Description of Offense. It is not necessary, in an information, to use the exact words of the statute in charging an offense. It is sufficient if words are used conveying the same meaning. [State v. Miller, 25 Kan. 700; State v. Fooks, 29 Kan. 427; State v. Foster, 30 Kan. 366; S. C. 2 Pac. Rep. 629; State v. Beverlin, 30 Kan. 613; S. C. 2 Pac. Rep. 630; State v. Hart, 33 Kan. 222; S. C. 6 Pac. Rep. 288.]
3. ———: Omission of Words. The omission of the words "on purpose and of malice aforethought" from an information charging an assault with intent to kill, under section 38 of the crimes act, is not fatal, where the information charges that the defendant did feloniously make an assault, and feloniously did shoot and wound, with the intent feloniously and willfully to kill.
4. Criminal Law: Instructions: Intoxication of Accused. Upon a trial under such a charge, where there is evidence tending to show the intoxication of the accused at the time of the act, it is proper for the court to charge the jury that intoxication is a matter to be considered by them as bearing upon the state of defendant's mind, and therefore as evidence upon the question of the intent to take life. But it is seldom, if ever, the duty of the court to go further, and instruct that the jury may, from the intoxication alone, infer the absence of any such intent, and the consequent innocence of the defendant of the specific offense charged. At least, in the absence from the record of the evidence in the case, it is impossible for an appellate court to hold that there was any error in the rulings of the trial court refusing the latter and giving the former instruction.<sup>1</sup>
5. ———. The fact of intoxication, no matter how complete and overpowering, is not conclusive evidence of the absence of an intent to take life.

Appeal from Allen district court.

Information charging that defendant White, "on the thirteenth of September, 1874, at the county of Allen, with force and arms, in and upon the body of one James Black, then and there being, feloniously did make an assault on him, the said James Black, with a certain pistol loaded with powder, ball, and cap, which he, the said George W. White, in his hand then and there held, the said pistol being a deadly weapon, feloniously did shoot and wound, with intent *539 him, the said James *Black, then and there feloniously and willfully to kill." Plea, not guilty. Trial at the November term, 1874. Verdict, guilty, and defendant was sentenced to four years' imprisonment in the penitentiary.

L. W. Keplinger and H. D. Smith, for appellant.

James C. Murray, Co. Atty., for the State.

BREWER, J. Defendant was convicted of an assault with intent to kill, and brings his case here by appeal. The questions presented are on the sufficiency of the information, and the instructions upon the effect of intoxication.

The information charged that the defendant did feloniously make an assault, and feloniously did shoot and wound, with the intent feloniously and willfully to kill. It did not, in the language of section 38 of the crimes act, charge that defendant, "on purpose and of malice aforethought," did assault, etc. Was the omission of these words fatal to the information? The authorities cited by the learned counsel doubtless sustain his claim that it was. But those decisions were made where the strictness of the common-law rules in reference to indictments obtained. But, as said by Chief Justice COBB in reference to two sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure: "These two sections divest the indictment of all artificial and technical construction, and give to its language its natural and ordinary meaning." Smith v. State, 1 Kan. *365. While it would doubtless be sufficient to follow the language of the statute in charging a crime, it is not necessary so to do. It is enough if the language used, according to its ordinary and natural meaning, states clearly an offense within the statute according to the same manner of interpretation of its language. Tried by this rule, we think the information sufficient. It charges an unlawful assault,—an assault with intent to kill. Of course, if a party made an assault with intent to kill, it necessarily was not an *540 accidental or unintentional assault. An accidental or unintentional assault with intent to kill is an impossibility. The information clearly, therefore, charges an assault on purpose. So, also, if an assault is willful, felonious, and with intent to kill, it is of malice aforethought; for malice aforethought is nothing more than an unlawful or wicked intention. A felonious intent to kill, is an unlawful and wicked intent. All the elements, therefore, of the crime, as defined in the statute, are embraced in this information, and it is sufficient. In reference to the general rules for determining the sufficiency of criminal pleadings, see Crim. Code, §§ 101, 103, 107, 108, 109, 110; Gen. St. 837, 838.

The other error assigned arises upon the instructions given and refused. Some testimony was introduced by defendant tending to show that he was insane at the time of the offense, and some by the prosecution tending to show that he was intoxicated. Upon this defendant asked this instruction: "To constitute the specific offense charged, it is not sufficient that the commission of the act be proven, but it must be affirmatively shown that the act was done with the particular intent of killing or maiming the prosecuting witness. The jury may infer from the fact of defendant's being intoxicated at the time of the commission of the act charged (if such intoxication be proven) that the act was not done with the particular intent necessary to constitute the specific offense charged;" and another to the effect that such intoxication was evidence from which the jury might infer his innocence of the particular offense charged. These the court refused, but charged the jury that "intoxication—drunkenness—is not regarded in law as any excuse, in itself, for crime, but may always be shown, and should be considered in all cases where the intent, as in this case, is of the essence, or is an indispensable ingredient of the offense, to show the state of mind of the person accused."

Was there error in this? The difference between the instruction refused and that given, is that by the first the court was asked to select drunkenness as a single circumstance, and say to the *541 *jury that from that alone they might infer the defendant's innocence of any intent to kill, while by the other the court charged them that they might consider drunkenness, along with the other facts of the case, in determining the defendant's state of mind at the time of the act. The testimony in the case is not preserved in the record; so we do not know what the circumstances of the case were,—what evidence there was of the intent to take life, or how great was the intoxication of the defendant. Now, there may be cases in which there is such a dearth of other testimony bearing upon the question of intent, and such a complete and stupefying intoxication shown, as to justify a court in singling it out and telling the jury that they may infer therefrom the absence of any intent to take life. But all that a court ought ordinarily to do is to state to the jury that drunkenness is one of the circumstances tending to show the state of defendant's mind, and thus bearing upon the question of the presence or absence of an intent to take life; and probably in no case would it be error to refuse to go further, or give any more specific charge. The fact of intoxication is not conclusive against the existence of such an intent. The intent may have been formed before the intoxication commenced. It may exist concurrently with it, at least until the intoxication comes to be so great as to be stupefying. So that it is impossible, at least in a case in which the whole testimony is not present, when the court has referred in its instructions to intoxication as one of the facts bearing upon the question of intent, to hold that it erred in not going further, and giving special stress to that circumstance. We are not advised as to the instructions given by the court other than upon this matter of drunkenness. We must therefore assume that they were correct and sufficient; that they stated the elements of the crime, and the necessity of proof as to the existence of each element, and the kind of evidence applicable to each element. Millar v. State, 2 Kan. *174. It does not appear, therefore, that the court erred in the instructions given and refused in this case.

*542 It perhaps should be remarked, in order to *guard against any misconception as to the relation of drunkenness to crime, that the charge in this case is one which requires something more than a general malevolent feeling, and where there must be a specific intent to take life; so that nothing herein contained conflicts with the general doctrine that drunkenness neither excuses nor extenuates crime. See, upon this general subject, 1 Bish. Crim. Law, c. 27, §§ 397-416.

The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

L. M. RUMSEY & Co. v. HENRY SCHMITZ and another.

January Term, 1875.

Bills and Notes: Defenses to: Payment to Wrongful Possessor. Payment of a past-due negotiable note drawn to the order of the payees, and unindorsed, made to a stranger, who is in fact no agent of the owners, and without authority to receive payment, but who has surreptitiously obtained possession of the note, and whose only evidence of authority is the possession of the note, and the general business card of the payees, and where there has been no laches on the part of the owners, and nothing in the prior transactions between the parties to induce credence in the authority of such stranger, is no defense to an action by the owners on such note.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Wabaunsee district court.

Rumsey & Co., merchants at St. Louis, Missouri, brought suit against Henry Schmitz and August Meyer, alleging that defendants, "on the twelfth of August, 1872, made their certain promissory note in writing, of that date, and then delivered the same to plaintiffs, and thereby promised to pay to plaintiffs, or order, the sum of <sup>1</sup>Defense to notes, burden of proof, French v. Gordon, 10 Kan. 279, and note; indorsement of, Fuller v. Scott, 8 Kan. 27, and note; notice, presentment, and protest, Hume v. Watt, 5 Kan. 28, and note; deposit of money to pay, see note to First Nat. Bank v. Tree, 24 N. W. Rep. 566; gratuitous payment by third party, Martin v. Victor Min. Co., 8 Pac. Rep. 171; alteration of note, Fuller v. Green, 24 N. W. Rep. 911.

$465.53 in thirty days after date thereof, with ten per cent. per annum from date; that after the giving of the said promissory note, and before it became *due and payable, plaintiffs lost said note; that plaintiffs had never indorsed said note to any person or persons whatever; that afterwards, when said promissory note became due and payable, plaintiffs notified the defendants that the same had been so lost by plaintiffs, and then requested defendants to pay said sum of $465.53 named in said promissory note, which defendants refused and neglected to do; that, by means for which plaintiffs cannot account, defendants obtained and now have possession of said note, but plaintiffs aver they never received any compensation for said note from defendants, nor from any other person whatever." Plaintiffs demanded judgment for said principal sum, with interest. Answer, payment. Trial at the September term, 1873, without a jury. Finding and judgment in favor of defendants.

R. M. Ruggles and Bertram & Nicholson, for plaintiffs, urged that this was a note negotiable in form, but was never indorsed or negotiated, and the holder thereof had no right to demand payment of the same, nor ought defendants to have paid it without being legally compelled; and, if they did pay it, they paid it at their risk and peril, no matter if the holder represented it to be his own; citing Johnson v. Windle, 32 E. C. L. 225; Forster v. Clements, 2 Camp. 17; Mead v. Young, 4 Term. R. 32; State Bank v. Fearing, 16 Pick. 534; Chit. Bills, 396, 197, note c; 2 Pars. Notes, 256. And it would have made no difference if the note had been indorsed by plaintiffs, for the thief to whom defendants made payment never claimed to own the note. The defendants never gave credit to the note, (or indorsement, had there been one,) but wholly relied upon the representations of the thief; and the rule that the holder is prima facie the owner of a bill transferable by delivery does not apply, for the person or thing to whom we give credit we must stand or fall by; and herein defendants were guilty of negligence in not ascertaining whether the thief were agent of plaintiffs or not. A. H. Case, for defendants.

BREWER, J. This was an action upon a note, and the sole defense was payment. The facts are these: The defendants, doing business at Alma, Kansas, executed their note, dated August 12, 1872, due in thirty days, and payable to the order of plaintiffs at the Boatman's Savings Institution in St. Louis. This note was duly received by the plaintiffs in St. Louis, and placed with their other valuable papers. These papers were, according to the testimony of J. J. Ostrander, their book-keeper and treasurer, kept at night locked in their safe, and during the day in a drawer in the witness' desk, and were all the time under the sole charge of said witness. Both safe and desk were in the office, which is in the second story of the building occupied by plaintiffs, and separated from the rest of the story by a glass partition. This office was occupied only by the witness and two book-keepers. The witness was absent about an hour at noon of each day, but then locked the drawer where the notes were, and left the key in a drawer of the desk of Moses Rumsey, in another room. When the note became due, it was missed, and, after about a week's delay, notice of the loss was sent to the defendants. At about the time the note became due, plaintiffs discharged their shipping clerk, who, however, according to the testimony, continued in St. Louis. In response to the notice of loss, and on October 20th, defendants wrote a letter requesting plaintiffs to forward the note to certain bankers in Wamego, and it would be paid. This was the only note they had ever given plaintiffs. The plaintiffs never received anything on account of the note. On the other hand, the defendants showed by August Meyer,

*545 one of the partners, that on the thirtieth of September a party came into their store at Alma, *and, handing them the business card of plaintiffs, said, "Anything you want in our line?"

They gave him an order for goods, which they never received. After taking the order he presented the note, and they paid it. They produced the note in court, and it was unindorsed. They did not know the agent; they had never dealt with him before. Their prior purchases had been by mail. He said nothing about the plaintiffs, but simply presented their card, took the order for goods, presented the note, and received payment. This was on the thirtieth of September. Two days afterwards they received a notice from plaintiffs that they wanted money. Witness wrote the letter of October 20th, thinking that plaintiffs might have another note of theirs signed by his partner, Schmitz, who had signed this. Upon the testimony the court found for the defendants; and the only question is whether the evidence warrants such finding; or, rather, whether it is so clearly against such finding that it is the duty of this court to reverse the judgment.

Two things are evident: First, that the plaintiffs have never received any pay for the note; and, second, that the defendants have paid the full amount of it. It is hard for the plaintiffs not to receive the money due them, and it is equally hard for the defendants to pay a second time. It is also clear that there was no intentional wrong on the part of either. The possession of the note by the party receiving payment is the fact upon which the defendants must and do rest their case. The possession of the plaintiff's business card, which is intended for general circulation, amounts to little or nothing. And the question really presented is whether the mere possession of a negotiable instrument, unindorsed, protects the maker in payment, notwithstanding that the possessor is in fact unauthorized to receive payment, and has improperly obtained possession. It is undeniably true that the possession of the instrument is often a decisive fact in determining whether the payment to the agent is a protection to the payor. To that extent are the authorities cited by the learned counsel for the defense. And in Story, Ag. § 104, it *546 is said: "And generally *the possession of a negotiable instrument is deemed sufficient prima facie evidence of the title of the possessor to secure payment of it." See, also, Doubleday v. Kress, 60 Barb. 181; Tappan v. Morseman, 18 Iowa, 499; Williams v. Walker, 2 Sandf. Ch. 325. In these last two cases the absence of the instrument was considered decisive against the power of the agent, though in the one case the owner had given the defendant to understand that he would place the matter in the hands of the supposed agent, and in the other the supposed agent had in fact negotiated the loan, had possession of the instrument, and had properly received some payments. In this last case quite an examination is made into the English authorities, and a number of cases cited in which a party negotiating a loan has afterwards received payment of principal or interest, and the general conclusion appears to have been that the borrower was protected in such payments only when the party receiving had the instrument still in his possession. But in this class of cases it must be noticed that the party receiving payment had been the agent of the owner, and the question was as to the duration and extent of his authority. The fact that the owner permitted him to retain possession of the instrument was deemed sufficient evidence of a continuation of his authority in the premises, and of his right to receive payment according to the terms of the instrument. The distinction between those cases and the present is obvious. Here the possessor had never been the agent of the owners in this transaction; had never had any connection with it, or dealings with the defendants. He had never had any rightful possession of the note, but had somehow improperly obtained it. The possession of the note was the sole evidence of the fact of agency, as well as the extent of authority. The defendants pay to a stranger a debt they owe to the plaintiffs, and the sole protection they present for such payment is the fact that this stranger had possession of the evidence of such indebtedness. There had been nothing in their prior dealings with the plaintiffs to justify such confidence. They had had *547 no *dealings with any runners for them. Their purchases had been by mail. They were wholly unacquainted with the party to whom they made payment. He bore no credentials from the plaintiffs, other than such as can be picked up in any hotel. He presented a note payable to the order of plaintiffs, and unindorsed by them. Yet this unindorsed note they pay to this stranger wrongfully in possession, and having actually no authority to bind the plaintiffs in any way. We cannot think a payment thus made discharges the debt.

This proposition may be laid down as correct: Payment of a past-due negotiable note, drawn to the order of the payees, and unindorsed, made to a stranger who is in fact no agent of the owners, and without authority to receive payment, but who has surreptitiously obtained possession of the note, and whose only evidence of authority is the possession of the note and the general business card of the payees, and where there has been no laches on the part of the owners, and nothing in the prior transactions between the parties to induce credence in the authority of such stranger, is no defense to an action by the owners on such note.

We are aware of the rule which forbids the court to set aside a finding of fact made by a district court upon conflicting testimony; but here there seems to be no conflicting testimony. The manner of payment, as stated by the witnesses for the defendants, is taken as strictly true. Indeed, full credence is given to their entire testimony, and it is rather a conclusion of law to be drawn from undisputed facts, than a finding of fact from conflicting testimony.<sup>1</sup>

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

*548. *JONAS H. COOK v. OTTAWA UNIVERSITY and others.

January Term, 1875.

1. Trials: Opening Case after Being Submitted: Discretion of Court. Granting or refusing applications for leave to open a case, after it has been submitted to the court or jury for decision, and offer additional testimony, is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and presents no ground of error unless such discretion has been abused.<sup>2</sup>
2. ——: Incompetency of Testimony on Application. Such applications should always be overruled where the testimony sought to be introduced is incompetent under the pleadings, and no application made for their amendment.
3. Mortgages: Mortgagee's Rights and Liabilities. A mortgagee in possession is responsible for the rents and profits, is allowed for the ordinary repairs, but not for permanent improvements placed upon the mortgaged premises merely for his convenience.

Error from Franklin district court.

Foreclosure, brought by Cook (as assignee of one Libby, the mortgagee) against the Ottawa University and two others. The note for which the mortgage was given as security was for $2,000, with interest at 20 per cent. from date. The case was tried before A. W.

B., referee. He held the note to be usurious; that the principal only could be recovered; and he reported that plaintiff, Cook, since going into possession of the mortgaged property, had, for his own convenience, made permanent improvements or betterments thereon to the value of $792.61, and had made necessary repairs and improvements to the value of $230.23, and that Cook was chargeable with $1,158.50 for rents and profits. In stating the case for judgment the referee allowed Cook the face of the note, $2,000, and said $230.23 for necessary repairs, etc., amounting to $2,230.23, and charged him with said sum of $1,158.50 for rents and profits, leaving balance in his favor, and against the Ottawa University, of $1,071.73, for the payment of which he decided that a sale of the mortgaged premises should be ordered. The district court, in confirming the re-

*549 port of the referee, and on the basis of his decree, *allowed defendants further rents and profits, from the date of the report to the confirmation, to the amount of $250, leaving due Cook the sum of $821.73. The report of the referee was confirmed by the district court at the March term, 1873. The action below was commenced by Sears & Maxwell, as attorneys for plaintiff, but Mr. Maxwell alone appeared, and tried the case on the part of plaintiff before the referee.

Wm. H. Maxwell, for plaintiff, filed an elaborate brief, in which he maintained that Cook, the assignee of the mortgage, entered into possession of the mortgaged premises with the assent of the mortgagor, and under a contract of purchase; that it was error to deny him the right to prove this by direct evidence; that it was error to adjudge rents and profits against him, and not allow him for permanent improvements or betterments of the property; that it was error to exclude evidence offered by him, being thus in possession, of his having purchased an outstanding title, lien, or incumbrance; that it was error to deny him the right to introduce in evidence a tax title, perfected by lapse of time, acquired of the property in dispute under a sale for taxes, the payment of which, as a duty, was imposed by law on the mortgagor; and that a purchaser pending the litigation takes his title subject to any future decree that may rightfully be pronounced in the cause.

John W. Deford, for defendant, submitted that there was no error in the refusal of the referee to "open the case," and receive evidence of title in Cook, derived from certain conveyances of the mortgaged premises to him, and from two tax deeds. It was not error "to adjudge rents and profits against plaintiff, and not allow him for permanent betterments of the property." Necessary repairs are to be allowed in such cases, but they must be strictly necessary to continue the mortgaged premises in the condition in which they were *550 when received by the mortgagee, and not to extend or im*prove them. Improvements made by him while in possession, without the knowledge or consent of the mortgagor, or his assignees, cannot be allowed for, however substantial, lasting, beneficial, or valuable they may be. Russell v. Blake, 2 Pick. 505; Woodward v. Phillips, 14 Gray, 133; 1 Hil. Mortg. 460, § 22; Lash v. Lambert, 2 Amer. Rep. 144; 2 Daniell, Ch. 1239. The note was usurious, and no interest was recoverable. Jenness v. Cutler, 12 Kan. *500.

BREWER, J. This was an action on a note and mortgage. The petition alleged that the Ottawa University executed a note and mortgage to one Washington Libby; that the latter duly assigned the same to plaintiff; that the note was unpaid; and that the other defendants, John T. and Jane K. Jones, claimed some interest in the mortgaged premises; and prayed a decree of foreclosure and sale. The university answered, pleading usury in the note, which upon its face drew 20 per cent. interest, and admitting the answers of its co-defendants. The other defendants filed separate answers, admitting the execution of the note and mortgage, and the assignment thereof to plaintiff, but alleging subsequent conveyances to themselves from the university of the mortgaged premises, and pleading usury; and, further, that without the knowledge or consent of either of the defendants, and without any rightful authority, the plaintiff had, subsequently to his purchase of the note and mortgage, entered into possession of the mortgaged premises, and received the rents and profits thereof, which they asked might be applied in payment of the principal of the note. To these answers the plaintiff filed a general denial. Upon these pleadings the trial was had. The defendants called the plaintiff, who admitted taking possession of the property, upon which were two houses, one of which he occupied himself and the other rented. He testified to making some repairs, and some permanent improvements. He also testified, upon cross-examination, to a conversation with Mr. Atkinson, the managing officer of the university, prior to taking possession, and in relation thereto, as follows: *551 "Went to see Mr. Atkinson about buying the property. He had before that time offered it to me for sale. Mr. Atkinson said if I bought the property he would see that I got possession. Told him that I wanted possession immediately. Atkinson said he could give possession at any time. Told him that Zimmerman was in possession under a lease until next spring, and that he would have to be paid something to go out. Atkinson said that Z. had not got it for any certain time, but went and hunted up the lease, and found that Zimmerman did have a lease for it until spring. Atkinson then said: 'I think I can make an arrangement; if you buy the property, you shall have possession any way.' This was all that was said about possession, and was before I purchased the note from Washington Libby. I last saw the lease of Zimmerman in Mr. Atkinson's office at the university building. Zimmerman went out of the property, and I immediately went into possession. This was two weeks after the conversation with Atkinson."

No other testimony was given as to the manner of acquiring possession. He had prior thereto been asked if he had had any conversation with Atkinson about the purchase of the property, but an objection had been sustained to this question. Upon the whole testimony, the note calling for 20 per cent. interest was held usurious, and only the principal collectible. Cook, as mortgagee in possession, was charged with the rents and profits, and allowed for the repairs, but not for the permanent improvements placed upon the premises for his own convenience.

After the case had once been closed, Cook moved for leave to open the case to enable him to introduce two tax deeds under which he claimed title, but the motion was overruled. He also moved for leave to open the case to offer some title papers to part of the premises, but this motion was also overruled. No application was at any time made for leave to amend the pleadings, though the intimation is given by counsel in his brief that if the judgment be reversed the case would not be tried again upon the same pleadings. We have given the case careful attention, and are constrained to say that we find nothing to justify a reversal of the judgment. So far as the applications to open the case are concerned, such matters are *552 *largely within the discretion of the trial tribunal, and an abuse of that discretion should appear before a reversal will be ordered. In this case the trial was had before a referee. The petition was filed in January, 1870. On December 13, 1870, the case was referred, and the report of the referee filed August 2, 1872. The trial commenced November 1, 1871, and the applications for leave to open the case were made May 7 and July 13, 1872.

Where a case has been protracted, as this was, for such a length of time, there should be very urgent reasons presented to justify the opening of the case for additional testimony. No showing was made when the tax deeds were sought to be introduced, and the only reason offered on the other application was that plaintiff supposed his title papers were already in evidence, and that the counsel employed in the commencement of the action had not been present at any of the hearings before the referee. We should hardly think the ruling of the referee was other than correct upon this application, if the testimony had been competent and of vital importance. The absence of counsel, when a party is represented by one so able and competent as the learned gentleman who did conduct the trial, is rarely sufficient to justify the opening of a case after the evidence is in and the findings announced. But this testimony was clearly incompetent under the pleadings. The plaintiff sued as mortgagee. He made no claim of title, but sought, by a decree of foreclosure and sale, to divest the defendants of the title he conceded to be in them, or some of them. Under such pleadings he could not show title in himself, whether derived from tax deeds or otherwise. On both grounds, therefore, the rulings would have to be sustained. For the reason last above given there was no error in ruling out the question asked as to conversations about the purchase of the property. No question is made as to the ruling upon the matter of usury. None could be. Nor can there be any question as to the ruling charging the mortgagee in possession with the rents and profits, allowing him for repairs, and disallowing for all permanent improvements

PLANT SEED CO. v. LUTHER HALL and others.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

1. Sales: Contract: Offer: Acceptance. Where negotiations are entered into for the sale of goods, there must be an unconditional acceptance of the offer, or no contract is consummated. Thus, where negotiations were carried on by letter, and the one party, residing in St. Louis, wrote a letter offering $3.50 per bushel for certain goods delivered in St. Louis, and the other party, residing in Junction City, seventeen days thereafter, shipped the goods to St. Louis, and at the same time wrote a letter, the first since the offer, announcing the shipment, making no acceptance of the offer, and stating that they should expect the highest market price: held, that no contract was consummated, and that the consignee was not bound to accept and pay for the goods; and, further, that the court, construing the letters, should have so instructed the jury.
2. ———: Consignee not Liable for Goods. Where a party to whom, under such circumstances, goods are consigned, refuses to receive them, and turns the bill of lading over to a responsible commission merchant in St. Louis, to dispose of as the goods of the consignors, held, that the consignee, acting in good faith, and with reasonable prudence, was not liable for the goods.

defendants answered, claiming a set-off to amount of $325.73 for certain goods alleged to be sold by them to plaintiff. Trial at *554 the March term, 1874, of the *district court. Verdict in favor of defendants, and against plaintiff, for $127.94, of which defendants remitted $39.40, and judgment was given for the residue, $88.54.

H. H. Snyder and McClure & Humphrey, for plaintiff.

Charles G. Cox, for defendants.

BREWER, J. The only ground of error pressed for our consideration is that the verdict is against the evidence; and the question arises in respect to the counter-claim of defendants. Some correspondence passed between the parties in March, 1873, in consequence of which defendants shipped some onion sets to plaintiff, at St. Louis. On receiving the bill of lading the plaintiff, claiming not to be in the commission business, turned it over to a commission merchant, who received the onions, and sold for much less than defendants claim they had sold them to plaintiff for. The negotiations between the parties were by letter. These letters, and the conduct of the plaintiff on receipt of the onions, constituted all the evidence of a contract. The following is the correspondence in the order in which it passed, defendants writing from Junction City, Kansas, and plaintiff from St. Louis, Missouri: Defendants to plaintiff: "What will you give us for 40 barrels onion sets, choice, on board cars here?" Plaintiff to defendants: "We will give you $3.50 per bu., delivered here, for choice top onion, if they are the right kind; would prefer to see a sample." Defendants to plaintiff: "Our onion sets came from Indiana, and are choice sifted sets,—no chaff or dirt,—and are the best sets we ever saw. We want $3.50 per bu. here, on cars. Freight will be 70c. per 100 lbs., although we may get a lower rate. Can't you stand it?" Plaintiff to defendants: "We cannot pay more than $3.50 per bushel for onion sets delivered here, and would not care to buy at that now, as we have a large lot on hand." Defendants to plaintiff: "We ship you to-day, per M., K. & T. *555 *road, 25 bbls. onion sets. We hope they will reach you safely and in good order. They are in good condition now. As soon as received, please send us statement. We shall expect the highest market price." Upon receipt of the onions the plaintiff disposed of them as stated above, and notified the defendants thereof, who objected to the disposition made, and claimed a sale to plaintiff. Upon this the jury found that there was a sale.

Will the evidence sustain the verdict? It is clear that up to the time of the shipment of the onions no contract had been closed between the parties. The only offer made by the plaintiff had not been accepted by the defendants. Their minds had not come to any point of agreement. The one had offered $3.50 in St. Louis; the other, not accepting that, demanded the highest market price. Clearly, then, they had not agreed. The plaintiff, therefore, notwithstanding the prior negotiations with a view to purchase, was at liberty, on receipt of bill of lading, to withdraw its offer, decline to purchase, and refuse to receive the goods. How far did the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff render it liable as on a purchase? What a consignee, under the circumstances indicated, may do with the consignment, must be viewed in the light of the prior negotiations. It was made, not to a stranger, but to one with whom the consignors had had prior dealings, and made in pursuance of negotiations with reference to the sale of the very articles shipped. Clearly, the consignee might refuse to receive the consignment, and suffer the carrier to make such disposition as it saw fit. So doing, he would place himself under no liability to the consignor. Or he might place the goods in some ordinary and safe place of storage, either in his own warehouse or elsewhere, and notify immediately the consignor the place of storage, and that they were subject to his (the consignor's) order. And where the goods are of a perishable nature, and liable to total loss unless immediately cared for, the consignee may, acting in good faith, and with ordinary and reasonable prudence and care, place them, as the goods of the consignor, in the hands of a responsible commission *556 merchant for immediate sale. *And in this, although the goods might not properly perhaps be classed as perishable goods, still we think the consignee, if acting in good faith, and with reasonable prudence, would not be responsible as purchaser, if it turned the bill of lading over to a responsible commission merchant. They were shipped with a view to a sale. The highest market price was expected. The consignors knew that they had not accepted the offer of the consignee, and that, no contract having been consummated, the latter was not bound to receive or pay for the goods. The consignee was but carrying out the expressed wishes of the consignors in placing the goods where they would be most likely to realize the highest market price. So doing, and acting in good faith, it does not seem just that it should be held responsible as purchaser.

The case seems to have been tried in the district court upon the supposition that the jury might, from the correspondence and the shipment, infer a contract; for included in the shipment were some goods not spoken of in the prior correspondence, and, though the jury found for the defendants as to these also, the district court compelled a remittitur of this amount as a condition of judgment. Plainly, therefore, the learned court did not consider that the conduct of the plaintiff in St. Louis, by itself alone, rendered it responsible. The same thing also is evident from the instructions. But in this supposition the court erred. It was its duty to construe the writings, and it should have charged the jury that by those letters no contract was consummated between the parties. However, as no exception was taken to the instructions, any error in them was doubtless waived.

Counsel has urged, and we are not insensible to, the rule that forbids us to disturb the verdict of a jury which has any testimony tending to establish all the essential facts to sustain it. But that rule is scarcely applicable. Here was a case tried upon an erroneous theory of the law. If that theory were correct, there was some testimony to sustain the verdict. But, that theory being incorrect, both the district court and this court concur in holding there was *557 no testimony to sustain *it. The district court, acting upon this erroneous view of the law, upheld the verdict in part. This court takes the view of the testimony which the trial court took, and applying to it the law, as rightfully construed, finds that the entire verdict should follow the part rejected by that court. In this way justice between the parties will be more certainly reached, for upon a second trial any testimony tending to show bad faith, or want of reasonable care on the part of the consignee, can be introduced.

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. v. M. G. BROWN.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

1. Bill of Particulars: Statements in. It is sufficient if a bill of particulars, in case before a justice, states the essential facts, no matter how rudely and inartistically, yet so that the defendant is not misled, but clearly informed of the exact claim made upon him.
2. Contract: Contracting Party: Memorandum: Unnamed Principal. Where the general manager of a railroad company directs an assistant to have certain work about the railroad done, and in pursuance thereof the assistant makes a contract with a third party to do the work, and a memorandum of the contract is reduced to writing, in which it is simply recited that such third party will do the work, without mentioning for whom, for a certain sum, under the direction of the engineer of the company, which memorandum is signed by the third party, and by the assistant, without any designation of his office, or the capacity in which, or the party for whom, he makes such contract, but also without any express assumption of personal liability, held, that it was the contract of the company.

Error from Labette district court.

Brown brought suit in his own name as plaintiff against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, as defendant. The following is plaintiff's bill of particulars, originally filed in a justice's court:

"[Title.] The plaintiff, M. G. Brown, says that the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company was, on the eighteenth of November, 1872, and has been ever since, and is now, a corporation, duly organized under the laws of the state of Kansas, and was then, and has been ever since, and is now, doing business as such corporation in the county of Labette and state aforesaid; that said railway company did, on the eighteenth of November, 1872, contract with one McLeod to construct a certain part of its road in said county and state, to-wit, the grading between and for certain tracks or parts of said company's road, hereinbefore stated; and for such construction the said defendant company did agree to and did pay to the said McLeod a large sum of money, to-wit, 21 cts. per cubic yard, and one cent per yard overhaul, amounting to $——. The defendant company failed to take, and did not take, from said McLeod, a good and sufficient bond, as required by law, or any bond, conditioned that he would pay all laborers, mechanics, and material-men, and persons who might supply such contractor with provisions or goods of any kind, all just debts due to such persons, or any person to whom any part of such work is given, incurred in carrying on such work. The plaintiff further says that said W. B. McLeod did draw on him certain orders in favor of certain persons, for goods and provisions for said McLeod, and used by said McLeod in constructing said defendant's road, or part of said road, named therein, which persons, performing labor on the grade and works hereinbefore stated, and others with them, were furnishing provisions to said McLeod and the men in his employ. The following are copies of said orders, and are attached hereto, and made a part hereof, marked 'A.' " Here follow copies of seven orders on Brown signed "W. B. McLeod," and one note, payable to S. G. Beekman, also signed by McLeod; after

- *559 which the bill of particulars proceeds: "Plaintiff says *that he paid for said note in goods and provisions; that said Beekman was a laborer in the employ of the defendant McLeod in constructing the grade for defendant company hereinbefore stated, and that it remains wholly unpaid, and said McLeod refused to pay the amount justly due him on said note; that the plaintiff paid to said persons named in said orders the amounts thereof in goods and provisions; and that none of said orders have ever been paid to this plaintiff by said McLeod, nor by the persons therein named. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against the defendant for $19.50, with interest thereon from the ninth of April, 1873, and for $40.35, with interest thereon from March 25, 1873."

The action was tried in the district court, on appeal, at the March term, 1874. Judgment in favor of Brown.

David Kelso, for plaintiff in error.

No contract was made by the railway company with any one, and certainly not with Brown, nor with McLeod. If there was a contract at all, it was a contract made by the general manager to let a contract to Stevens to grade the grounds about the passenger depot at Parsons, fill up the low places between tracks, and round the grounds, so as to give better drainage. This contract Stevens sublet to one McLeod, who did the work, and got his pay for it. The memorandum of agreement made by Stevens and McLeod shows that the work was simply for "grading between tracks." It would seem to be an outrage on the English language to construe that contract to have the effect of one to build a railroad, or part of one, or that it was a contract between the railroad company and McLeod. Again, Brown was not a laborer, a mechanic, or a material-man; nor did he supply McLeod (the supposed contractor) with provisions or goods. He paid some of McLeod's personal orders, and bought a note given by McLeod for his own debt. The laborers, mechanics, and material-men were all paid. There was no contract, nor privity of contract, between Brown and the plaintiff in error, and under no just construction of the act of 1872 (chapter 136, p. 286) can Brown maintain his action against the railway company for any omission by the company to take a bond of indemnity from McLeod.

The goods or provisions furnished by Brown were so furnished by him to the men who at that time were actually engaged in the construction of a "part" of the company's railroad. When Brown supplied Contractor McLeod's employes or laborers with "goods and provisions," at his request, he, in contemplation of law, supplied the contractor himself. Stevens had the authority, as agent of the railway company, to make contracts for the work, and the contract he made with McLeod was the contract of the company. The action is within the act of 1872. Brown's claims are "just debts due him."

BREWER, J. This was an action originally commenced by Brown before a justice of the peace, seeking to hold the railway company for debts created by one W. B. McLeod, under and by virtue of chapter 136 of the Laws of 1872. That act is entitled "An act to protect laborers, mechanics, and others, in the construction of railroads," and provides that a railroad company shall take a bond, with certain conditions, from any person to whom it lets a contract for the construction of its road, or any part of it, or become itself liable to the laborers employed by him. Four principal questions are presented by counsel for the company: First, was the bill of particulars sufficient? second, was there any contract between the company and McLeod for the doing of any work? third, if there was a contract, was the work contracted for such as is embraced within the terms of the act? and, fourth, were the debts also within its terms? Of these in their order.

1. Was the bill of particulars sufficient? It must be remembered that pleadings in a justice's court are not to be subjected to the same strictness of construction as those in the upper courts, *561 (Lobenstein v. McGraw, 11 Kan. *645; Kaub v. *Mitchell, 12 Kan. *57;) so that if the essential facts are stated in such a way that the defendant cannot be misled as to the real claim against him, the bill must be taken as sufficient. Tried by this rule, the bill is plainly sufficient. Indeed, we think it would stand a stricter test. It alleges a contract between the company and McLeod; that the company failed to take any bond; that for work done under that contract McLeod drew certain orders in favor of the laborers upon plaintiff, which he filled, and also gave to one of such laborers a note, which plaintiff bought, and gives copies of the orders and note; and alleges that neither the orders nor the note have ever been paid. It is true, the paragraph which alleges the drawing of the orders is a little bungling and confused, (though perhaps that may be due to an error of the copyist,) but the criticism to which it is properly subject is grammatical rather than legal.

2. The evidence of a contract was clear and abundant. E. B. Stevens, who testified that he was in the employ of defendant, and styled "Superintendent of Buildings and Bridges," was directed by the general manager of the defendant to have certain work done, and made a contract with McLeod to do it. The written memorandum of this contract was in evidence, and is as follows:

"W. B. McLeod agrees to do grading between tracks south of passenger depot, in Parsons, under the direction of the engineer of the M. K. & T. Railway Company, for 21 cents per cubic yard, (one cent per yard overhaul;) the work to be done to the acceptance of engineer within 30 days.

W. B. McLEOD.

Now, while the defendant does not appear upon the face of this agreement as party thereto, yet the testimony of Stevens above given shows that he was simply the agent of the company, and, as such agent, made the contract with McLeod. Upon such testimony McLeod would have had no difficulty in recovering from the company for the work he did under said contract. It was plainly its contract.

3. The work contracted for was "grading between tracks *562 *south of passenger depot, in Parsons." The extent of the work does not appear, but it was stated by the witness Stevens that side tracks had been laid on this grade, and that a portion of the main track ran over it. His testimony as to the instructions given him, and in pursuance of which he made the contract with McLeod, was as follows: "He [the general manager] and I were walking over the ground between the tracks just south of the passenger depot. He said to me: 'I want you to go and have this ground graded to that cut on the hill, about 100 yards from where the freight depot now stands, and have the cut widened, and haul the dirt up, and fill it between the tracks,—fill up the hollow places, and round off the ground, so as to give drainage.'" And upon cross-examination Stevens further testified as follows: "The object of the work was, to fill up hollow places between the tracks, to finish and round off the grade in the yard, so as to give better drainage, and to give room for additional side tracks, when wanted."

This was all the testimony tending to show the character of the work. The language of the statute is: "Whenever any railroad company shall contract with any person for the construction of its road, or any part thereof, such railroad company shall take," etc. Laws 1872, p. 286. And the contention of counsel is that the act only applies to the original construction of the road, and not to work done in repairs and improvements,—“not in repairing one already built, nor throwing up an embankment to protect one already built, nor in filling between tracks so as to give drainage to the road-bed, and protect it from being washed by heavy rains.” Now, whatever may be the exact limitations of this act, we think there was sufficient testimony to sustain the finding that the work done was in the construction of a part of defendant's road. The act does not cease to be applicable when a single track has been completed, but applies whenever the company enlarges its road by the extension of its single track, or the addition of side tracks. Here was something more than repairs,—something more than embankment to protect track, or filling for purposes of drainage. Evidently, addi-
*563 tions to the road were contemplated. Side tracks were to *be graded for. A part of the road was to be built; and the act was applicable.

4. The debts were all originally to laborers, and for work done on this grade. But the present plaintiff was not the original creditor. The note he purchased, and the orders were drawn on him by the contractor. In this way the original creditors—the laborers—have received their pay, and transferred their claims to the plaintiff. But the debts have not been paid by the debtor,—the contractor. The language of the act is: "And if such railroad company shall fail to take such bond, such railroad company shall be liable to the persons herein mentioned to the full extent of all such debts so contracted by such contractor." This responsibility of the company stands in lieu of the bond, and is security for the debt; and when the debt is assigned it carries the security. We do not understand the expression, "liable to the persons herein mentioned," as making the security purely personal and non-assignable, but simply as imposing a direct and original liability, and independent of the amount remaining due by the company to the contractor.

Upon the whole case we think the judgment of the district court must be sustained.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. v. A. J. BAKER.

January Term, 1875.

Railroads: Laborers on: Time-Keeper: Superintendent: Act of 1872
Construed. One who is in the employ of a contractor with a railroad company simply as time-keeper and superintendent is not a laborer in the sense in which that term is used in chapter 136 of the Laws of 1872, and cannot recover of the railroad company the amount due him therefor by the contractor, notwithstanding the company failed to take the bond required by that statute.<sup>1</sup>

Baker sued the railway company before a justice of the peace to recover a balance of $104.13 due him "for labor as time-keeper on work of grading in the city of Parsons," on defendant's railroad. The bill of particulars, except as to the nature of plaintiff's claim, is very like that in Brown's Case, ante, *558. The case was removed to the district court, and there tried at the March term, 1874. Finding and judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

David Kelso, for plaintiff in error.

Baker represents that defendant entered into a contract with one McLeod to construct a part of its road, and that plaintiff served said McLeod in the capacity of "time-keeper," and occasionally as "superintendent" of the work, and that McLeod failed to pay him for such service the whole amount due him. He seeks to make the railroad company liable under the statute of 1872. The statute in question is entitled "An act to protect laborers, mechanics, and others in the construction of railroads," and provides, inter alia, that in case the railroad company shall fail to take the bond required by that act it shall be liable to the persons mentioned, viz., laborers, mechanics, and material-men, to the extent of the indebtedness due them, or either of them, from the contractor. It is nowhere alleged in the plaintiff's petition that he served the contractor, McLeod, either as laborer, mechanic, or material-man. The terms "laborer" and "mechanic" are not to be taken in their generic sense. The service of the physician who healed the wounds and cured the malady of the contractor, or the service of the attorney who drafted the contract between the employes and the contractor, or the service of the clerk who kept the time the employes worked, is not that class of work which the legislature intended should be paid for, within the meaning of the statute.

Words are to be construed as the legislature intended to use *565 them, which intent is to be gathered from the context.

Fitzpatrick v. Gebhart, 7 Kan. *35; Parkinson v. State, 14 Md. 184; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hemphill, 35 Miss. 17. In section 6, c. 38, Gen. St., it is evident that the legislature did not intend that the services of a clerk and a laborer or a mechanic were synonymous; and we think it is equally certain that the legislature, by the passage of chapter 136, Laws 1872, did not intend to protect the service of a clerk or time-keeper. The act itself is strictissimi juris, and its terms should not be enlarged so as to defeat the ends of justice, and require the corporation to pay their debts a second time, simply because it is a railroad corporation.

Davis & Talbot, for defendant in error.

Baker's services were rendered as "time-keeper." He was on the ground all the time, and had charge of the men. The statute does not in express terms name a time-keeper, or superintendent of work, but it was surely the intention of the legislature to protect all persons who contributed to the construction of the road. The statute is remedial, and should be liberally construed. The word "laborer" should not be construed in the strict sense claimed by plaintiff in error. That might be correct in the light of the decisions of some of the states in construing the term "laborer" in certain statutes, where the courts have held that the object of the statute under consideration was the relief of "a class who usually labor for small compensation, to whom the moderate pittance of their wages is an object of interest and necessity, and who are poorly qualified to take care of their own concerns, or look sharply after their employers." Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 642. On the contrary, it is evident, from the express language of the statute under which this suit is brought, that the object is not the protection of such alone as perform toilsome manual labor; for the merchant, though he be a millionaire, is protected, as is also the subcontractor. There would be no great violence done to the English language if the court should say that the services of Baker were done as "laborer;" nor can it be said that keeping the *566 time *of the hands, and superintending the work, was not a "part of the work given" by the company to McLeod. The statute should not be so construed as to require defendant below to pay its debts a second time simply because it is a railroad corporation, but it should be so construed as to protect the citizens against the gross negligence of defendant below in failing to take a bond as required by law.

BREWER, J. This case resembles in many respects the one of the same plaintiff in error against M. G. Brown, just decided, ante, *557. The contractor, and the work contracted for, were the same. There is, however, one material difference between the two cases,—a difference which is fatal to the claim of the defendant in error. The debts for which Brown's action was brought were debts to laborers. Baker sues for services rendered the contractor as "time-keeper" and "superintendent." Is such a debt one within the scope of the act? We think not. The act provides that the railroad company shall take from the contractor a "bond, conditioned that such person shall pay all laborers, mechanics, and material-men, and persons who supply such contractor with provisions or goods of any kind, all just debts due to such persons," etc., and, in case of a failure to take such bond, that the company "shall be liable to the persons herein mentioned to the full extent of all such debts so contracted by such contractor." Laws 1872, p. 286, § 1. This act does not provide that the company shall be responsible for all debts contracted by the contractor, but only those to certain classes of persons. Now, the only class in which Baker can by any sort of construction be placed is described by the term "laborers." Doubtless this term is often used in an enlarged sense, as embracing all persons who perform any kind of labor, physical or mental. In that sense any professional or literary man is a laborer; and in that sense Baker, as "time-keeper" and "superintendent," was a laborer. But it is very apparent that *567 it is not used in any such sense here. If it were, the succeeding term of description, "mechanics," would be superfluous, for a mechanic is in that sense unquestionably a laborer. Indeed, the terms of description associated with this clearly indicate its meaning. Noscitur a sociis. These show that it is here used in its more common acceptation, and in accordance with the definition given by Webster, as follows: "'Laborer.' One who labors in a toilsome occupation; a man who does work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan; sometimes called a 'laboring man.'" We find the terms "laborer" and "mechanic" used elsewhere in the statute in conjunction, and with the same meaning. See the exemption act, (Gen. St. 474, § 6,) where it is provided that no personal property "shall be exempt from attachment or execution for the wages of any clerk, mechanic, laborer, or servant." Counsel contends that this is a remedial statute, and should be liberally construed. But it is also a statute imposing an additional liability, and under which it is sought to make the company responsible for a debt it never contracted. Such a statute should never be extended beyond the fair import of its terms. If the legislature had intended to give all employes of a railroad contractor the benefit of its provisions, it could have expressed that intention in fewer words, and leaving no room for doubt. Designating classes, it intended that only those classes should be thus protected; and it could hardly have used terms more apt to exclude clerks, time-keepers, superintendents, and that kind of employes, than those actually used. Ericsson v. Brown, 38 Barb. 390; Aikin v. Wasson, 24 N. Y. 482. See, upon this general question, Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 640.

We think, therefore, the railroad company was not liable for the demand sued on in this action, and the judgment must be reversed. (All the justices concurring.)

*GILBERT U. PIPER v. UNION PAC. RY. CO.

January Term, 1875.

Title to Lands: Condition Subsequent: Breach of Condition: Action for Damages does not Pass to Grantee of the Land. On December 24, 1863, Alice Broome was the owner of a certain quarter section of land in Leavenworth county. A proceeding was then pending in the district court of said county, instituted by the railway company, for the purpose of obtaining a certain strip of said land one hundred feet wide for railroad purposes. On that same day said court, with the consent of both parties, rendered a judgment investing the railway company with the title in fee to said strip of land, upon condition that the railway company should immediately pay therefor to said Alice Broome $400, and, before May 1, 1864, make certain improvements thereon, and afterwards keep said improvements in repair. Said sum of $400 was immediately paid, but the improvements have never been made. On March 26, 1864, Alice Broome sold and conveyed said quarter-section of land to David F. Laughlin. On July 25, 1864, Laughlin sold and conveyed the north half thereof to Gilbert U. Piper, (the deed being recorded July 30, 1864,) and on October 27, 1865, Laughlin sold and conveyed the other half of the same to Piper, (the deed being recorded November 25, 1865.) Held, in an action brought by Piper to recover damages from the railway company because said improvements have not been made, that Piper cannot maintain such an action; that the obligation imposed upon the railway company by said judgment in favor of Alice Broome is not such an obligation as will continue to run with the land; that Broome's grantee, merely as owner of the land, whether before or after the obligation was broken, acquires no right to recover damages for a breach of such obligation.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Leavenworth district court.

Piper commenced his action against the railway company, seeking to recover damages for a breach of a judgment obligation, and also to recover possession of the strip of land concerning which the judgment imposing such obligation was rendered. Said judgment was rendered by the district court of Leavenworth county on the twenty-fourth of December, 1863, in an action or proceeding wherein the now defendant, the Union Pacific Railway Company, Eastern Division, was plaintiff, and James A. Broadhead, Alice Broome, and others were defendants; said proceedings being commenced and *569 *prosecuted by the railway company under the provisions of sections 8, 9, c. 86, Terr. Laws 1855, pp. 916, 917, to have its right of way condemned through the lands of said defendants. Said judgment is as follows:

"Leavenworth District Court. November Term, 1863. Present: Hon. Wm. C. McDowell, Judge; Alexander Repine, Sheriff; and John E. Blaine, Clerk. Thursday, December 24, 1863.

"The Leavenworth, Pawnee & Western Railroad Company, otherwise known as the Union Pacific Railway Co., Eastern Division, Plaintiff, v. James A. Broadhead, Alice Broome, and others, Defendants.

"And now on this day this cause came on for trial, upon the objections of Alice Broome filed herein to the report of the persons heretofore appointed herein to view certain lands, and assess certain damages to the same; and the court, having heard the evidence, and being well advised in the premises, finds for the objector, Alice Broome; and at the request and with the consent of both said plaintiff and said objector, Alice Broome, the court doth order, adjudge, and decree that the title in fee-simple of the strip of land one hundred feet in width, across and through the following described tract of land situate, lying, and being in the county of Leavenworth and state of Kansas, namely, the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 36, in township 9, of range 22, described as follows, namely, a strip of land 100 feet in width, with the center of the width of the same being on a line running along the center of the railroad track now graded through said quarter-section of land, be, and the same is hereby, vested in said plaintiff, in consideration and on the condition that the said plaintiff shall and does comply with and perform all the following judgments, orders, and decrees.

"And upon the further consent and request of both said plaintiff and said objector, Alice Broome, it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said plaintiff shall, before running any train of cars, and on or before the first day of May, 1864, erect a good, suitable, and sufficient lawful fence on and all along each side of said strip of land, except at the crossings hereinafter specified; and that said plaintiff shall immediately erect and construct, and put in good and sufficient condition for use, two crossings, over and across said railroad track, and said strip of land, in such manner and condition as that the *570 same can be conveniently used in, by, and for the *purpose of crossing said strip of land, including the railroad track, forever, with loaded and other teams, wagons, stock, and people; that one of said crossings shall be at the point where the old military road crossed the place where said track now is, and the other of said crossings shall be at some reasonable point on that part of said strip of land which lies along where said company has cut a new channel for Nine-mile creek to run in along-side of said track; and that said plaintiff shall also immediately construct and make a good and sufficient bridge, of at least twelve feet in width, over said creek where said new channel has been so cut, at the proper place, for use in connection with the last-mentioned crossing; and that the said plaintiff shall immediately construct and place in their places a good and sufficient flood-gate at each place where said Nine-mile creek shall or does cross either of the boundary lines of the strip of land first above mentioned, and also at such other points and places as shall or may be necessary to protect the remainder of said quarter section of land from stock of any kind which may get on said strip of land, or to keep all and any stock which may be on any other part of said quarter section of land from passing onto said strip of land in the channel or bed of any creek; and that the said plaintiff shall immediately construct good and sufficient gates at said crossways, and at all such points and places as shall or may be necessary, to keep all kinds of stock from passing over either or any part of either of the said boundary lines of said strip of land, at any place where such fence is not constructed; and that the said plaintiff shall forever hereafter keep said fence, crossways, flood-gates, bridge, and gates in such good order and condition so that they will at all times reasonably and safely answer and serve the purposes and use for which they are intended.

"And upon the further consent and request of both said plaintiff and said objector, Alice Broome, it is further ordered and adjudged that the said plaintiff shall immediately pay to said objector, Alice Broome, the sum of $400, and that the said objector, Alice Broome, have and recover of and from said plaintiff said sum of $400, and her costs herein expended, and that execution issue therefor.

The petition of Piper set forth this judgment, and alleged that the railway company had taken possession of said strip of land, and had used it for its track and other railroad purposes, and was still *571 so using it, claiming the right to hold, *use, and possess the same under said judgment, but had wholly failed to make any of the improvements mentioned in and required by said judgment; that plaintiff is the owner of said quarter section of land by purchase from one Laughlin, who purchased the same from said Alice Broome; and claiming to recover damages from defendant for a breach of the obligations imposed by said judgment, and to recover possession of the land on the ground of forfeiture. The defendant demurred because of a misjoinder of causes of action. The court sustained said demurrer, and gave plaintiff leave to separate his action into two, and to file two petitions. This was done; and thereafter this action proceeded upon the petition for damages for failure to construct and maintain the improvements mentioned in said judgment.<sup>1</sup> To the petition in this case the railway company answered, setting up three defenses: First, a general denial; second, the statute of limitations,—that said cause of action did not accrue within three years next before the commencement of the action; and, third, the pendency of the action of ejectment for the recovery of the land, as a plea in bar or abatement. Reply, a general denial. Trial at the February term, 1868. Verdict and judgment in favor of the railway company.

Clough & Wheat and Green & Foster, for plaintiff.

We suppose this case will be determined upon the effect of the judgment rendered on the twenty-fourth of December, 1863. The plaintiff is the owner of the lands described in the petition, except only and unless defendant became and continued the owner of the 100-foot strip by virtue of said judgment. Defendant had been, from the fourth of January, 1866, using said strip of land, and running its cars regularly thereon. The action was first commenced on the twenty-fifth of February, 1867; hence the three years relied on by defendant had not elapsed.

*572 *The evidence shows, and the jury find, that defendant had not performed any of the conditions of said judgment of December 24, 1863, and that the reasonable costs of putting upon the premises the improvements required by said judgment, on the first day of May, 1864, would have been $2,500. We submit that the making of those improvements was part, and a principal part, of the consideration for which defendant was to have the right of way over that strip, and that, unless the agreement shown by that judgment is binding and obligatory against defendant, the whole judgment amounts to nothing, and therefore defendant had no right of way over the land, or right to said strip. That said agreement is obligatory on defendant, (unless said judgment is void,) see Fletcher v. Holmes, 25 Ind. 458; Potter v. Parsons, 14 Iowa, 287; Crawford v. White, 17 Iowa, 561; Blake v. McKusick, 8 Minn. 341, (Gil. 298;) Swinfen v. Swinfen, 86 E. C. L. 503; Ewing v. Filley, 43 Pa. St. 384. Of course, the making of those improvements should be considered and stand as and for part of the damages to the land by reason of the right of way taken. The making of those improvements, or paying the value thereof, (said $2,500,) and also paying said $400, stand, in substance, in place of such an assessment of damages as should have been made after sustaining the objections of Alice Broome, under section 9, p. 917, Laws 1855, (or sections 52–66, pp. 376–382, Comp. Laws 1862;) and as the making of such improvements would have been for the benefit of the land, and, if made, would have been appurtenant thereto, of course the right to have them made passed with the conveyances of the land to the plaintiff. Spencer's Case, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 115.

VALENTINE, J. Upon no theory can this action for damages be maintained. If said judgment upon which the action is founded be considered as creating an estate upon condition, in favor of the railway company, and not as creating an obligation in the nature
*573 of a covenant, then the action, in whose*soever name it might be brought, should be for the recovery of the strip of land, and not for the recovery of damages. But if we consider such judgment as creating an obligation on the part of the railway company to make said improvements, in the nature of a covenant, then the action is certainly not commenced by the proper person. The judgment, so far as it imposes any obligation upon the railway company, is in its terms purely a personal judgment in favor of Alice Broome, and in favor of her alone. It does not purport to be in favor of her assigns, and the judgment has never been in fact assigned. And the mere sale and conveyance of the land mentioned in the judgment cannot work an assignment of the judgment. If we consider the obligation imposed upon the railway company by the judgment merely in the nature of a covenant, and not in the nature of a condition upon the breach of which the title of the railway company to said strip of land may be forfeited, then such obligation will have no connection whatever with the title to the land, or with the possession thereof, or with any estate therein; nor will anything to be done under such obligation have anything to do with either the title, or the possession, or the estate, or, indeed, with anything in existence at the time said judgment was rendered, connected in any way with such estate, title, or possession. The obligation was simply to create new improvements on the company's own land, and then to keep these new improvements in repair. It has never been understood that such an obligation would run with the land. See Spencer's Case, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 115 et seq. But even if this obligation, when first created by the judgment, was such an obligation as would run with the land, still the obligation was violated, and therefore converted into a mere personal chose in action, not assignable by a mere conveyance of the land, long before Piper obtained any interest in the land. Piper obtained his first interest in said land on July 25, 1864, (the deed was recorded July 30;) but all said improvements were to have been made before the first day of May of that year. And Piper *574 *did not purchase the south half of said quarter section till October 27, 1865, (the deed was recorded November 25.) Under this state of the facts Piper could not maintain any action for a breach of the said obligation. Spencer's Case, supra; Rawle, Cov. (4th Ed.) 318-322, and cases there cited. A covenant, when broken, becomes a personal chose in action, and never afterwards runs with the land. There is no claim that this judgment obligation, which is in its terms personal, has any greater power to run with the land than a covenant which is usually made in express terms to the assigns of the covenantee as well as to the covenantee himself.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

GILBERT U. PIPER v. UNION PAC. RY. CO.

January Term, 1875.

Title to Lands: Condition Subsequent: Breach: When Right to Demand Forfeiture of Estate is not Assignable. On December 24, 1863, Alice Broome was the owner of a certain quarter section of land in Leavenworth county. A proceeding was then pending in the district court of said county, instituted by the railway company, for the purpose of obtaining a certain strip of said land, one hundred feet wide, for railroad purposes. On that same day said court, with the consent of both parties, rendered a judgment investing the railway company with the title in fee to said strip of land, upon condition that the railway company should immediately pay therefor to said Alice Broome $400, and before May 1, 1864, make certain improvements thereon, and afterwards keep said improvements in repair. The said sum of $400 was immediately paid, but the improvements have never been made. On March 26, 1864, Alice Broome sold and conveyed said quarter section of land to David F. Laughlin. On July 25, 1864, Laughlin sold and conveyed the north half thereof to Gilbert U. Piper, and on October 27, 1865, Laughlin sold and *575 conveyed the *other half of the same to Piper. Held, in an action brought by Piper to recover from the railway company said strip of land, that Piper has no legal right to demand that said improvements shall be made, or that because the same have not been made that the railway company shall forfeit said strip of land to him. And further held, that the railway company by said judgment obtained an estate upon condition subsequent in said strip of land, and that the right to demand a forfeiture of the estate for condition broken is not so far assignable that whoever may own the quarter section of land, whether he purchased it before or after condition broken, may demand the forfeiture.

Error from Leavenworth district court.

Ejectment brought by Piper. This action was originally joined with the preceding action between these same parties. See, ante, *568, where a full statement of the facts, and the judgment under which the railway company claims title, will be found. Upon a separation of the causes of action, as there stated, Piper filed in this case an ordinary petition in ejectment for the recovery of said 100-foot strip. Defendant answered—First, a general denial; second, title in fee in defendant; and, third, the pendency of the other action for damages. Second trial at the November term, 1870. At the close of the testimony the court instructed the jury as follows: "In the view of this case taken by the court, it will be your duty to return a verdict for the defendant." Verdict for the defendant.

Clough & Wheat and Hurd & Stillings, for plaintiff.

The evidence and admissions in the case show title to the land in controversy in plaintiff, unless the condemnation proceedings commenced in 1863, and the judgment of twenty-fourth December, 1863, vested the title thereto in the railway company. We claim those proceedings are void for want of jurisdiction thereof by the court which acted thereon. The charter of the Leavenworth, Pawnee &

Western Railroad Company (which is on pages 914-920, Laws *576 1855) was given in evidence *on the trial. The condemnation proceedings, which include the above-named judgment of the twenty-fourth of December, were had under said charter, notwithstanding the enactment of sections 52-66, pp. 376-382, Comp. Laws 1862; subsequently to the enactment of said charter, which required different proceedings, before different parties, to condemn a right of way, than those shown on said trial. That the mode of condemning a right of way provided for in said charter was merely matter of remedy, see Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Nesbit, 10 How. 395.

But if the court had jurisdiction to render said judgment, still we claim that until compensation was made for the right of way, or said strip of land, the defendant had not the right of possession thereof. See section 4, art. 12, Const. See, also, Spaulding v. Hallenbeck, 35 N. Y. 206; Carpenter v. Oswego & S. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 655; Wager v. Troy Union R. Co., 25 N. Y. 526. The railroad track was laid on said strip in 1866, which was after plaintiff became owner of the quarter section, and he was in possession of the strip when the railroad company commenced to lay the track. Alice Broome remained in possession of the strip in controversy until she delivered same to Laughlin, her grantee; and Laughlin continued in possession thereof until he delivered same to plaintiff, his grantee; and the improvements required by said judgment have not been made. We submit that the common-law rule in relation to who can or cannot take advantage of conditions subsequent have nothing to do with this case, or a proper construction of said judgment, because the making of the improvements was part of the compensation required to be made to entitle the railroad company to have or use the land. As the evidence showed that Alice Broome remained in possession until she conveyed to Laughlin,—a period of 92 days, time enough for the railroad company to have made the improvements several times,—and as her continuing so in possession prevented her from making a re-entry for breach of condition subsequent, (if making the improvements was a condition subsequent, which we deny,) the law does not require her to attempt an absurd act, to-wit, that of *577 entering upon a tract of land of which *she was already in possession; and therefore the failure of the railroad company to make the improvements can be relied on by plaintiff as breach of a condition subsequent. Lincoln & K. Bank v. Drummond, 5 Mass. 321; Hamilton v. Elliott, 5 Serg. & R. 375; Andrews v. Senter, 32 Me. 394; 2 Coke, Litt. 218a.

As the two actions were commenced under section 99 of the Code of 1859, after the demurrer for misjoinder was sustained, in pursuance of leave given so to do, we suppose it clear that neither could be pleaded in bar of the other; and we submit that even if the said judgment of twenty-fourth December, 1863, is valid, that plaintiff is entitled to recover and retain possession of said strip until said judgment is complied with by the railroad company, and; to do so, to remove defendant therefrom by process of ejectment.

After default of defendant to comply with and perform the other conditions, Mrs. Broome conveyed part of the land to plaintiff, and part to Laughlin, who afterwards conveyed to plaintiff. The road was completed and commenced running in 1865, and the plaintiff witnessed the laying of the track and completion of the road. After the company had commenced running the road, Piper demanded that the judgment should be performed by the company. The questions which arise upon this judgment, and the facts thus admitted by the plaintiff, are—First, whether there was any remedy to any party but Mrs. Broome on this decree, after the failure of defendant to make the improvements before the first day of May, 1864; second, whether plaintiff acquired any right growing out of that decree by a mere conveyance of the land; and, third, whether plaintiff can sustain this action for the recovery of the land, and thereby interrupt the running of the road for a failure to perform those conditions.

That Mrs. Broome could have sustained an action for damages on the second day of May, 1864, we think could not be questioned. Masterton v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 62; Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co., 12 N. Y. 122; Beddoe v. Wadsworth, 21 Wend. 121; Hamilton v. Wilson, 4 Johns. 72; Underhill v. Saratoga & W. R. Co., 20 Barb. *578 455; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas.*141, 158, 190; 4 Kent, Comm. 471; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. 665; New Jersey C. R. Co. v. Hetfield, 29 N. J. Law, 206. And in such case she had a right to recover, not only the value of such improvements for present use, but their value to the farm as fixtures thereto, with the obligation with them to keep them in repair. Conceding that she might have entered for the non-performance of these conditions, which were in their nature conditions subsequent, yet the right of entry was her personal privilege, and did not pass with her conveyance of the fee. Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co., 12 N. Y. 121; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas.; 4 Kent, Comm. 471; Wilder v. Seelye, 8 Barb. 413; Ludlow v. New York & H. R. Co., 12 Barb. 440; Underhill v. Saratoga & W. R. Co., 20 Barb. 455. That a mere conveyance of the land transfers no right of action for broken covenants or agreements, we refer to the cases in 4 Johns. 72. A right of action never passes by deed of conveyance of land merely, except where it is on a covenant running with the land. To be a covenant running with the land, it must, in such case as this, have been one to keep in repair or maintain something that had become a fixture to the land. A covenant to build a house is not a covenant running with the land, but a mere personal covenant. When the house is built, and becomes a part of the realty, it would then be competent to make a covenant to keep it in repair. That would be a covenant running with the land. 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 141, 190, 206; Hamilton v. Wilson, 4 Johns. 72; 4 Kent, Comm. 471. What, then, were the rights of the parties when the title to the quarter section vested in the plaintiff? Mrs. Broome had parted with the right of the strip in dispute, for which she held the defendant bound to do certain things. The defendant had failed to perform certain agreements which had been reduced to a decree. Mrs. Broome had a clear right of action against defendant for all the damages to her, or the less value of her estate by reason of the failure. It could hardly be contended that she could recover the entire value on this agreement, and yet the plaintiff recover the land.

The question as to the mode of proceeding is immaterial. The form could make no difference, as the subject-matter and parties were before the court, and the decree was entered by consent, *579 without regard to the form of the pleadings. If the *district court could in any form have jurisdiction, the judgment entered by consent is binding. Lessee v. Thompson, 3 Ohio, 272; Carter v. Walker, 2 Ohio St. 339; Castleton v. Miner, 8 Vt. 208; Robinson v. West, 1 Sandf. 19; Malone v. Clark, 2 Hill, 657; County of Randolph v. Ralls, 18 Ill. 29; Wells v. Scott, 4 Mich. 347.

VALENTINE, J. This case and the one just decided (of this same title) arose out of the same transactions, and the facts of the two cases, up to the amendment of the original petition in the court below, separating that case from this, and filing a new petition for each case, are identical. Both cases are founded upon, or at least connected with, a certain judgment of the district court of Leavenworth county, rendered December 24, 1863. At the time said judgment was rendered Alice Broome owned the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 36, in township No. 9, of range No. 22, in Leavenworth county. At the same time the defendant in this case, the railway company, had possession of a strip of said land, one hundred feet wide, running through said quarter section, which it was grading, and intending to use for railroad purposes; and the proceeding in which said judgment was rendered was a proceeding instituted by the railway company for the purpose of obtaining the title to said strip of land for railroad purposes, under the power of eminent domain, and was pending in said district court when said judgment was rendered. The judgment in said proceeding was finally rendered by the consent of both parties, and was, in substance, as follows: The railway company was invested with the title in fee to said strip of land upon condition that it pay for the same, to Alice Broome, \$400, and make certain improvements thereon, and afterwards keep said improvements in repair. All these things were to be done by the railway company before the first day of May, 1864. The railway company immediately paid said \$400, but they have failed up to this time to make said improvements, although they have been operating their road over said strip for several years. This action, since its separation from the \*580 other action, has been for the recovery of \*said strip of land.

The other action, since its separation from this, has been for the recovery of damages for the failure of the railway company to make said improvements. The verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court below in this case were for the defendant, and the plaintiff, Piper, now brings the case to this court.

The first question raised in this case by the plaintiff is that the original judgment out of which these two cases originated is void for want of jurisdiction in the court rendering such judgment to render the same. This question has already been before this court, and decided adversely to the plaintiff, and we do not now choose to again consider the same. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. McCarty, 8 Kan. *125. The question was there decided in a case involving the validity of a judgment almost precisely like the judgment in question in this case, and which was rendered at the same time that this judgment was rendered, and by the same court, under the same laws, and in the same proceeding; and the case just decided, of this title, (ante, *568,) was prosecuted by the plaintiff, and was decided by this court, upon the assumed validity of said judgment, and we shall now follow those cases without further consideration or investigation.

The next question is whether the plaintiff may recover in this action notwithstanding the assumed validity of said judgment. It will be noticed that it is not Alice Broome who prosecutes the action, but it is Gilbert U. Piper. Then, where does Piper get his authority for prosecuting the action? Simply from the following facts: On March 26, 1864, Alice Broome sold and conveyed said quarter section of land to David F. Laughlin. On July 25, 1864, Laughlin sold and conveyed the north half thereof to Piper; and on October 27, 1865, Laughlin sold and conveyed the other half of the same to Piper. Now, are these facts sufficient to authorize Piper to prosecute this action, or, indeed, to prosecute any action, against the railway company? We think not. The judgment itself, so far as it attempts to impose any obligation upon the railway company, is in favor *581 of Alice Broome alone. *It does not purport to be in favor of her assigns, and it has never been in fact assigned to any one. And the mere sale and conveyance of the land mentioned in the judgment cannot work an assignment of the judgment. In the other action the plaintiff claimed that said judgment created an obligation resting upon the railway company, in the nature of a covenant running with the land, to make such improvements; and in that action it was necessary for the plaintiff to so claim, for under no other theory could he maintain that action. But in this action he substantially claims that the estate vested by the judgment in the railway company for said strip of land was merely an estate upon condition, liable to be forfeited back to Alice Broome, or to her assigns, upon any failure of such condition. And it is as necessary for him to so claim in this action as it was to make the other claim in the other action; for if the estate conveyed were an estate absolute, and the plaintiff had nothing but a mere judgment, or a mere covenant for the erection of said improvements, and no right to claim a forfeiture of the land for condition broken, his only remedy for a failure to make the improvements would be an action for damages, and not an action for the recovery of the land, as in this case. We agree with the plaintiff that the estate conveyed by said judgment was an estate upon condition. But as the estate was, by the very terms of the judgment, to be immediately vested in the railway company, the condition was subsequent, and not precedent. And the right to demand a forfeiture of the estate for condition broken was vested in Alice Broome alone, and not in her assigns. The judgment, in legal effect, we think, vested the whole of the estate in said strip of land immediately in the railway company, subject, however, to be forfeited back to Alice Broome, at her election, upon condition that the railway company did not fulfill the obligations imposed upon it by the judgment. See Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co., 12 N. Y. 121; S. C. 12 Barb. 461.

The railway company failed to fulfill said obligations, but Alice Broome has never elected to demand a forfeiture of said estate.

*582 Indeed, it* would almost seem from the authorities that, by selling and conveying all her interest in the land before the condition was broken, she waived the fulfillment of the condition, or, at least, waived the forfeiture. Underhill v. Saratoga & W. R. Co., 20 Barb. 455; Rice v. Boston R. Co., 12 Allen, 142; Hooper v. Cummings, 45 Me. 359. But, however this may be, Piper obtained no right to demand a fulfillment of the conditions, or to demand a forfeiture of the estate. See authorities above cited, and Ludlow v. New York & H. R. Co., 12 Barb. 440. The right of a person who has created an estate upon condition to demand a forfeiture of the estate for condition broken is not assignable, (Washb. Real Prop. c. 14, par. 14, and the numerous cases there cited,) and certainly not assignable by an ordinary deed of conveyance. In the present case, when Alice Broome parted with her interest in said land there had been no breach of said condition. But before Piper obtained any interest in the land the breach of the condition, if there ever has been any such breach, had become complete. The failure to make said improvements occurred while Laughlin owned the land. When Alice Broome conveyed said land to Laughlin she had no estate in said strip of land, and no present power of obtaining any such estate. Her right at that time was merely a possible future contingent interest. See Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co., supra. The present and existing estate and interest in said strip of land was at that time wholly in the railway company. Therefore, as Alice Broome had no present and existing estate in said strip of land when she conveyed said quarter section to Laughlin, she, of course, conveyed no interest in the strip to Laughlin, and, as we have before seen, the personal right of demanding a forfeiture does not pass by a deed of conveyance of the land. A party who has no estate cannot convey an estate. But even if she had conveyed some interest in said strip to Laughlin, still Piper has hardly obtained it. The supposed breach of the condition occurred while Laughlin owned said quarter section, and therefore, even if the right to demand *583 a forfeiture for condition broken *was assigned to Laughlin, still the right became personal to him, and he has never exercised it. Even after condition broken the title to the property does not, as a rule of law, pass to the person entitled to receive the same until such person in some proper way demands a forfeiture of the property. 1 Washb. Real Prop. c. 14, par. 13. Now, Laughlin never demanded a forfeiture of the property by entry, suit, or otherwise. After Laughlin sold the north half of said quarter section to Piper, and while Piper owned one-half of the same and Laughlin the other, could one of them have demanded a forfeiture as to that portion of the strip running through his own eighty-acre tract, and both of them have allowed the railway company to retain the strip through the other eighty-acre tract? Could they divide up the forfeiture? Or could one, against the will of the other, have demanded a forfeiture? The fact is, neither of them ever had any right to demand a forfeiture.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

WILLIAM W. ROLLER and others v. JOHN M. SNODGRASS.

January Term, 1875.

Parties: Petition to be Joined as Defendants: Refusal to Grant, not Error. Where an action for the dissolution of a corporation is pending in the district court, said corporation being the defendant, and a stockholder therein being the plaintiff, and the parties, by a written stipulation filed in the case, settle the matters in controversy, but no judgment is yet rendered in the case upon such settlement; and a third party, who is also a stockholder in said corporation, then petitions the court to be made a party defendant in the action, so that he may contest the plaintiff's cause of action upon its merits, alleging collusion and fraud upon the part of the plaintiff and defendant in seeking to dissolve the corporation; and the court denies such petition, and then, *upon rendering the final judgment in the case, renders the same according to said stipulation, and with the consent of the plaintiff and defendant, in favor of the plaintiff, but for costs only, and does not dissolve the corporation: held, that the court below, in denying said petition of said third party, did not commit such an error as will require, or even authorize, a reversal of the judgment.

In an action pending in the district court, wherein Snodgrass was plaintiff, and the Ottawa Furniture & Wood-work Company was defendant, Roller and three others sought to be made parties defendant, and filed their petition praying to be so joined. The district court, at the March term, 1873, refused to grant said petition, and gave judgment in said action in accordance with the stipulation of the parties thereto. From such decision and order of said district court, in denying their application to be made parties defendant, Roller and the other petitioners appeal, and bring the case here for review, making Snodgrass only, defendant in error.

Wm. H. Maxwell, for plaintiffs in error.

Mason & Parkinson, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This action was brought by Snodgrass against the Ottawa Furniture & Wood-work Company, a corporation doing business at Ottawa. Snodgrass was a stockholder in said company. The object of the action was to have the business affairs of the company closed up, and the corporation dissolved. What the entire proceedings were in the court below we cannot tell; for the record brought to this court does not purport to contain all the proceedings, and we know from the record itself that it does not contain them all. We would presume, however, that among the proceedings a receiver was appointed who took charge of the affairs of the company for a time; that afterwards all the questions involved in the case were settled by all the parties *interested therein by a written stipulation filed in the case; that in pursuance of this settlement and stipulation the court afterwards discharged the receiver, and rendered judgment merely for costs in favor of the plaintiff. But the most of this we infer merely from some recitals in a journal entry of the proceedings of the court, for neither the appointment of the receiver, nor the report of his proceedings, nor said stipulation, is contained in the record brought to this court. Both the plaintiff and defendant seem to be satisfied with the judgment rendered in this case, but other parties, to-wit, W. W. Roller, John Roller, Albert Gottschalk, and C. M. Ott, complain, and these parties bring the case to this court. They have not, however, made the Ottawa Furniture & Wood-work Company a party in this court.

Possibly said company would not like to have the judgment below reversed, and have the case remanded for further proceedings. Ferguson v. Smith, 10 Kan. *394. Said receiver was discharged on March 29, 1873. At that time, according to said journal entry, said stipulation was on file in the case. The defendant in error says in his brief that said stipulation was a full settlement of all the matters in controversy in this case, and that it was signed by all the parties interested, including these plaintiffs in error; but whether this is so or not we cannot tell from the record. On April 3, 1873, five days after said stipulation is known to have been on file in the case, the plaintiffs in error filed a petition asking to be made parties defendant in the action, alleging that they were stockholders in said corporation, that they were interested in the controversy, and alleging collusion and fraud on the part of the plaintiff and defendant in seeking to dissolve the corporation, and various other things. On April 7th the court below denied said petition, and then, on the same day, rendered said judgment for costs in favor of the plaintiff, Snodgrass, and against the said Furniture and Wood-work Company. What the costs were, what the amount was, or for what items they might be charged, we cannot tell, as the record does not show, and they have never been taxed.

*586 *The first, and about the only, ruling of the court below complained of is the denying of said petition of plaintiffs in error to be made parties to the action. Now, what evidence was introduced, or what other matters were taken into consideration by the court below upon the hearing of said petition, we are not advised. Possibly the evidence introduced on the hearing may have shown that the matters alleged in said petition were not true. This petition was an application on the part of the plaintiffs in error to be made parties defendant, so that they might contest the plaintiff's cause of action upon its merits. But the merits of the action, we must presume from the record, had already been settled, and no judgment upon the merits was rendered in favor of the plaintiff below, and no judgment upon the merits was rendered which could in the least injure any one of the plaintiffs in error. If the plaintiffs in error had been allowed to contest the action, they could not have got any more favorable judgment for the said company, or for their own interests therein, than was actually rendered by the court. They simply did not want the corporation dissolved, and it was not dissolved. It is possible that they might have made some change in regard to the costs, but what change, if any, we cannot tell from the record presented to us. If we had a full record of all the proceedings in the court below, it is possible that we might find that the plaintiffs in error had, by said stipulation, estopped themselves from raising any question, either upon the merits of the action or as to costs. But in whatever light we may view the record, the plaintiffs have lost nothing directly, and but very little, if anything, indirectly, by failing to be made parties to the action. As we have before said, the only change that they could possibly have made in the judgment by being parties, and contesting the case, would have been as to costs. And as these costs are imposed by the judgment on the Furniture & Wood-work Company, and not on the plaintiffs, the only injury to them is an indirect injury, by tending to depreciate the value of their stock. We should think *587 that the court would, in cases of *this kind, have some discretion in allowing or disallowing new parties to come in for the purpose of contesting some question in the case; and, if so, it would seem almost like an abuse of discretion for a court to allow a new party, who had no direct, but only an indirect and remote, interest in the matters in controversy, to come in and contest the entire case, merely to save a very small amount of costs (how small we cannot tell) from being imposed upon a corporation of which he was a member, when the corporation itself had ample notice of the suit, and was not unwilling that the costs should be so taxed. The court below clearly did not commit any abuse of discretion. While courts of equity will protect the rights of individuals, yet something must always be left to the discretion of such courts; and while courts of equity will often protect individual stockholders of a corporation from the wrongful or unjust acts of the directors of such corporation, yet some discretion must always be left for the directors to exercise. They must have some power to determine what is for the best interests of the corporation; and courts should not, in doubtful cases, say that they have mistaken the best interests of the corporation, and therefore reverse their action.

We do not think that it is necessary in this case to decide whether the petition of the plaintiff below stated a good cause of action or not; or whether a corporation can answer only under seal or not; or whether the petition of the plaintiffs in error in the court below was sufficient or not, prima facie, to make them parties defendant; for neither the plaintiff nor defendant in the action are now complaining, and the only parties complaining are parties who complain merely because some indefinite amount of costs was taxed against a corporation of which they were members. While we do not think that the court below, under the facts of this case, (as we would presume them to be from the record,) committed any error, yet we feel clear that, view the record as we may, no such error was committed as will require, or even authorize, a reversal of the judgment below.

*588    *HORACE H. WILCOX v. ARCHIBALD ELLIS, Treasurer, etc.

January Term, 1875.

1. Taxation: Purchase Money Conditionally Due on Sale of Lands in Another State not Taxable in Kansas. In the year 1868, W. agreed in writing to sell and convey certain lands in Illinois to L., and L., in consideration therefor, executed his promissory notes to W., which notes were by agreement deposited with certain bankers in Illinois. These were the only instruments executed between the parties. By agreement L. was to make payments on the notes from time to time, paying, at least, the value of eighty acres of the land annually, until all the land should be paid for, and was to receive a deed from W. for each eighty-acre tract of land as he (L.) paid for the same; but, if L. should at any time fail to make said annual payment, he was to forfeit all payments made after the last preceding conveyance. The land was to remain the property of W. until paid for. On March 1, 1872, the value of the land not yet paid for was $6,000, and the amount of the notes not yet paid was the same. The notes still remained with said bankers in Illinois. At that time (March 1, 1872) said W. was a resident of Butler county, Kansas, and during that year the taxing officers of said Butler county assessed and levied taxes against W. on the said $6,000 not yet paid on said land. Held, that said $6,000 was not taxable in Kansas.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———. Where land is sold and conveyed, and notes given for the purchase money, the vendee may be taxed for the land, and the vendor for the notes received for the purchase money. But where one still owns the land, having only conditionally sold it, as in this case, he cannot legally be taxed both for the land and for the notes executed and conditionally deposited with a third party for the purchase money.

Error from Butler district court.

Injunction, brought by Wilcox to restrain Ellis, as county treasurer, from collecting the tax levied on $6,000 assessed as personal property. The agreed statement of facts shows that Wilcox had been a resident of Plum Grove township, in Butler county, for five years previously, and was such resident on the first of March, 1872; that he listed under oath, and returned to the proper assessor, his personal property for that year, shortly after the first of March, and that afterwards the county clerk increased the amount of Wilcox's personal property $6,000. Wilcox paid all his other taxes, *589 and then *sought to enjoin the tax of $229.50 levied on said $6,000. The district court, at the September term, 1873, refused the injunction prayed for, entered a decree dismissing plaintiff's petition, and gave judgment in favor of Ellis for costs.

<sup>1</sup> Persons residing in this state are not subject to assessment and taxation in respect to business or interests beyond the territory and jurisdiction of the state, and which the laws of the state cannot in any way reach or protect. The maxim of the common law, mobilia sequuntur personam, does not always nor absolutely apply for the purpose of taxation to intangible personal property. Fisher v. County of Rush, 19 Kan. 414. See Blain v. Irby, 25 Kan. 499.

R. M. Ruggles, for plaintiff.

In the year 1868, Wilcox agreed in writing to sell certain real estate in the state of Illinois to one Lovatt, for a price agreed upon between them, and Lovatt gave his notes for the amount; it being agreed that the notes were to be left at a banking-house in Hancock county, Illinois, and as fast as said Lovatt should make payment on said notes, from time to time, the plaintiff should convey to him a proportionate amount of said real estate. No deed was made to Lovatt at the time of the sale. No mortgage was given to secure the payment of the notes. Whenever an amount was paid equal in amount to the value of eighty acres, then a conveyance was to be executed by plaintiff to Lovatt for such eighty acres, and so on until all the land should be paid for. On said contract $6,000 remained unpaid on the first day of March, 1872, and is the same $6,000 placed on the tax-roll by the clerk of Butler county in said year.

Were said notes personal property? We claim not. The notes were given with the contract, and constituted a part thereof, both being in reference to the sale of real estate not yet conveyed. The notes by the said agreement were never the property of plaintiff, but were delivered to the bank in escrow. They were not to be delivered to plaintiff, but only the proceeds of the notes as fast as paid. It was property over which plaintiff could exercise no control whatever, and, so far as he is concerned, his taxable interest would be the same if no notes had been executed, and there had been merely the agreement in writing to sell. If the plaintiff had agreed to execute a conveyance to the lands as fast as Lovatt paid certain amounts *590 of money, and the money to be payable *from year to year, but no notes had been executed, it certainly cannot be claimed that plaintiff would have had such an interest in the agreement as would be taxable as personal property; that is, it certainly could not be taxable as a debt due plaintiff. What difference does it make, then, that the notes were executed? They are no more an indebtedness due plaintiff, as they were merely delivered in escrow, to be of effect only upon their payment, than the agreement to pay certain sums in the written agreement would be an indebtedness due plaintiff. If the notes were paid, then, as fast as payment was made, plaintiff would have a personal property interest which would be taxable, and not till then.

There is still another reason why this $6,000 should not be taxable as personal property to plaintiff. Until said notes were paid the real estate was to remain the property of the plaintiff. There can be no doubt that the equitable, as well as the legal, title in the real estate, while the notes were unpaid, remained in plaintiff, and he was liable for the taxes on the real estate while such notes were unpaid. Then, if his $6,000 of real estate was subject to taxation, (as it certainly was,) it cannot be held that the personal property of $6,000 in notes, which merely conditionally represented the $6,000 in real estate, was taxable; for if it is so held, the plaintiff will be taxed for $12,000 of property, when he is the owner of but $6,000.

But, if taxable at all, the next question to determine is, where is said $6,000 in notes taxable? We claim that these notes, if taxable at all, are taxable in the state of Illinois. See St. Ill. c. 89, §§ 45, 46, 48. But if it is claimed that we have no right to refer to the statutes of Illinois, as they were not read in evidence on the trial of the cause in the court below,—which proposition we deny, (Bradley v. Mutual B. L. Ins. Co., 3 Lans. 341,)—then we say that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that the laws of Illinois upon the subject-matter in litigation are the same as the laws of this state; and, presuming the laws of Illinois to be the same as those of Kansas, would the said $6,000 (supposing *591 it *to be personal property) be subject to taxation in the state of Illinois? We take it that it would. Every dollar of real and personal property within the state of Kansas is subject to taxation, unless the same falls under the provisions of section 3, art. 2, or section 5, art. 3, of our tax law, (chapter 107, Gen. St.) It cannot certainly be claimed that the $6,000 in question is included in either of the said sections above named. That such was the intention of the legislature is evidenced by section 10 of article 3 of said chapter 107. Can any one own or possess personal property in any different relation than specified in said section 10? We cannot see how one can. Then, presuming the laws of Illinois to be the same as Kansas, the $6,000 is certainly subject to taxation in Illinois, if subject to taxation at all. But there is still another reason. There is a principle, but one merely of fiction, that mobilia personam sequuntur, upon which the defendant entirely relies in this case. This principle (so called) is by no means of universal application, and always yields when justice so demands. Personal property as well as real property has a situs; and only for certain purposes (and those very few, and growing fewer as time advances) does the principle that “things movable go with the person” apply. We claim that wherever personal property is situated, there is it subject to taxation, notwithstanding the fact of the owner being a non-resident of the state where the same is situated. Catlin v. Hill, 21 Vt. 152; People v. Gardner, 51 Barb. 352; Duer v. Small, 17 How. Pr. 201; People v. Ogdensburgh, 48 N. Y. 397; Hoyt v. Com’rs of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 228; McCormick v. Fitch, 14 Minn. 252, (Gil. 185;) St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co., 40 Mo. 580; Wilkey v. Pekin, 19 Ill. 160; Powell v. Madison, 21 Ind. 335; Rieman v. Shepard, 27 Ind. 288; St. Louis v. Ferry Co., 11 Wall. 430; Story, Conf. Laws, § 550. In New York it was held that loans in other states, upon securities taken and held in those states by the agents of the owner, resident of the state of New York, were not within the state of New York, and therefore not taxable there. People v. Gardner, supra. In Missouri it was held that the personal property of a resident, actually situated beyond the limits of that state, is without its jurisdiction, and cannot be assessed for taxation within that state; but the property of a non-resident is taxable there, if it be situate within the local jurisdiction, *592 whether in the *hands of its owner or its agent. St. Louis v.

Wiggins Ferry Co., 40 Mo. 580; St. Joseph v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 39 Mo. 476; and see Finley v. Philadelphia, 32 Pa. St.

381. Let us test the proposition "that things movable follow the person of the owner;" that is, the legal situs of personal property is the domicile of its owner. Suppose that a person, resident of this state, dies, the owner of goods, chattel, credits, and effects situate in another state, and an administrator was appointed in this state, can it be claimed that such an administrator can administer upon such personal property beyond the limits of this state, independent of some authority under the law of the state in which it is situated? We think not; but if the principle that the situs of personal property is the domicile of its owner, such administrator certainly could administer upon such property, as such property would legally, if not actually, be situated in this state. Williams, Ex'rs, 377; Kent, Comm. 563, note c.

The notes sought to be taxed were never in the state of Kansas, nor out of the state of Illinois, nor in any other place than at the bank in Hancock county, Illinois. Was it the intention of the legislature of this state to impose a tax upon the personal estate of its residents situate beyond its jurisdiction? We think not. The legislature of this state did not, like the legislature of other states, make a provision whereby the owner (resident of this state) of personal property situate beyond its limits might exempt such property from taxation by making affidavit, or giving other satisfactory proof, that such property was subject to taxation in the state in which it is situated. Then, no distinction can be made between personal property without the state, taxed where it is situated, and property without the state, not taxed where it is situated. The legislature did not intend to tax personal property beyond the limits of this state, for such property would be subject to the burden of taxation in two places,—where it is situated, and the domicile of its owner.

We have given the books a thorough examination, and we are unable to find any case deciding that personal property situated beyond the limits of a state is taxable in such state, except in the state of the statutes of that state not possessed by the statutes of any other state in the Union, we believe. In that state the statute expressly requires a person to list, on oath, a sum sufficient to cover what he is worth from all sources, not computing therein the first three hundred dollars in value, nor lands not within that state, nor other property out of that state subject to taxation by the laws of the country where situate, (Laws Ky. 1837,) and at the same time provides a way to ascertain whether such property situate beyond the limits of the state is in fact taxed or not by the state wherein it is situated, by requiring the person listing to make oath that such property is taxed in said state. Unless such affidavit is made, personal property situate beyond the limits of the state of Kentucky will be taxed to its owners resident within the state. There is no room for doubt as to the intention of the legislature in that state as to taxing personal property situate beyond its limits, and owned by residents of the state, as it expressly says that such personal property shall be taxable in said state, unless actually taxed where situated. See, also, Johnson v. Com., 7 Dana, 338; Com. v. Hays, 8 B. Mon. 2; Young v. Harris, 14 B. Mon. 648. But our statutes say nothing about property beyond the limits of the state in any way, not even providing for the exemption of personal property beyond the state actually taxed where situated, showing conclusively that the legislature never intended to tax property beyond its limits. But even if the legislature had so intended, or had said so in express terms, we contend that such legislation could not have been upheld as a proper exercise of the taxing power. State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300; St. Louis v. Ferry Co., 11 Wall. 430; Atlantic Monthly, January, 1874; Southern Law Rev. April, 1874, p. 247.

A. L. Redden, Co. Atty., for defendant.

The notes were the personal property of the plaintiff. Though this contract of sale is peculiar in its terms, yet its legal effect can be none other than the same as if a bond for a deed had been given by plaintiff to Lovatt for these lands, with agreement therein to *594 convey the lands by parts, upon the *payment of each respective note. If Lovatt fails to pay any of the notes, plaintiff can tender him a deed for eighty acres, and sue him on the note due, and recover. His remedy thereon would be just the same, and just as effectual, as if a formal bond for a deed had been given. That the notes, by agreement were to be left at a bank, does not affect or control the nature of the transaction, nor abridge any of the plaintiff's rights under the contract, nor as owner of the notes. This was simply a place of deposit, agreed upon for the mutual convenience of the parties. The plaintiff contemplated being, and has been, ever since the summer of 1868, a resident of this state; and Lovatt very naturally made a stipulation for his convenience, so that, wherever plaintiff might be, these notes would be accessible to him when they matured, and he, upon payment, could have them delivered to him. The plaintiff could assign and transfer his right to them just as effectually as if they were in his possession, and his assignee or indorsee would then be entitled to receive the proceeds thereof. Any conveyance of these lands made by Wilcox after this contract of sale would have transferred a title subject to all of Lovatt's rights and equities, just as much as if a bond for a deed had been held by Lovatt, and plaintiff afterwards conveyed to a third party. That the land was to remain the property of the plaintiff till the payments respectively were made, makes no difference, for it would be the same if notes had been given for the purchase money, and a bond for a deed had been given by the plaintiff, conditioned to convey upon the payment of the notes. Indeed, this contract of sale was a bond for a deed. The mere fact that it was called an agreement in writing to sell, does not change its nature. What else is a bond for a deed than simply an agreement in writing to sell? This agreement was accompanied by notes from the purchaser, just as any bond for a deed would have been, and it is a mere play upon words to call it anything else. Though it is not stated in express terms that Lovatt went into the possession of these lands, yet this is the natural inference from the agreed facts, *595 and the only infer*ence that can be drawn therefrom. These notes, then, are taxable. In the case of People v. Rhodes, 15 Ill. 304, it is expressly decided that if A. sells a tract of land to B. for a specified sum, and gives a bond for a deed, and receives but a portion of the purchase money in hand, and takes notes for the payment of the residue in annual installments, and B. goes into the possession of the land, and lists it for taxation, that the said notes of A. must be assessed, and A. must pay the tax thereon. The same principle is decided in People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432. Plaintiff argues that these notes, being given with the contract in writing, constituted a part thereof, and that the contract can have no greater force than if the notes had not been given. This we deny in toto. But let us assume, for argument's sake, that such is the legal construction of this contract, we would then have debts due, upon a contract in writing, for the sale of land; and we say such debts are personal property. People v. Ogdensburgh, 48 N. Y. 390.

But we think our legislature has expressly said that this $6,000 is personal property, and that, when speaking upon this very subject of taxation. Article 1, §§ 1, 2, of the tax law, (Gen. St. 1019.) No one can contend that this $6,000 is embraced in the definition of "real property," "real estate," and "land;" and the legislature, it would seem, contemplated, and did embrace, every other conceivable kind of property under the definition of "personal property," in the general sense of those words. And in the definition of personal property and credits (section 2 of tax law) this $6,000 is clearly included. We have, then, the authority of our own statutes for saying that this $6,000 is personal property. And being personal property, it is taxable in Butler county. Plaintiff resided there on March 1, 1872. The property of every person must be liable to bear an equal and just proportion of the public burdens, by way of taxation. This $6,000 is the indebtedness of Lovatt to plaintiff, and is the property of plaintiff. This debt being the personal, intangible property of the plaintiff, is taxable where he resides. It does not have, and cannot have,

*596 any other situs than the domi*cile of the owner. That the maxim of the common law, mobilia sequuntur personam, applies to property as well for the purposes of taxation as any other, is clearly established by the authorities, and it is a maxim formed upon general utility, and is one which settles this case in our favor. Story, Cond. Laws, §§ 379-381; Com. v. Hays, 8 B. Mon. 2; Johnson v. Com., 7 Dana, 340; Evansville v. Hall, 14 Ind. 27; Powell v. Madison, 21 Ind. 335; State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 320. The case of City of Davenport v. Mississippi & M. R. Co., 12 Iowa, 547, decides a question exactly analogous to this one, it being upon the question of taxing a mortgage; and the court in the syllabus say: "Mortgages before foreclosure are choses in action, and as such attach to the person of the holder, and are taxable at the place of his domicile. They are not taxable in this state when the owners are non-residents." And the same principle is expressly decided in People v. Eastman, 25 Cal. 603. Our legislature adopts this principle, and incorporates it into the statute law of the state, when it says, (section 8, c. 107, Gen. St.): "All personal property shall be listed and taxed each year in the township or city in which the person charged with the tax thereon resides on the first day of March." In Griffith v. Carter, 8 Kan. *565, this court say, on page 570: "The maxim of the common law was this: mobilia sequuntur personam. The domicile of the owner drew to it his personal estate wherever it might happen to be. In the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, this common-law rule would control, and personal property be taxable where the owner had his domicile. The statute has in plain language affirmed the common-law rule." It will not do to say that the statutory provision above quoted, and the decision of this court, referred to property situate in this state, for that would be begging the question; for we contend that the property that is in this $6,000 is the debt due to the plaintiff, and that that debt and property exists, and has its situs wherever plaintiff resides.

That the notes and written contract of sale do not constitute the property is evidenced by another reason. Suppose they should *597 be lost or destroyed by fire, or in any other *manner, if they constituted the property, then the rights of both plaintiff and Lovatt would cease, and the plaintiff's property would be gone, just the same as if he owned a threshing-machine, and it should burn up, or he had a sum in greenbacks, and they should be destroyed. In these events his property would be destroyed beyond recovery. That he would be placed in this position by the loss of the notes and contract of sale will not be contended. Hence we say that these notes and written contract of sale do not constitute the property, and it is immaterial where they are situate. They are merely the evidence by which plaintiff establishes, or can prove, his property, and, if they should be destroyed, he can prove his rights and his property, to-wit, his debt, by secondary evidence, and his property would exist just the same, and he could have just the same benefit from it, after the destruction of the notes and contract of sale as during their existence. This being intangible personal property of his, the plaintiff should have listed it in Plum Grove township, and it being assessed against him by the county clerk as by law provided, the plaintiff having failed and neglected to list it, he cannot avoid paying tax thereon.

But the counsel for plaintiff cites numerous authorities to show that this rule of mobilia sequuntur personam is not of universal application, and does not apply when the question of taxation is being considered. We think that not one of the cases cited by him is applicable to this case, and will briefly review those that we have been able to examine. In Duer v. Small, 17 How. Pr. 201, the case was of a banker living in New Jersey, but doing business with others as a banker in New York. It was held that his bank stock and stock in business in New York was to be taxed there, under a statutory provision of New York. We also have a statute requiring stockholders in banks and banking associations to be assessed on the value of their shares of stock in the city or township where such bank or banking association is situate, but this does not and cannot decide anything upon a question of the nature involved in this case.

*598 In Hoyt v. Commissioners of Taxes, 23 N.Y. 228, the relator lived in New York, and had capital employed in business in New Orleans,—was a merchant in the latter city. In McCormick v. Fitch, 14 Minn. 252, (Gil. 185,) the property in question was machinery shipped by plaintiffs from Chicago to Minnesota, to be sold, and was there sold. In City of St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co., 40 Mo. 580, the question was upon the taxation of a ferry-boat. In Wilkey v. City of Pekin, 19 Ill. 160, the subject-matter of taxation was a steam-boat. In Powell v. City of Madison, 21 Ind. 335, the subject-matter was pork; and in this last case the court say: "It may be true that for the purpose of taxation the situs of such property as debts, corporation stocks, and such intangibilities may be regarded as the domicile of the owner." In Rieman v. Shepard, 27 Ind. 288, the question of taxation arose in regard to hogs packed in Vigo county, which had money, labor, and skill there expended upon them, by which their value was enhanced, and their condition as a merchantable commodity changed. In St. Louis v. Ferry Co., 11 Wall. 423, the question was of taxing a ferry-boat plying across the Mississippi river, and the court expressly avoid deciding "whether the personal property of a resident of one state situate in another could be taxed in the former."

In all these cases the subject-matter of taxation was tangible personal property, and should we concede, for argument's sake, that this class of property has a situs separate and apart from the domicile of the owner, it by no means follows that debts and other intangible personal property do, for they are separate and distinct classes and kinds of property, having no similarity, and no resemblance; and while, under some circumstances, the reason for the adoption of the rule of mobilia sequuntur personam might cease as to the former class, the same reasons, nor any others, do not exist as to the latter class.

The former are capable of having a situs of themselves,—a place where they are situated,—where they may be seen and handled, which may be a different place from the residence of the owner.

Not so of debts and intangible personal property. They can-*599 not be seen or handled. If reduced to writing, the *writing constitutes but the evidence of the property, and not the property itself. The property in the intangibles is attendant upon or attached to the person of the owner; it constitutes a part of his resources, and a portion of the wealth of the state of which the creditor is a resident, just as much where the debtor resides in a different state as where he resides in the same.

Plaintiff's counsel also cites Story on the Conflict of Laws, § 550. There the author was considering property in regard to the power the nation within whose border it is situate has over it, in especial reference to proceedings by attachment, etc., against the property; and, in reference to that subject, his language we admit to be good law; but his language written in reference to one particular subject-matter cannot be indiscriminately applied to all subject-matters, and has no reference to the subject of taxation. In People v. Ogdensburg, 48 N. Y. 390, cited by plaintiff, the court say that the maximum of mobilia sequuntur personam does not, to the full extent, apply for the purposes of taxation. This leaves us to draw the inference that it does apply to some extent; and if to any extent, certainly it will apply in such a case as ours. Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152, and People v. Gardner, 51 Barb. 352, are seemingly against us; but in each of these cases the money was loaned for profit, and not, when due, paid to the owner, but reinvested, and both principal and interest continually kept reinvested by the agents, while such is not the case before the court. Then, again, the statute in Vermont was different from ours.

Plaintiff contends, further, that these notes, if taxable at all, are taxable in the state of Illinois, and cites several sections of the Illinois statutes. In the first place, the notes were not moneys; and, in the second place, they were not loaned, invested, nor controlled by Gill & Co., who were simply the depositary of them, and all they had to do was to receive the money, and transmit it to plaintiff, and hand over the deed to Lovatt; the money, when paid, could not by them be either loaned, invested, or otherwise controlled; and, even if *600 *it could have been, the notes could not, and it is the notes, and the property there is in them, and the contract of sale, that we have to deal with. In this case there is no money in the custody of Gill & Co., but simply some evidences of indebtedness. But it is immaterial what the laws of Illinois are, for property may sometimes be subject to taxation in two different states. McCormick v. Fitch, 14 Minn. 252, (Gil. 185;) Clapp v. City of Burlington, 1 Amer. Rep. 357; Duer v. Small, 17 How. Pr. 204; Newcome v. Dunham, 27 Ind. 286. But whether this $6,000 is taxable in Illinois or not, if it is taxable by the laws of our state the tax should be sustained, for it is a local question. Our right to tax is of necessity against the plaintiff as a person, and is not, and cannot be, against the property, as it would be in case of real estate; and the property being intangible, even if a tax should be levied against plaintiff for this property in Illinois, the courts there would have no power to enforce the collection of the tax. The property is not of that class that could be seized for the tax. But to avail him anything, the plaintiff would have to show, not only that the property was taxable in that state, but also that he, or his agent, was actually taxed there for this property, and that the tax had been paid; and as he makes no showing whatever upon either point, he must fail in this view of the case. Plaintiff is enjoying the benefit of our laws, and is protected by them; and these same laws by which he comes into this court, and asks relief, say he shall bear his proportion of the burdens which the existence of these laws imposes upon the whole people, by paying taxes upon his property. This he has not done, and it is this he is seeking to avoid. He might have some equity in his claim (but not any law) if he showed to this court that he paid taxes on this property in Illinois, or that he paid taxes on the land by him sold and contracted to be sold to Lovatt, but this he fails to show; and even this would not entitle him to the affirmative relief he seeks, but it would be a circumstance that might appeal to the equitable sense of the court.

*601 *VALENTINE, J. The only question involved in this case is whether the plaintiff, Wilcox, is liable to pay taxes on certain supposed personal property which he is supposed to own and possess in this state. The facts of the case are substantially as follows: "In the year 1868 the plaintiff agreed in writing to sell certain real estate he then possessed in the state of Illinois, to one Daniel Lovatt, for a price agreed upon between them, and Lovatt gave his notes for the amount; it being agreed that the notes were to be left at the bank of Charles F. Gill & Co., in the town of La Harpe, Hancock county, Illinois, and as fast as said Lovatt should make payment on said notes, from time to time, the plaintiff should convey to him a proportionate amount of said real estate. The plaintiff made no deed to Lovatt for said real estate at the time of the sale, nor did Lovatt give any mortgage to secure the payment of the notes, or execute any other instrument of writing than the notes and said agreement to sell, which he also signed. Before the plaintiff could be required to convey any part of the real estate to Lovatt, he (Lovatt) must have paid an amount equal to the value of eighty acres; and whenever an amount was paid equal in amount to the value of another eighty acres, then a conveyance was to be executed by plaintiff to Lovatt for such eighty acres; and so on, till all the land should be paid for. The payments were to be made one year apart; and should Lovatt fail in any payment he was to forfeit any payment made after the last preceding conveyance. Six thousand dollars remained unpaid on the first of March, 1872, and is the same $6,000 placed on the tax-roll by the clerk of Butler county in said year as the personal property assessment of said Wilcox. The land was to remain the property of plaintiff till the payments were made as before stated. The notes never had been in the state of Kansas, and never out of the state of Illinois, *602 nor in any other place than the bank before stated. The contract or *agreement to sell the lands between plaintiff and said Lovatt was in writing, executed by both parties, and contained substantially the conditions above set forth." The tax complained of was levied for the year 1872 on said $6,000. The plaintiff was, on the first day of March of that year, and has since been, a resident of said Butler county. "The land still unconveyed on March 1, 1872, was of the value of $6,000."

Now, we suppose that it will be admitted that it is not the intention of the laws of Kansas to attempt to collect taxes for general revenue except upon property, and except upon property within the jurisdiction of the state of Kansas. Hence, if the contingent debt coming from Lovatt to the plaintiff is not property in and of itself, and aside from the real estate for which it was incurred, or if it is not property within the jurisdiction of the state of Kansas, then it cannot be taxed in Kansas. Then, what is there in Kansas to be taxed? Certainly no tangible property, and not even any intangible property that needs any protection from our laws. Everything is and has been in Illinois. The consideration for the notes, the notes themselves, the place of payment, the persons to whom the notes are to be paid, and presumptively the payors, and the funds which must be used in paying the notes, all are in Illinois, and have never been in Kansas. Nothing pertaining to the notes, or to the debt which they evidence, has ever been in Kansas, except that the owner of the notes resides in Kansas. Every act which brought the notes or the debt into existence was performed in Illinois, and every act that may be performed in the future for their collection, payment, or extinguishment must be performed there. The claim that said debt is taxable in this state is founded entirely upon the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam. Under this maxim it is claimed that movable property follows the residence or domicile of the owner, (not his person,) and therefore that personal property may be taxed at the residence of the owner, wherever he may be, and wherever the property may in fact be. This maxim would seem, from its terms, to apply to all

*603 movable property, *tangible as well as intangible, and it is generally so applied, wherever it is applied at all. But the defendant desires to make a distinction. While he seems to admit that by the weight of judicial determination the maxim does not fully apply for the purposes of taxation to tangible movable property, yet he nevertheless claims that it does apply, with all its force, to intangible personal property. We think, however, he is mistaken. The weight of judicial authority seems to be that, for the purposes of taxation, the maxim does not fully apply, even where the property is intangible, People v. Gardner, 51 Barb. 352; Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152; People v. Trustees, etc., 48 N. Y. 397; and other authorities cited in plaintiff's brief. This maxim is, at most, only a legal fiction; and Blackstone, speaking of legal fictions, says: "This maxim is invariably observed, that no fiction shall extend to work an injury, its proper operation being to prevent a mischief, or remedy an inconvenience, that might result from the general rule of law." 3 Bl. Comm. 43.

Now, as the state of Illinois, and not Kansas, must furnish the plaintiff with all the remedies that he may have for the enforcement of all his rights connected with said notes, debt, etc., it would seem more just, if said debt is to be taxed at all, that the state of Illinois and not Kansas should tax it, and that we should not resort to legal fictions to give the state of Kansas the right to tax it. Where land is sold and conveyed, and notes given for the purchase money, we suppose the vendee may be taxed for the land, and the vendor for the notes received for the purchase money. But where the vendor still owns the land, and also owns it conditionally, as in this case, whether he can be taxed on both the land and the notes may be questionable. But that he should be taxed on both in Illinois and on the notes in this state, would be highly unjust. In the case of People v. Trustees, etc., 48 N. Y. 397, the following language is used by EARL, C. J., and concurred in by the full bench: "I am unable to see why the *604 money due upon the land contracts must not be assessed in the same way. The debts due upon these con*tracts are personal estate, the same as if they were due upon notes or bonds; and such personal estate may be said to exist where the obligations for payment are held. Notes, bonds, and other contracts for the payment of money, have always been regarded and treated in the law as personal property. They represent the debts secured by them. They are the subject of larceny, and a transfer of them transfers the debt. If this kind of property does not exist at the place where the obligation is held, where does it exist? It certainly does not exist where the debtor may be, and follow his person. And while, for some purposes in the law, by legal fiction, it follows the person of the creditor, and exists where he may be, yet it has been settled that, for the purposes of taxation, this legal fiction does not, to the full extent, apply, and that such property belonging to a non-resident creditor may be taxed in the place where the obligations are held by his agent." This decision would make the notes given in this case taxable at the banking house of said Charles F. Gill & Co. This decision does not affect the taxability of notes where both the owners of the notes and the notes are in the same state, although in different counties; nor would it give the power to an owner of notes to fraudulently send them out of the state for the purpose of avoiding taxation on them where they rightfully belong. This case has been very ably presented to this court by counsel on both sides, and, for a full discussion of the questions involved, we would refer to their briefs.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and cause remanded, with the order that judgment be rendered for the plaintiff, on the agreed statement of facts, perpetually enjoining the said county treasurer from collecting said tax.

*WILLIAMS and another v. JACOB LOUIS.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

Intoxicating Liquors: License: Wholesale Liquor Dealer: Sales on Credit: Effect of License. Where a wholesale liquor dealer obtains a license signed by the mayor, clerk, and treasurer of a city of the second class, authorizing him to sell intoxicating liquors at wholesale in said city, and he afterwards, in pursuance thereof, sells intoxicating liquors at wholesale, held, in an action brought by the vendor of such liquors against the vendee for the price of the liquors, (1) that the license, if granted by the city council of said city specially to the wholesale dealer, is valid; (2) that, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it will be presumed that the license was regularly granted and issued; (3) that it is not necessary that the license should be issued to some person who is actually a grocer, a dram-shop keeper, or a tavern keeper, in order to be valid; (4) that the license need not, upon its face, and in direct terms, purport to be a grocery license, a dram-shop license, or a tavern license; but if it clearly appears upon its face that it is a license to sell intoxicating liquors, it is sufficient; (5) that being issued as a license to sell intoxicating liquors at wholesale, and not at retail, does not invalidate the license as a license to sell at wholesale.

Error from Anderson district court.

Action by Louis to recover the balance due on account of $158 for brandy, wine, whisky, and gin sold to Williams & Pattee, on which defendants had paid $55. Defendants made a general denial, and sought to recover back the $55 paid by them. The liquors were sold at the city of Ottawa, in Franklin county, where Louis was doing business. The action was commenced before a justice of the peace in Anderson county, and removed to the district court by appeal, where the action was tried at the September term, 1873. Judgment for plaintiff for amount claimed.

*606 *VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought by Jacob Louis against Williams & Pattee, on an account for liquors and other articles sold by him to them. The defense to the action is that Louis sold said liquors in violation of law, having no legal license therefor, and therefore that he cannot recover. Section 3 of the act concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors, commonly called the "Dram-shop Act," makes it unlawful for any person to sell any intoxicating liquor, "without taking out and having a license as grocer, dram-shop keeper, or tavern keeper." Gen. St. 400, § 3. Sections 1 and 2 of the same act provide that the license shall be granted by the city council of any incorporated town or city where the establishment for the sale of such liquors is located in such town or city, and by the county commissioners where such establishment is located elsewhere. Section 47 of the second-class city act of 1872 provides, among other things, that "the city council shall have exclusive authority to levy and collect a license tax on * * * grocers, * * * dram-shops, saloons, liquor sellers," etc. Laws 1872, p. 206, § 47. And it is not necessary that a person who desires to sell intoxicating liquors in an incorporated town or city should have a license therefor from the county board, but it is sufficient if he has a license from the council of such town or city. State v. Pittman, 10 Kan. *593; City of Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. *633. The liquor in the present case was sold in the city of Ottawa, a city of the second class. An ordinance of said city authorized the city council thereof to grant licenses "to sell intoxicating liquors in quantities of not less than one gallon, or in packages, as bought and sold in wholesale markets," and Louis, at the time he sold said liquors, had a license, signed by the mayor, the clerk, and the treasurer of said city, authorizing him "to sell intoxicating liquors at wholesale in quantities of not less than one gallon, or in packages, as bought and sold in wholesale markets." The plaintiff

*607 below introduced all the evidence that was *introduced. The defendants below did not even attempt to introduce any evidence. It does not appear from the record that Mr. Louis ever sold any liquor in violation of his license, or outside thereof. It does not appear that he ever sold less than one gallon of liquor at a time, or that he ever broke an original package, as he purchased such package at wholesale in the market. The only question, then, is whether his license is valid or not. We think that prima facie it is valid. Its validity, however, depends, as we think, upon whether it was granted by the city council specially to him. But as the ordinance authorized the city council to grant licenses, and authorized no one else to do so, and as this license was signed by three of the principal officers of the city, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that all the officers did their duty, and therefore that the license was granted by the city council, and that it was granted by them in special and express terms to Louis. After it was shown that Louis had a license to sell liquor, signed by the principal officers of the city of Ottawa, if the defendants then claimed that there was any irregularity in the granting or the issue of said license, we think it then devolved upon the defendants to show it.

But it is claimed that Louis was not a grocer, dram-shop keeper, or tavern keeper, and that his license was not issued to him as such, and for that reason that the license is void. Now, it is not shown that Louis was not a grocer, dram-shop keeper, or tavern keeper. It is shown that he was a wholesale liquor dealer, but it is not shown that he was not also a grocer, dram-shop keeper, or tavern keeper. But even if it were shown that he was not a grocer, dram-shop keeper, or tavern keeper, still we do not think that it would make any difference. The law does not require that a person, in order to obtain a grocery license, dram-shop license, or tavern license, should actually be a grocer, dram-shop keeper, or tavern keeper. Any person may obtain such a license, and sell intoxicating liquor under it, whatever his occupation or business may be. We shall, therefore, decide this case upon the presumption that Louis followed no occupation or business except that of wholesale liquor dealer.

The next question is whether the license itself should, upon its face, purport to be a grocery license, a dram-shop license, or a tavern license. We do not think that it is necessary that it should, in direct terms. If it should be in substance and in fact just what a grocery license, a dram-shop license, or a tavern license must necessarily be under the statutes, then we think it would be entirely sufficient as a license. Now, a grocery license, a dram-shop license, or a tavern license, under the statutes, cannot be anything more or less than a license to sell intoxicating liquors. Therefore, a license which in express terms authorizes the sale of intoxicating liquors will be deemed sufficient. The license in this case merely authorized the plaintiff to sell intoxicating liquors at wholesale. It might, under the statutes, have authorized him to sell both at wholesale and retail. But the fact that it did not authorize plaintiff to sell intoxicating liquors at retail, will not, as we think, invalidate the license as a license to sell intoxicating liquors at wholesale. The city council in granting the license were not bound to exercise their whole power in the premises in order to exercise any portion of such power.

But even if this license were technically void, it does not necessarily follow that the plaintiff cannot recover. A party in such a case is debarred from recovering only where he willfully violates the law. Here was no willful violation of any law. The plaintiff innocently believed that he had a good license, and one that would protect him in the sale of liquors at wholesale. If he was mistaken, however, the mistake was probably such a mistake of fact as would excuse him. But the defendants are hardly in such a condition as to demand the most rigid scrutiny into the technical defects of the plaintiff's license. They have no special claims that appeal strongly to men's sympathies. Their virtuous indignation at the wickedness of selling intoxicating liquors at wholesale, under a license technically defective, and their pit*eous wail for the vindication of violated law, may possibly not be prompted wholly by disinterested motives. If Louis had really violated the law by selling intoxicating liquors without a license, the courts would lend him no aid in recovering for the price of such liquors. But even then the defendants would have no high moral right to refuse to pay for what they had purchased, and used, and promised to pay for. There is no high moral principle, that we are aware of, requiring a retail liquor dealer to repudiate obligations assumed by him for liquors purchased by him from the wholesale dealer. The wholesale dealer does not, in any case, sell the liquors to be used as a beverage, except possibly indirectly, through the retail dealer himself. The case of Dolson v. Hope, 7 Kan. *161, is good law, but it does not apply to this case. The judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

W. W. ROLLER and others v. C. M. OTT and another.

January Term, 1875.

1. Contract: Consideration: Presumption. Where a plaintiff founds his cause of action upon a contract embodied in a written instrument, and neither the petition nor the written instrument shows affirmatively that there was no consideration for the contract, it will be presumed prima facie that there was a sufficient consideration; but held, in this particular case, that the petition and written instrument, without the aid of presumptions, both sufficiently show a sufficient consideration for the contract.
2. ———: In Restraint of Trade: Public Policy. A contract entered into upon sufficient consideration between O. and R., that O. shall not sell furniture in Ottawa to any person except R., is valid.
3. ———. Such contracts, however, are, to some extent, against public policy, and hence their provisions should not be extended by construction or implication so as to favor persons desiring to enforce them beyond what their terms would most clearly require.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Where both parties to a contract, void as against public policy, are equally at fault, the law will leave them where it finds them. If the contract be still executory, it will not enforce it, or award damages for its breach; if already executed, it will not restore the price paid, or the property delivered. Setter v. Alvey, 15 Kan. *157; Tucker v. Allen, 16 Kan. 324. Option contracts, see note to Cobb v. Freil, 5 McCrary, 80.

Roller & Co., partners, commenced their action against C. M. Ott and A. Gottschalk, to recover damages for past breaches of a contract, and to enjoin defendants from further violations of said contract. Plaintiffs' petition was as follows:

"[Title.] The plaintiffs state that in March, 1872, the Ottawa Furniture & Wood-work Company was duly organized as a corporation under the statutes of the state of Kansas, for the purpose of manufacturing furniture and other wood-work, and of vending furniture at retail and wholesale, in the city of Ottawa; that said corporation, at said city, erected a large and costly factory, fitted with valuable and powerful steam machinery, adapted to the purpose of manufacturing furniture, and other wood-work, rapidly, and in large quantities, and at the same time said corporation put said factory into operation, and established and carried on in connection therewith a large wholesale and retail furniture store in said city, and said corporation continued to operate said factory, and carry on said wholesale and retail business, until about the thirty-first of January, 1873, when the defendants, Ott & Gottschalk, purchased all the stock and property of said corporation, and took possession thereof; and afterwards, on the fifth of February, 1873, the plaintiffs herein and said defendants entered into an agreement to carry on said factory and wholesale furniture store and trade as copartners, (of which agreement a copy is annexed, marked 'Exhibit A,') upon the terms therein set forth; that about April 1, 1873, said parties, finding it impossible to get on harmoniously in the conduct and management of said business and factory, agreed to and did dissolve said copartnership upon the terms and conditions contained in a written memorandum thereof, of which a copy is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit B,' and among which was and is a covenant of the following tenor, viz.: 'In consideration of deduction of $589.67 made by W. W. Roller & Co., as above, said C. M. Ott and A. Gottschalk, on their part, bind themselves not to sell any furniture in Ottawa to any other parties other than said W. W. Roller & Co., and at the lowest market prices.' At the time said agreement of dissolution was entered into, both the defendants well knew that these plaintiffs had long been and then were continuously engaged in the wholesale and retail furniture

*611 *business in the city of Ottawa aforesaid, and that they intended thereafter to continue in said business, as since hitherto they have actually done, and that said business could not be profitably carried on in Ottawa if subjected and exposed to the competition of the said factory; and as after said dissolution the defendants intended to operate, and actually since then hitherto have operated, said factory as partners, producing therein large quantities of furniture, the covenant hereinbefore set forth was entered into by and between these plaintiffs and the defendants to prevent said wholesale and retail business of the plaintiffs from being injured and destroyed by the competition of the said factory, and of the sale of the furniture therein to be produced, either at wholesale or retail, by the defendants, in the city of Ottawa, to any parties other than these plaintiffs, and said covenant was one of the principal inducements which led these plaintiffs to enter into said agreement of dissolution; and these plaintiffs have done and duly performed all the conditions thereof on their part to be performed. Yet the defendants, in violation thereof, and in breach of the covenant therein and above set forth, have, within the six months last past, without plaintiffs' consent, repeatedly sold, both at wholesale and retail, many articles, and large quantities of furniture, in the city of Ottawa above named, to divers parties other than these plaintiffs, and at the lowest market prices, to the damage and loss of profits to these plaintiffs in the sum of $500; and said defendants are still continuing to sell, in Ottawa aforesaid, and deliver to parties in said city other than these plaintiffs, many articles of furniture at retail, and large quantities thereof at wholesale, in violation of said covenant and agreement; and all this without the consent of plaintiffs. And said defendants have recently notified the plaintiffs that they (the defendants) do not intend to regard or in anywise perform any part of the said covenant above set forth any longer or further.

"Wherefore the plaintiffs pray that a temporary injunction may issue restraining the defendants, and each of them, from directly or indirectly selling any furniture in Ottawa, Franklin county, Kansas, to any parties other than these plaintiffs, during the pendency of this suit, and that upon the final hearing hereof said injunction may be made perpetual; and that this court may take and state an account of the damages and loss of profits sustained by these plaintiffs by reason of defendants' violation of the covenant hereinbefore set forth; and that the plaintiffs may have judgment for such damages *612 and loss of *profits when ascertained; and that plaintiffs have such other and further relief in the premises as may be just."

The defendants demurred. The district court, at the March term, 1874, sustained said demurrer, and dismissed plaintiffs' petition.

John W. Deford, for plaintiffs.

The petition states a good cause of action. Guerand v. Dandele, 32 Md. 561; Guerand v. Dandele, 3 Amer. Rep. 164; Oregon S. N. Co. v. Winsor, 10 Alb. Law J. 41; Selby v. Platts, 3 Chand. 183; Beard v. Dennis, 6 Ind. 200. The court below assigned as its reason for allowing the demurrer that the petition discloses no consideration for the covenant sued on. But it alleges at least two considerations, either of which is sufficient, viz.: (1) That "said covenant was one of the principal inducements which led the plaintiffs to enter into said agreement of dissolution," and "was entered into by and between the plaintiffs and defendants to prevent said wholesale and retail business of plaintiffs from being injured and destroyed by the competition of the said factor." And the covenant itself says, "in considera- tion of deduction of $589.62," made by Roller & Co. But the court below suggested, as to the "deduction of $589.62," that he could "make nothing out of it," on referring to Exhibit B, annexed to the petition. • To this we answer: (1) Exhibit B is no part of the petition, and therefore, in passing on its sufficiency, is not to be regarded, (Memphis Med. College v. Newton, 2 Handy, 163;) and (2) the consideration fixed by the parties is sufficient, as in other contracts, in the absence of fraud, (Duffy v. Shockey, 11 Ind. 70.) The fact that the court could not understand the "figuring" of the parties, as it appears in Exhibit B, was no proof of a nudum pactum. Indeed, if the contract was silent as to the consideration, it would still, being in writing, import one. Waynick v. Richmond, 11 Kan. *488. A fortiori, then, where it does recite one, it ought to be taken as adequate until the contrary clearly appears, even though the court cannot see how the parties "figured it out." Besides, under the averments of this petition, a valuable and good consideration in *613 *addition to that expressed in the covenant might be proved by parol. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 285, 304.

C. B. Mason, for defendants.

It is not enough that there be simply a consideration for a contract which may be in restraint of trade, but, in addition to the pecuniary consideration, it must appear that there was some good reason for entering into the contract, and that it imposes no restraint upon one party which is not beneficial to the other. Chappel v. Brockway, 21 Wend. 157; Mills v. Mills, 40 N. Y. 545. The covenant in this case, being indefinite in time, imposes a restraint upon one party which is not beneficial to the other, but is against the principles of sound public policy, and void.

Admitting that limited restraint in trade in a certain locality, and for a certain period, are valid contracts, yet such a contract is not valid except when founded on a good and sufficient consideration. 2 Pars. Cont. 747-753, and notes a, b, c; Holbrook v. Waters, 9 How. Pr. 335. The covenant on the part of defendants is without any consideration, as appears upon the face of the petition. We hold that the exhibits attached to the petition, and especially Exhibit B, is to be held and taken as part of the pleading, by the very terms of the allegation of the covenant in this petition.

The consideration received by defendants (if any is, in this case) is a deduction claimed to have been made to defendants by plaintiffs. The partnership between plaintiffs and defendants was dissolved upon the terms and conditions of Exhibit B, which contains the covenant, "In consideration of deduction of $589.62, made by W. W. Roller & Co., as above," etc. This necessarily involves an examination of that portion of the agreement "B" which precedes this covenant. An analysis of Exhibit B shows that plaintiffs sold to defendants stock and other assets to amount of $4,120.79; that defendants sold plaintiffs merchandise to amount of $3,134.97; leaving due plaintiffs, $985.82.

By the next recital it appears this sum of $985.82 was adjusted, being deducted from a claim of defendants against plaintiffs amount-*614 ing to the sum *of $1,802.07, leaving still unsettled and due defendants, $816.25. Now, by the terms of Exhibit B, there remained no indebtedness from defendants to plaintiffs, but there exists an unadjusted amount of $816.25 claimed by the defendants to be due them from the plaintiffs. But however awkward or ambiguous the contract may appear, the demurrer was properly sustained; and if any action can be sustained, it should be to reform the agreement.

VALENTINE, J. The questions involved in this case were raised in the court below by petition and demurrer. The grounds of the demurrer were (1) a defect of parties defendant; (2) several causes of action improperly joined; (3) the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court below sustained the demurrer, and the plaintiffs now bring the case to this court. The defendants do not now claim that the demurrer should have been sustained upon either the first or the second ground of the demurrer, but claim that it was and should have been sustained upon the third ground thereof. Hence the only question for us to consider is whether the petition stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The whole cause of action is founded upon the alleged breach by the defendants of a certain agreement in writing, alleged to have been made and entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants. The substance of this contract is set forth in the petition, and a copy thereof is attached to the petition, and referred to in the petition as Exhibit B, although it is not in terms made a part of the petition. It is claimed by the defendants that this contract is void—First, for want of consideration; and, second, because it is in restraint of trade, and therefore against public policy. These are the only questions in the case. Now, whatever may be the real facts in the case, we must take the facts as stated in the petition as true; and, taking such facts to be true, there would not only seem to be a sufficient *615 consideration for the contract, but the contract *would seem in all other respects to be valid. Whether we examine the petition with or without Exhibit B, it so obviously states a sufficient consideration for the contract that we do not think it is necessary to discuss the same. The closing up of the copartnership existing between the plaintiffs and defendants, the final settlement thereof, and dissolution of the same, was a sufficient consideration for the contract. The release by the plaintiffs of $589.62 in their partnership settlement was a sufficient consideration. But the contract is shown to have been in writing, and therefore, unless the contract or the petition affirmatively shows that there was no consideration, the contract itself will import a consideration. Fuller v. Scott, 8 Kan. *25; Waynick v. Richmond, 11 Kan. *488; and statutes cited in these two cases. Mere silence on the part of the petition or contract will not show that there was no consideration; but, on the contrary, where the petition does not affirmatively show that there was no consideration, it will be presumed prima facie that there was a sufficient consideration.

We do not think that the contract is void because in the restraint of trade. It merely binds the individuals C. M. Ott and A. Gottschalk not to sell any furniture in Ottawa to any person except W. W. Roller & Co. The provision of the contract relating to this matter reads as follows: "In consideration of deduction of $589.62 made by W. W. Roller & Co., as above, said C. M. Ott and A. Gottschalk, on their part, bind themselves not to sell any furniture in Ottawa to any other parties other than said W. W. Roller & Co., and at the lowest market prices." This contract does not prevent the Ottawa Furniture & Wood-work Company from selling to others than Roller & Co. in Ottawa; and it does not prevent Ott & Gottschalk from selling furniture to others than Roller & Co. just outside of the city limits of Ottawa. It was probably designed to prevent Ott & Gottschalk from establishing a furniture store in the city of Ottawa. To this extent, and to the extent of binding them not to sell furniture *616 in Ottawa to any one except W. W. Roller & Co., we think the contract is valid.

The last clause of said contract, reading, "and at the lowest market prices," is probably void for uncertainty. The defendants are not bound to sell furniture to Roller & Co. anywhere, or at any price, and they are certainly not prohibited from selling furniture to any one, or at any price, outside of the city limits of Ottawa. Other portions of said contract not quoted in this opinion are about as defective as said clause. All contracts of this kind are to some extent against public policy, and hence their provisions should not be extended by construction or implication so as to favor parties desiring to enforce them beyond what their terms would most clearly require. They are not anywhere to be looked upon with favor; and where a party desires to enforce one of them, he must simply take what he has in the clearest terms got. That such contracts are valid, we would refer to the following authorities: Dean v. Emerson, 102 Mass. 480; McClurg's Appeal, 58 Pa. St. 51; Dunlop v. Gregory, 10 N. Y. 241; Beard v. Dennis, 6 Ind. 200; Thomas v. Miles, 3 Ohio St. 274.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

BRIDGET O'BRIEN and others v. JOHN M. WETHERELL.<sup>1</sup>

January Term, 1875.

1. Ejectment: Grantor against Grantee: Breach of Condition: When Defendant may not Deny that His Grantor had Title. Where the defendants hold their entire title and possession to a certain piece of land from and under the plaintiff, and hold the same upon the express condition that no intoxicating liquors shall ever be sold upon the premises, and are to forfeit the premises back to the plaintiff whenever such condition shall be broken, the defendants are estopped, when sued by the *617 plaintiff for the recovery of the *premises on the ground of a breach of such condition, from denying that the title conveyed to them or to their grantors by the plaintiff was, when so conveyed, a good title.
2. Conveyances: Condition Subsequent: When it Runs with the Land: Forfeiture. Where a deed conveys land in fee but upon the express condition that neither the grantee, nor his heirs or assigns, shall ever sell or permit to be sold any intoxicating liquors upon the premises conveyed, and that the land shall be forfeited back to the grantor whenever such condition shall be broken, held, that the estate conveyed is an estate upon condition subsequent; that the condition is valid, and, until broken, runs with the land, and is binding, not only upon the grantee himself, but also upon his assigns; and that the land may be recovered back by the grantor from the grantee, or from any assignee of his who may commit a breach of said condition.

Ejectment, brought by Wetherell, as plaintiff, against Bridget O'Brien, and Michael, her husband, and one O'Neil, as defendants, to recover the possession of "lot 24, and a four-foot strip off lot No. 23, making 29 feet front, in block 14, in Wetherell's addition to the town of Osage City." Wetherell had formerly owned said property, and had sold and conveyed the same by deed to one Reber, upon certain terms and conditions in said deed expressed and set forth. Reber sold and conveyed the land to a party who conveyed it to O'Neil, and O'Neil conveyed it to Bridget O'Brien. Plaintiff founded his action upon a breach of the condition expressed in his deed to Reber, claiming that such breach worked a forfeiture of the title and estate conditionally conveyed. The defendants, under a general denial, claimed—First, that Wetherell never had any title; and, second, that the condition did not run with the land, and that they held the absolute title in fee-simple. Second trial at the January term, 1874. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff.

*618 *VALENTINE, J. This was an action of ejectment, brought by Wetherell against Bridget O'Brien, Michael O'Brien, and Michael O'Neil, to eject the defendants from a certain lot or parcel of land in Wetherell's addition to the town of Osage City. The theory upon which the plaintiff expects to recover is, as we would infer from the record and briefs of counsel, as follows: The plaintiff at one time owned the property in dispute. He transferred the property by deed to one Theodore L. Reber, upon the expressed condition that no intoxicating liquors should ever be sold on the premises, and that if Reber, his heirs or assigns, should ever violate this condition, the property should be forfeited back to the plaintiff. The defendants hold their entire title and possession (there being two intermediate conveyances, however) solely under Reber. The defendants kept a liquor saloon on said premises, and sold intoxicating liquors thereon. The defendants expect to defeat the plaintiff's action upon the following grounds, to-wit: First, Wetherell never owned the property in dispute; second, the language used in the deed from Wetherell to Reber, which the plaintiff supposes created an estate merely upon condition, did in fact create an estate absolute, with merely a personal covenant on the part of Reber, not running with the land, that no intoxicating liquors should be sold on the premises; and therefore, as it is not claimed that Reber himself ever violated said covenant, no action of any kind has ever accrued against either Reber, or these defendants; or any one else; fourth, these defendants do not derive their title or possession from Reber.

The findings of the jury were general, and both the findings of the jury and the judgment of the district court were in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendants; and hence we must assume that upon the evidence introduced all the material facts in the case were rightfully found against the defendants, and in favor of the plaintiff, unless there was substantially an entire lack of evidence on some material fact necessary to be proved by the plaintiff in order to enable him to recover. This proposition follows as a necessary result from the numerous decisions upon similar questions promulgated by this court.

The record in this case apparently shows that the title to the property in controversy originally passed from the United States to John McManus; from John McManus to Seyfert, McManus & Co.; from Seyfert, McManus & Co. to John M. Wetherell; from Wetherell to Theodore L. Reber; from Reber to John Brinkley; from Brinkley to Michael O'Neil; and from O'Neil to Bridget O'Brien; and that Bridget O'Brien and Michael O'Brien are husband and wife, now in possession of the property, claiming it as their own, and selling intoxicating liquors thereon. The defendants expect to defeat the action of the plaintiff on the ground that the deed from Seyfert, McManus & Co. to Wetherell shows upon its face that Seyfert, McManus & Co. had no power to buy, sell, or hold real estate in Kansas. That portion of the deed which the defendants rely on as showing said fact reads as follows: "This deed, made the fifteenth day of January, 1869, between the corporation of Seyfert, McManus & Co., of the city of Reading, county of Berks, and state of Pennsylvania, of the first part, and John M. Wetherell, of the city of Philadelphia and state of Pennsylvania, of the second part, witnesseth: Whereas, by an act of the general assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved the seventh of April, 1862, the parties doing business at the Reading Iron-works, in the county of Berks aforesaid, were created a body corporate under the name, style, and title of Seyfert, McManus & Co.; and whereas, by a supplement to said act, approved the twenty-eighth of February, 1865, it is provided that, in addition to the powers now possessed by Seyfert, McManus & Co., the said corporation shall be capable of purchasing, holding, leasing, and improving lands in any of the states or territories of the United States other than Pennsylvania, and to obtain therefrom any and all minerals, and other valuable substances, whether by working or mining, leasing or disposing of privileges to work or mine such lands, or any part thereof, and to erect houses or other buildings, machinery, or works thereon, *620 *and to use, lease, or work the same, and to dispose of all such lands, mines, works, and the products thereof, by lease, mortgage, or sale, in such manner as they may deem proper; and whereas, the said corporation of Seyfert, McManus & Co. are the owners in fee-simple of certain lands in the state of Kansas, under letters patent granted by the United States of America, to-wit," etc.

This deed was executed on the part of Seyfert, McManus & Co. by John McManus, president of the company, and John Schroeder, secretary. Now, if this John McManus is the same John McManus who purchased the property from the government, we suppose the title to the property passed from John McManus to John M. Wetherell, whether it passed immediately through Seyfert, McManus & Co., or directly from John McManus by virtue of the deed he executed for Seyfert, McManus & Co. to Wetherell. But said deed really shows that Seyfert, McManus & Co. were a corporation actually "doing business at the Reading Iron-works, in the county of Berks," in the state of Pennsylvania, and tends more strongly to show that such corporation had power to buy, hold, and, if necessary, sell real estate in Kansas, than otherwise. That a corporation may be created in one state with power to buy, hold, and sell real estate in another state, we suppose will not be questioned. Hunt v. Kansas & M. B. Co., 11 Kan. *484, *485; State v. Boston, etc., Co., 25 Vt. 433, 443; Whitman Min. Co. v. Baker, 3 Nev. 386; Lumbard v. Aldrich, 8 N. H. 31; Silver Lake Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. 370; Ang. & A. Corp. §§ 161, 162. But it may be claimed that this particular corporation had no such power. Such power was certainly attempted to be given to said corporation in express terms. Then why did it not possess such power? Simply, as is claimed, because it could not exercise such power in Pennsylvania, the state where it was created. But it is not shown definitely what powers it could exercise in Pennsylvania. It is true, the amendment to its charter did not give it authority to exercise any such power in Pennsylvania, but its original charter may have done so. But even if its original charter did not give *621 *it authority to exercise any such power in Pennsylvania, still that would not necessarily prevent it from exercising such power in another state, it being expressly authorized so to do. A corporation is not always and necessarily confined to the exercise of only such powers in other states which it could properly exercise in its own state. Land-grant Ry. Co. v. County of Coffey, 6 Kan. 254, and authorities above cited. The Land-grant Railway & Trust Company, mentioned in 6 Kan. *245 et seq., was no corporation. It had no home, no domicile, no place of doing business, no office, no legal existence anywhere; and hence, whatever may be anywhere said of that supposed corporation may not have any application whatever to the corporation of Seyfert, McManus & Co.

But suppose said corporation transcended its powers when it purchased, held, and sold real estate in Kansas, has any person or authority, except the state, any right to complain, or even to question the validity of the transaction? Goundie v. Northampton Water Co., 7 Pa. St. 233. But, above all others, have the defendants any right to complain or to question the validity of said transaction? They hold their entire title to the property, and the possession thereof, from and under the plaintiff. They have not the least shadow of title, except such as they have derived from the plaintiff. This is evidently true from the evidence in the case, whether Reber ever conveyed his title to the property by deed to Brinkley or not. The deeds from Brinkley to O'Neil, and from O'Neil to Mrs. O'Brien, show it, (see 3 Washb. Real Prop. c. 2, § 6, pars. 24, 26, and cases there cited;) and other evidence tends to show it; and there is not a particle of evidence that tends to show the contrary. And therefore, assuming that the deed from the plaintiff to Reber is in terms just such a deed as the plaintiff claims that it is, we think that the defendants are estopped from denying the plaintiff's title. That is, where the defendants hold their entire title and possession to certain land from and under the *622 plaintiff, and hold the same under the express con*dition that no intoxicating liquors shall ever be sold upon the premises, and are to forfeit the premises back to the plaintiff whenever such condition shall be broken, the defendants are estopped, when sued by the plaintiff for the recovery of the premises on the ground of such forfeiture, from denying that the title conveyed to them or to their grantors by the plaintiff was, when so conveyed, a good title. Upon this principle alone the question now under consideration may be decided against the defendants. While a grantee, or one claiming under him, may in many cases dispute the title attempted to be conveyed by the grantor, yet the principle contained in the proposition just enunciated, we think, has never been questioned; and many authorities go much further in asserting that the grantee, or one in privity with him, cannot dispute the grantor's title. Bigelow, Estop. 414; Williams v. Cash, 27 Ga. 507, 512; Woolfolk v. Ashby, 2 Mete. (Ky.) 288; Fitch v. Baldwin, 17 Johns. 161; Jackson v. Hotchkiss, 6 Cow. 401; Root v. Crock, 7 Pa. St. 378; Wedge v. Moore, 6 Cush. 8; Hodges v. Eddy, 38 Vt. 328, 348, 349; Ward v. McIntosh, 12 Ohio St. 231. We might here say that the deeds from Brinkley to O'Neil, and from O'Neil to Mrs. O'Brien, conveyed the premises "with all the restrictions and reservations in regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors contained in the original deed from John M. Wetherell and wife to Theodore L. Reber and wife." This quotation is copied from the last-mentioned deed, and the deed from Brinkley to O'Neil contains a clause of the same purport, and couched in nearly the exact language. We might also say, before passing to the next question, that in this state the party in ejectment having the better title may always recover, whatever that title may be, legal or equitable. It is true, a plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title; but if his title is better than that of his adversary, he may recover, however weak his title may be. A mere prior possession, with claim of ownership, would probably be sufficient to enable the plaintiff to recover as against a party who had no right to the premises.

*623 Now, *apply this doctrine to the present case. Wetherell, the plaintiff, once had possession, with a claim of ownership. The defendants either hold under him, or else have no right to the premises at all. They have violated the conditions upon which Wetherell parted with the possession of the premises. Now, should they be allowed to question his original ownership of the property?

The next question is whether the deed from the plaintiff to Reber created merely an estate upon condition, or created an absolute estate, with merely a personal covenant on the part of Reber, not running with the land, that no intoxicating liquors should ever be sold on the premises. The deed reads as follows:

"This indenture, made this seventh day of August, A. D. 1870, by and between John M. Wetherell and Mary S., his wife, of the city of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, parties of the first part, and Theodore L. Reber, of the county of Osage, in the state of Kansas, party of the second part, witnesseth that the said parties of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of twenty dollars to said first parties in hand paid by said second party, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and for the further consideration that the said second party, and his heirs and assigns, forever, shall and will well and faithfully observe, keep, and perform the following conditions and covenant, to-wit, and it is expressly agreed and covenanted that the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, forever, shall never bargain, sell, barter, trade, or exchange any whisky, brandy, wines, or other intoxicating liquors, (beer excepted,) at or upon the premises hereinafter described and hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, or in any house or building that may be erected thereon; nor shall said second party, or his heirs and assigns, ever at any time suffer, allow, or permit any other person or persons so to do, —doth by these presents grant, bargain, sell, remise, release, alien, convey, and confirm unto the said party of the second part, and to his heirs and assigns, forever, all the following described tracts, pieces, and parcels of land lying and being situate in Wetherell's addition to the town of Osage City, in the county of Osage, in the state of Kansas, to-wit, lots numbered 23 and 24, in block numbered 14, and

ing, or in anywise appertaining, to have and to hold the same, and every part thereof, unto the said party of the second part, and his heirs and assigns, forever; subject, however, and upon the express condition, that the said party of the second part, and his heirs and assigns forever, shall and will well and faithfully perform the covenants and conditions hereinbefore named. And the said John M. Wetherell and Mary S., his wife, for themselves and their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, do hereby covenant, and agree to and with the said party of the second part, and his heirs and assigns, that the said parties of the first part, and their successors, will warrant and forever defend the said lands and appurtenances, and every part thereof, unto the said second party, and to his heirs and assigns forever, against the said parties of the first part, and their successors, and against all and every person or persons whomsoever, lawfully claiming or to claim the same, subject, however, and upon the express condition, that said party of the second part, and his heirs and assigns, shall and will well and faithfully keep and perform the conditions, covenants, and agreements hereinbefore named. And it is one of the conditions, and a part of the consideration, for the sale and conveyance of the lands hereinbefore described, forever, that if said second party, or his heirs or assigns, or any person or persons, by or with the knowledge, consent, or permission of said second party, or his heirs or assigns, shall at any time fail, neglect, or refuse to faithfully and fully keep, perform, and observe the conditions and covenants aforesaid, or any of them, such failure, neglect, or refusal shall be taken and held to be a breach of the covenant and condition of this conveyance; and any such breach of any of the conditions, covenants, and agreements aforesaid shall work a forfeiture of the lands hereinbefore described to the whole and every part thereof, together with all the appurtenances thereto belonging, or in anywise appertaining, and the same, the whole, and every part thereof, shall immediately revert to and become the property of the said parties of the first part, and their successors and assigns, forever, as fully and completely as if this conveyance had never been made.

"In testimony whereof the said John M. Wetherell and Mary S., his wife, by John F. Dodds, their attorney in fact, have caused *625 this conveyance to be made, and set their hands *and seals to the same, in the said county of Osage, on the seventh day of August, 1870.

JOHN M. WETHERELL. [Seal.]

"MARY S. WETHERELL. [Seal.]

"By JOHN F. DODDS, their Attorney in Fact." [Seal.]

The foregoing deed seems plain to us beyond all question. There can be no doubt as to what was intended by the parties thereto; and while the language thereof clearly shows that it was intended by the parties that Reber should be bound by a personal covenant never to sell, or permit to be sold, any intoxicating liquors on the premises, yet it still more clearly shows that it was further intended by the parties that the estate in the premises should be conveyed merely upon the condition that neither Reber, nor any one holding under him, should ever do any act prohibited by said covenant. The deed expressly says that the conveyance is upon condition. The condition is expressly made to reach not only Reber, but his heirs and assigns. The deed expressly says that if this condition shall ever be broken by the grantee, or his heirs or assigns, the premises shall be forfeited back to the grantor, his heirs or assigns. And of this condition the defendants had ample notice, as the recitals in their own deeds most clearly show. The estate conveyed was clearly an estate upon condition subsequent, and the condition, until broken, runs with the land, beyond all doubt. We do not in this case intend to decide whether a covenant, personal or otherwise, could be created on the part of Reber, the grantee, by a deed which he never signed, (3 Washb. Real Prop. c. 4, § 2, pars. 48, 49;) nor do we intend to decide whether the assigns of Wetherell, the grantor, could take any advantage of the breach of any condition contained in such a deed, (1 Washb. Real Prop. c. 14, par. 14,) for these questions are not in this case. What we do decide is that, by the language contained in the said deed from Wetherell to Reber, a valid condition subsequent was created, upon the continued observance of which by the grantee, and *626 his heirs and assigns, the estate conveyed to *them depended; and that whenever either of them committed a breach of said condition the grantor was at liberty to claim a forfeiture of the estate from them to himself. And as ample authority for this decision, we would refer to the case of Plumb v. Tubbs, 41 N. Y. 442. The case of Harsha v. Reid, 45 N. Y. 417, relied on by the plaintiffs in error, has no application whatever to the case now under consideration. That was a case where a person already the owner of a certain piece of land covenanted with another person for a money consideration that he would not erect a grist-mill on the land; and the covenant in that case had no connection with the sale or conveyance of that land, or of any other land, upon condition or otherwise. In the language of the court deciding the case, "the covenantees did not derive title from the coventors, but the covenant was an independent and personal contract, made upon and for a money consideration in no way connected with the title."

These are the only questions necessary to be considered in detail. Bridget O'Brien was the principal defendant in the case, and the question asked her by the plaintiff on the trial was undoubtedly for the purpose of showing that her husband sold the liquors which he did sell with her knowledge and consent, and the question was therefore competent under the language of the deed. The admission of the testimony of the witness Curtis was not sufficiently erroneous and material, if erroneous at all, so as to require a reversal of the judgment of the court below. The sale of the liquors in this case, as in most cases, had to be proved principally by circumstantial evidence; and therefore the plaintiff proved the following circumstances by Curtis, to-wit, that the word "Saloon" was over the awning of the building where it is claimed the liquors were sold, and that the witness frequently saw persons go into the building apparently sober and come out drunk, and that this led him to believe that intoxicating liquors were sold there. If this evidence were wholly thrown out, there would still be ample evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

*627 *COMMISSIONERS OF BROWN Co. v. WILLIAM B. BARNETT.

January Term, 1875.

County Commissioners: Power to Rent Buildings for County Purposes. The commissioners of a county are empowered, in case the county does not own buildings reasonably suited or adequate therefor, to rent any requisite number of rooms for county offices, and to bind the county by a contract therefor; and under all ordinary circumstances the judgment of the commissioners is conclusive as to the unfitness or insufficiency of the buildings owned by the county.

Error from Brown district court.

Action by Barnett to recover $50 for rent of room for county treasurer's office. In December, 1872, a written lease or contract was entered into by Barnett and the then board of county commissioners, whereby the county board rented from Barnett a room for one year, to be used by the county treasurer. It was so used, and the rent paid up to December 31, 1873. The county board did not surrender possession, but permitted the treasurer to occupy said room for his office. April 1, 1874, Barnett presented his bill for the three months' rent due that day, and, payment being refused by the commissioners then in office, this suit was brought. Trial in the district court, on appeal, at the October term, 1874. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff.

Nathan Price and E. Bierer, for plaintiffs in error.

C. W. Johnson, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. As the record stands in this case, there is scarcely any question which has not already been decided by this court. The action was on an account for rent, brought first before a justice of the peace, and taken on appeal to the district court. No question is made as to the sufficiency of the bill of particulars. There is nothing in the record to show that all the testimony has been preserved. Indeed, it is evident from instructions asked that it has not been. Of course, then, we must presume that it was sufficient to sustain the verdict. Some instructions were asked by defendant, (plaintiff in error,) which were refused, but the record fails to show that all the instructions which were given have been preserved, and, as often said, the instructions refused may have been so refused because already once substantially given.

A single matter may, however, properly be noticed. The rent claimed was for rooms rented for county offices. It is admitted that there was, at the time, belonging to the county, a court-house; and, such being the case, it is contended that the commissioners had no power to rent other offices, or bind the county by a contract therefor. By the third clause of section 16 of the act concerning counties and county officers the commissioners are empowered "to purchase sites for; and to build and keep in repair, county buildings, and cause the same to be insured in the name of the county treasurer for the benefit of the county, and, in case there are no county buildings, to provide suitable rooms for county purposes." Now, the contention of counsel is, upon the maxim, expressio unius, exclusio alterius, and upon the rule that the grant of a specific power upon certain conditions is, by implication, a denial of that power except upon those conditions, that, as the power is in terms granted to provide rooms for offices in case there are no county buildings, it is not granted and does not exist in case there are such buildings. It does not appear what kind of a court-house the county had,—whether adequate to the needs of the various county offices or not; and to sustain the claim of counsel would deny to the commissioners the power to provide rooms for county offices, and facilities for the transaction of county business, whenever the county chanced to possess a court-house, however unsuitable for occupation, or inadequate to the wants of the public. So strict a construction would simply illustrate the saying that the letter killeth, while the spirit maketh alive. We do not think the language

*629 quoted sustains the claim of counsel. It justifies *and should receive a more liberal construction. The commissioners are the general guardians and agents of the county, and have the general management of its affairs; and the quoted clause empowers them, if the county has no buildings reasonably suited or adequate therefor, to rent any requisite number of rooms for county offices; and, under all ordinary circumstances, the judgment of the commissioners is conclusive as to the unfitness or insufficiency of the buildings owned by the county.

The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

It is understood that the case of same plaintiff against Barnett, Morrill & Co. is similar to this, and must be decided in the same way. (All the justices concurring.)

STATE OF KANSAS v. WALTER SMITHERS and another.

January Term, 1875.

County Records: Not to be Removed to Another County to be Used as Evidence. The district court has no power to require that the books and records of the county treasurer and county clerk of one county shall be removed fifty miles from the place where they are usually kept, into another county, so that they may be used as evidence in a criminal action pending in such other county. Copies may be used where the original cannot be procured.<sup>1</sup> Appeal from Lyon district court.

Motion for an attachment for an alleged contempt. In a criminal action against one A. F. Nicholas, Walter Smithers, as county treasurer, and S. N. Fancher, as county clerk, of Greenwood county, were duly subpoenaed to attend the Lyon district court, "with all the books and records of their respective offices that in any manner relate to the county treasurer of said county for the years 1868 to 1874," *630 *to testify as witnesses on the part of the state in said case of "The State v. Nicholas." The papers on appeal to this court were filed March 16, 1875, during the January term.

W. C. Huffman, Co. Atty., and Ruggles & Sterry, for the State, in support of the motion.

Gillett & Forde, for Smithers and Fancher, contra.

VALENTINE, J. A criminal action brought and pending in Greenwood county was removed, by change of venue, to Lyon county. A subpoena duces tecum was then issued, and served upon the defendants in this case, Walter Smithers, treasurer of Greenwood county, and S. N. Fancher, county clerk of said Greenwood county, commanding them to appear and produce the books and records of their respective offices at the March term, 1875, of the district court of said Lyon county, for the purpose that said books and papers might be used as evidence in said criminal action. Smithers and Fancher failed to respond to said subpoena. A rule was then issued by the district court of Lyon county, requiring them to appear and show cause why an attachment should not be issued against them as for a contempt of the court. They appeared and showed that they were respectively county treasurer and county clerk of Greenwood county, as aforesaid; that they held their offices at Eureka, the county-seat of said Greenwood county; and that Eureka is about fifty miles from Emporia, the county-seat of Lyon county, where the district court was held. The court, on this showing, discharged the rule, and refused to issue any attachment against these defendants, and the state now appeals to this court.

The only question that we are asked to decide is whether the district court had the power to require said officers to remove their books and papers from Eureka, Greenwood county, to Emporia, *631 Lyon county. Perhaps, more properly speaking, the *question is whether the district court committed such an error by refusing to grant said attachment as will call for the judicial interposition of this court to reverse the rulings of the district court. And involved in this question are the questions whether the district court has any discretion in dispensing with this kind of evidence, and in waiving the issue of attachments in this kind of cases, or whether the court must, in all cases where such evidence appears to be relevant and material, require the production of the same, if asked to do so by a party, and grant an attachment against any officer who may fail to respond readily to the process of the court.

But, passing over all other questions, had the court the power to require the production of said evidence? We hardly think it had. In the first place, ample provision has been made in this state for the use of copies of all public records and documents where the originals themselves might be used, and hence there is no great or overwhelming necessity for obtaining the originals. But, independent of this, we think the statutes show affirmatively that it was not intended that the public records and documents should ever be removed to any great distance from the place where they are required to be usually kept. Section 172 of the act concerning counties and county officers provides that all county officers must hold their offices at the county-seat; that they must keep their offices open every day, except Sunday; that "all books and papers required to be in their offices shall be open for the examination of any person; and, if any of said officers shall neglect to comply with the provisions of this section, he shall forfeit for each day he so neglects the sum of five dollars." Gen. St. 292, § 172. And section 12 of an act amending the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "no public officer herein named, [and county treasurers and county clerks are named,] or other custodians of public records, shall be compelled to attend any court, officer, or tribunal sitting more than one mile from his office, with any record or records belonging to his office, or in his custody as such officer." Laws *632 1870, p. 174, § 12. *And, upon general principles, it would hardly seem consistent with public policy to allow the public records to be hauled about from place to place, all over the state, at the mere whim or fancy of some capricious individual who might suppose he needed them, to use as evidence in some criminal trial, or even on some preliminary examination, unimportant in itself, but swelled by his imagination, to prodigious proportions.

SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS.

OWEN DUFFEY and others v. HATTIE M. RAFFERTY.

July Term, 1875.

Ejectment: What Right or Title Sufficient. In an action in the nature of an action of ejectment, in Kansas, the plaintiff may recover, if he has any right to the property, and if that right is paramount to any right to the same possessed by the defendant, although the legal title to the property may be outstanding in some third person, and although some third person may have a better right to the property than the plaintiff.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Leavenworth district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Clough & Wheat, for plaintiffs in error.

The facts found by the court were not sustained by the evidence. The deed from Russell and wife to William R. Oliver was void because of said Oliver's previous death. Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 368, 376; Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet. 264; Stilwell v. Hubbard, 20

<sup>1</sup>The question of who shall recover, in such an action, depends entirely upon the question which party has the paramount right to the property in controversy. Simpson v. Boring, 16 Kan. 248; Mooney v. Olsen, 21 Kan. 697. It is not essential that the plaintiff should have a title perfect beyond all question, and paramount to the title of every other person. It is enough if he have a right to the property, and that that right is paramount to the right of the defendant. Hollenback v. Ess, 81 Kan. 88; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 275.

Wend. 44; Price v. Johnston, 1 Ohio St. 390; Bank v. Webster, 44 N. H. 268; Day v. Griffith, 15 Iowa, 103; Woodbury v. Fisher, *10 20 Ind. 389; Parmelee v. Simpson, 5 *Wall. 86; Landes v. Brant, 10 How. 373; Wiggins v. Lusk, 12 Ill. 136. We claim, from said cases, that there did not any equitable right pass by said deed; that it takes the consent of a living person for equitable rights to pass, and that it is absurd to say that any rights pass by a void instrument; that the proceedings of the town company were void, and that Stevens never obtained any title to said lot 27, (2 U. S. St. at Large, 445, § 1; article 16, Treaty 1854 with Delaware Indians,) and that the pretended sale made by Stevens to Oliver and Montgomery was utterly void, (McCracken v. Todd, 1 Kan. *165, *166, and Stone v. Young, 4 Kan. *17;) that partitions between tenants in common are not made by such transactions as those disclosed in this case.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action in the nature of an action of ejectment, for the recovery of certain real property, to-wit, lot 27, block 45, in Leavenworth city. The case was submitted to the court below, without a jury, and the court made separate findings of fact and conclusions of law; and while some of the findings of fact are sustained by but very little evidence, yet we think they are all sustained by sufficient evidence; or, at least, we cannot say that any material finding of fact is so far unsustained by evidence that we should reverse the judgment of the court below on that account.

The judgment of the district court was in favor of the plaintiff below, Mrs. Rafferty, and against the defendants below, Duffey and the Millers. Is this judgment correct upon the facts, as found by the court below? It seems that the legal title to the property in controversy is still outstanding in the original patentee, William H. Russell; and therefore the only questions now to be determined, as between these parties, are, has the plaintiff, Mrs. Rafferty, any kind of right *11 to said property? and, if so, who has the better right *thereto, herself or the defendants? If she has any right to the property, and if that right is paramount to any right possessed by the defendants, she may recover, notwithstanding some other person not a party to the action may have a better right to the property than she has. Mrs. Rafferty's title to the property in controversy is substantially as follows: In 1854 the Leavenworth Town Company took possession of and surveyed and platted the original town-site of Leavenworth city. The title, however, to said town-site was still in the government of the United States, in trust for the Delaware Indians. In this connection see Fackler v. Ford, 24 How. 322; S. C. McCahon, *21, [and 1 Kan. (Dassler's Ed.) 463;] Maduska v. Thomas, 6 Kan. *153. Said company sold some of the lots, and apportioned others to the members of the town company. In this way, lots 27 and 28, in block 45, in said city, were apportioned to Daniel H. Stevens, a member of the town company. In 1855, Stevens sold said lots to William R. Oliver and William Montgomery. On the nineteenth of September, 1856, Oliver died, leaving a widow and two minor daughters, Hattie M. and Maggie, the first of whom is now the plaintiff in this action, Mrs. Rafferty. December 11, 1856, Mrs. Oliver was duly appointed guardian for said minor children. February 11, 1857, said Russell, as the agent and trustee of said town company, and of the persons entitled to lots under said sales and apportionments made by said town company, purchased said lots from the government of the United States, paying therefor from funds raised by said town company for that purpose, and received from the sales of lots, and from assessments made on lots, a portion of which assessments was paid by Stevens. In April, 1857, Russell and wife executed a deed for lot 28 to Montgomery; and, not knowing that Oliver was dead, they also, at the same time, executed a deed for lot 27 to Oliver. Montgomery accepted his deed, and put the same on record. Mrs. Oliver also accepted the deed made to Oliver, and put the same on record, and from that time till April, 1858, she had the entire possession of said lot 27, *12 when she gave possession *thereof to Simon Cort, defendant Duffey's grantor. October 15, 1859, Mrs. Oliver died, and two weeks thereafter Maggie Oliver, Mrs. Rafferty's sister, died, aged only five years. Cort and the defendants have had possession of said lot ever since. Cort received the possession thereof from Mrs. Oliver; and at no time since Russell executed said deeds to Oliver and Montgomery has either Russell or Montgomery made any claim to said lot 27. The defendant's title to said lot 27 is as follows: In 1858, Mrs. Oliver, in her own right, and as guardian for her said minor children, by one William Lynn, attempted to sell said lot 27 to Simon Cort, and gave Cort possession of the lot. On the day of the death of Mrs. Oliver, and subsequently thereto, there were some proceedings had in the probate court with reference to said sale and said lot 27; but, as these proceedings were so manifestly void that even the defendants themselves do not claim anything under them, we shall not make any further mention of them. August 29, 1860, Cort sold and conveyed said lot 27 to the defendant Duffey, and gave him possession thereof; and the other defendants hold under Duffey. Duffey has been in possession of said lot 27 ever since he purchased it from Cort, and no one but the plaintiff has ever attempted to disturb his possession, or right of possession thereto.

Now, taking all these facts together, we think they show that the plaintiff has some right to said lot, not only as against the defendants, but also as against every other person; and that, while the defendants might have some right to the property as against a mere wrongdoer, or against any person who had no rights thereto, yet that they have no right or title as against the plaintiff. The facts, as we think, show that when Oliver died he had an equitable interest in the fund with which said lot was purchased; that he had an equitable right to demand that said fund should be used for the purpose of purchasing said lot; and that it was such a right as would descend to his heirs. The fund was devoted to the express purpose of purchasing said property; and, when Russell used the fund in purchasing the same from the United States, a trust-estate immediately resulted therein in favor of the heirs of Oliver, co-extensive with their interest in said fund. At the time of the death of Oliver, his two minor children, Hattie M. and Maggie, were his heirs. Laws 1855, p. 306, § 1. His widow, if entitled to anything, was entitled to only a dower interest of one-third during her natural life. Laws 1855, supra; and also page 314, § 1. Therefore, when Mrs. Oliver died, her interest in the property, if she ever had any, lapsed, and the whole interest derived from Oliver passed to the two minor children; and, when Maggie died, her interest in the property passed to her sister, Hattie M., now Mrs. Rafferty. Laws 1859, p. 383, § 19. From the acts of all the parties, there must have been an equitable partition of the property between Oliver and Montgomery. At least, it so appears from the acts of Montgomery and Russell, the parties most interested in the matter, and the only parties who have any right to controvert the matter. An equitable partition—a mere parol partition—of real estate, followed by acts, where the parties have only an equitable interest in the property, is sufficient.

From the foregoing it would seem that the plaintiff ought to recover in this case. Even if Cort obtained from Mrs. Oliver her dower interest in the property in controversy, still that dower interest had terminated before Duffey purchased the property from Cort, and long before this action was commenced. Duffey never obtained any interest in said property, legal or equitable. He never had anything more than a bare naked possession, derived from the plaintiff's guardian, through Cort and Lynn. Now, under these circumstances, even if the plaintiff had no title, legal or equitable, to said lot, yet still it would seem that she ought to recover. Her possession through her guardian was prior in time to that of the defendants, and the defendants hold under her possession. Now, it is a general rule that, as between parties claiming title, mere priority of possession gives precedence where no better title can be shown as belonging to either.

And this rule will certainly apply to this case, provided the plaintiff has failed to show any better title than a mere priority of possession with a claim of ownership.

There are other grounds suggested by plaintiff in error for the reversal of the judgment below, but we do not think that they are tenable.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.
(All the justices concurring.)

CLINTON M. WOOD v. JOHN W. MILLSPAUGH, Receiver, etc.

July Term, 1875.

Injunction: Temporary: Discretion of Court. The district courts, and the judges thereof, have considerable discretion in allowing and disallowing, and in sustaining or vacating, temporary injunctions; and therefore, when the reasons urged for and against a temporary injunction are very nearly equally balanced, the supreme court will not reverse an order of the district court, or a judge thereof, vacating a temporary injunction.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Cowley district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Fairbank, Torrance & Green, for plaintiff.

Leland J. Webb, for defendant.

VALENTINE, J. At the commencement of this action a temporary injunction was allowed to restrain the defendant, Millspaugh, from erecting a mill-dam on Walnut river, in Cowley county, so as *15 to cause the water thereof to flow back *and into Dutch creek, a tributary of Walnut river, and thereby to overflow the plaintiff's land. Afterwards the judge of the court below, at chambers, vacated the order of injunction; and the plaintiff, excepting thereto, brings the case to this court for review. The reasons urged for and against the temporary injunction are very nearly equally balanced, and therefore, as district courts, and the judges thereof, have considerable discretion in allowing or disallowing, and in sustaining or vacating, temporary injunctions, we must sustain the order of the judge below vacating the temporary injunction allowed in this case. Even if the reasons in favor of sustaining a temporary injunction should slightly preponderate over those against it, still that would not be sufficient to authorize this court to reverse an order of the district court, or a judge thereof, vacating a temporary injunction, unless the preponderance should be so great that this court could say that the district court or judge had abused its or his discretion.

The order of the judge of the court below is affirmed.

<sup>1</sup>See Stoddart v. Vanlanningham, 14 Kan. *18; Johns v. Schmidt, 32 Kan. 388; S. C. 4 Pac. Rep. 872. Principle of res adjudicata does not apply to the decision sustaining a temporary injunction, upon motion to dissolve, so as to prevent the court from hearing and trying the whole case upon the issues, when called for trial in regular form. Id. See, also, Challiss v. County of Atchison, post, *49.

KANSAS PAC. RY. CO. v. MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

Public Lands: Land Grants Construed. On the twenty-sixth of July, 1866, the lands adjacent to the then selected line of plaintiff's road up the Smoky Hill river, and including the lands in controversy, were, in pursuance of positive and direct legislation, reserved from sale by the United States, and on the twenty-second of January, 1867, the road along these lands was completed, accepted by the president, and patents by him ordered to be issued for said lands. The land grants to the defendant provided that in case it should appear, when the line or route of its road was definitely fixed, that the United States had sold any section, or that it *16 had been reserved by the United States for any purpose *whatever, then the secretary of the interior should cause other lands in equal amount to be selected for the grant. The line of defendant's road adjacent to the lands in dispute was definitely fixed between the fifth and twentieth of September, 1866. Held, that the grant to the defendant never attached to the said lands, but that the full title thereto passed to the plaintiff by the construction and acceptance of its road.

Error from Davis district court.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

J. P. Usher, for plaintiff.

T. C. Sears, for defendant.

BREWER, J. This is a controversy between these two corporations as to the title to certain lands situated near the junction of their roads, and claimed by each respectively under a congressional land grant. The suit was brought by the plaintiff in error in the district court of Davis county, and embraced nearly one hundred thousand acres of land in the counties of Davis and Dickinson. As to the major portion of these lands the district court decided in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff now brings the case here on error. Each company claims under a land grant. In neither is it pretended that there was any specific designation of the lands granted. In each the location of the road determined the specific tracts. It becomes necessary, therefore, as to each road, to examine the terms of the *17 grant, as well as to ascertain when the line of the road was definitely fixed. The plaintiff, originally known as the "Leavenworth, Pawnee & Western Railroad Company," subsequently as the "Union Pacific Railway Company, Eastern Division," and finally by its present name, claims under the acts of congress in aid of the construction of a road from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean. The first of these acts was approved July 1, 1862, and while it contemplated but a single main line, it also provided for the construction of two or three branches on the eastern end. One of these branches was to be constructed by the plaintiff. Section 3 defines the land grant to the main company. It reads: "That there be, and is hereby, granted to the said company * * * every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad, on the line thereof, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed." Section 4 provides that commissioners should be appointed upon the completion of every forty miles of road to examine and report whether such completed portion was built as required by the act, and upon a favorable report patents were to issue for the adjacent lands. In section 6 the grants were declared to be upon condition that the bonds issued by the United States in aid of the construction should be paid at maturity; that the road should be kept in repair; and the mails, troops, etc., transported thereon. In section 7 the assent of the company to the act was required within one year, and the completion of the road by July 1, 1874; and then followed these provisos: "Provided, that within two years after the passage of this act said company shall designate the general route of said road, as near as may be, and shall file a map of the same in the department of the interior; whereupon the secretary of the interior shall cause the lands within fifteen miles of said designated route or routes to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry, and sale; and when any portion of said route shall be finally located the secretary of the interior shall cause the said lands hereinbefore granted to be surveyed and set off as fast as may be necessary for the purpose herein named: provided, that, in fixing the point of connection of the main trunk with the eastern connections, it shall be fixed at the most practicable point for the construction of the Missouri and Iowa branches, as hereinafter provided." By section 8 the president was authorized to designate the initial point of the main line, which was to be on the one-hundredth meridian west from Greenwich, and at which all the eastern branches were to unite. Sections 9 and 10 refer to the plaintiff's road, and are as follows:

"Sec. 9. And be it further enacted that the Leavenworth, Pawnee & Western Railroad Company of Kansas are hereby authorized to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river, at the mouth of the Kansas river, on the south side thereof, so as to connect with the Pacific Railroad of Missouri, to the aforesaid point on the one-hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, as herein provided, upon the same terms and conditions in all respects as are provided in this act for the construction of the railroad and telegraph line first mentioned, and to meet and connect with the same at the meridian of longitude aforesaid; and in case the general route or line of road from the Missouri river to the Rocky mountains should be so located as to require a departure northwardly from the proposed line of said Kansas railroad before it reaches the meridian of longitude aforesaid, the location of said Kansas road shall be made so as to conform thereto; and said railroad through Kansas shall be so located between the mouth of the Kansas river as aforesaid, and the aforesaid point on the one-hundredth meridian of longitude, that the several railroads from Missouri and Iowa, herein authorized to connect with the same, can make connection within the limits prescribed in this act, provided the same can be done without deviating from the general direction of the whole line to the Pacific coast; the route in Kansas, west of the meridian of Fort Riley, to the aforesaid point on the one-hundredth meridian of longitude, to be subject to the approval of the president of the United States, and to be determined by him on actual survey. And said Kansas company may proceed to build said railroad to the aforesaid point on the one-hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich in the territory of Nebraska. * * *

*19 *"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted that the said company chartered by the state of Kansas shall complete one hundred miles of their said road, commencing at the mouth of the Kansas river as aforesaid, within two years after filing their assent to the conditions of this act, as herein provided, and one hundred miles per year thereafter, until the whole is completed. * * *"

Under this act the plaintiff, as appears by the proceedings, filed a map of its general route, and the fifteen-mile strip on either side thereof was duly reserved from sale. This route extended up the Kansas river to the left bank of the Republican, and thence along the bank of said last-named river to the one-hundredth meridian. Subsequently, and on the second of July, 1864, congress passed an amending act, which increased the land grant, the area of reserved lands, and authorized the plaintiff to connect its road with the main line at other than the one-hundredth meridian, providing, however, that the grant of bonds or land should not thereby be increased. Again, on the third of July, 1866, congress passed an act authorizing the location of a new route, the filing of a map thereof, and the reservation of the adjacent lands, section 1 of which is as follows:

"An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean,' etc., etc., 'approved July 2, 1864.'

"Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that the Union Pacific Railway Company, Eastern Division, is hereby authorized to designate the general route of their said road, and to file a map thereof, as now required by law, at any time before the first day of December, 1866; and upon the filing of the said map, showing the general route of said road, the lands along the entire line thereof, so far as the same may be designated, shall be reserved from sale by order of the secretary of the interior: provided, that said company shall be entitled to only the same amount of the bonds of the United States to aid in the construction of their line of railroad and telegraph as they would have been entitled to if they had connected their said line with the Union Pacific Railroad on the one-hundredth degree of longitude *as now required by law: and provided, further, that said company shall connect their line of railroad and telegraph with the Union Pacific Railroad, but not at a point more than fifty miles westwardly from the meridian of Denver, in Colorado."

In pursuance of this act, and on the eleventh of July, 1866, the plaintiff filed a map of its newly-selected route up the Smoky Hill, instead of the Republican, river, and on the twenty-sixth of July, 1866, the lands along the line thereof were all duly reserved from sale by order of the secretary of the interior. This reservation included all the lands in controversy. Prior thereto the road had been completed to Fort Riley, and soon thereafter work commenced on the extension up the Smoky Hill. On the fourteenth of December, 1866, the president of the company made his affidavit of the completion of twenty miles, and on the twentieth of same month the commissioners appointed by the president were directed to make their examination. Before making their examination the company had completed five additional miles, and on the tenth of January, 1867, the commissioners were directed to examine and report upon the twenty-five miles of completed road. The commissioners, on the seventeenth of January, 1867, reported favorably, and on the twenty-second of said month the president of the United States approved the same, and directed the issue of patents for lands due the company on account of this completed section of twenty-five miles. All the lands in controversy were covered by this executive order. These are the facts material to the plaintiff's title. From them it seems that two propositions are clearly deducible: First, the lands in controversy were, among others, on the twenty-sixth of July, 1866, duly and legally reserved from sale; and, second, that, as between the United States and the plaintiff, full title to these lands passed, at least upon the approval of the president of the report of the commissioners, and the order to issue patents. It is probable that title passed upon the permanent location of plaintiff's road adjacent to these lands, but as the time of such location is not definitely shown by the findings, and as *a vesting of title prior to the approval of the president would not, in the conclusions to which we have come, have any effect upon the decision, we forbear further inquiry in that direction. So far as the action of the president was required, the subsequent approval was equivalent to a prior selection of the route.

Turning, now, to the claim of defendant, let us see upon what it rests. The first act in its chain of title was approved March 3, 1863. So much as is material is as follows:

"An act for a grant of lands to the state of Kansas, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said state.

"Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that there be, and is hereby, granted to the state of Kansas, for the purpose of aiding in the construction: * * * Second, of a railroad from the city of Atchison, via Topeka, the capital of said state, to the western line of the state, in the direction of Fort Union and Santa Fe, New Mexico, with a branch, from where this last-named road crosses the Neosho, down said Neosho valley, to the point where the said first-named road enters the said Neosho valley, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, and each of its branches. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or routes of said road and branches are definitely fixed, sold any section, or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid; or that the right of pre-emption or homestead settlement has attached to the same; or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever,—then it shall be the duty of the secretary of the interior to cause to be selected, for the purpose aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest to the tiers of sections above specified, so much land, in alternate sections or parts of sections, designated by odd numbers, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the rights of pre-emption or homestead settlements have attached as aforesaid; which lands, thus indicated by odd numbers, and selected by the direction of the secretary of the interior as aforesaid, shall be held by the state of Kansas

for the use and purpose aforesaid: provided, that the land

*22 to be so selected shall in no case be located further than twenty miles from the lines of said road and branches: provided, further, that the lands hereby granted for and on account of said roads and branches severally shall be exclusively applied in the construction of the same, and for no other purpose whatever, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses through the same, as in this act hereinafter provided: provided, also, that no part of the land granted by this act shall be applied to aid in the construction of any railroad, or part thereof, for the construction of which any previous grant of land or bonds may have been made by congress: and provided, further, that any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States, by any act of congress, or in any other manner, by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of said road and branches through such reserved lands; in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the president of the United States."

In this act was no grant affecting in any way the lands in controversy; but the legislature of the state of Kansas (Laws 1864, p. 151) in accepting, on the ninth of February, 1864, this grant, and transferring certain of the lands to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company, added this proviso: "And provided, further, that if the congress of the United States shall, on or before the fourth of March, 1866, consent that the Neosho Valley Branch of the above-named road may be extended so as to intersect the Union Pacific Railroad, Eastern Division, at or near Fort Riley, and shall make a grant of land for such extension of like amount with that granted per mile for the construction of the hereinabove named principal road, then said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company shall proceed to construct such branch to such intersection, on the terms and conditions hereinabove prescribed, applicable to the construction of such main road."

In pursuance of this implied request, congress on the first of July, 1864, passed an act making a land grant to the state of Kansas to aid in the construction of the road indicated in the above proviso, which grant was made expressly "subject to all the provisions, *23 restrictions, limitations, and conditions *in regard to selection and location of lands, and otherwise," of the act of congress of March 3, 1863, heretofore noticed. Subsequently, with the assent of the state, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company transferred to the defendant all its interest in this grant, and on the twenty-sixth of July, 1866, congress passed a new act granting lands, of which the title and the first section are as follows:

"An act granting lands to the state of Kansas, to aid in the construction of a southern branch of the Union Pacific Railway and telegraph, from Fort Riley, Kansas, to Fort Smith, Arkansas.

"Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that for the purpose of aiding the Union Pacific Railroad Company, Southern Branch, the same being a corporation organized under the laws of Kansas, to construct and operate a railroad from Fort Riley, Kansas, or near said military reservation, thence down the valley of the Neosho river to the southern line of the state of Kansas, with a view to an extension of the same through a portion of the Indian Territory, to Fort Smith, Arkansas, there is hereby granted to the state of Kansas, for the use and benefit of said railroad company, every alternate section of land, or parts thereof, designated by odd numbers, to the extent of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said road, and not exceeding in all ten alternate sections per mile. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line of said road is definitely located, sold any section, or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid; or that the right of pre-emption or homestead settlement has attached to the same; or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever,—then it shall be the duty of the secretary of the interior to cause to be selected, for the purposes aforesaid, from the public land of the United States nearest to the sections above specified, so much land as shall be equal to the amount of such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or pre-emption has attached as aforesaid; which lands, thus indicated, by the direction of the secretary of the interior, shall be reserved and held for the state of Kansas for the use of said company by the said secretary, for the purpose of the construction and operation of said railroad, as provided by this act: provided, that

*24 any *and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or other purpose whatever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and excepted from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way, two hundred feet in width, is hereby granted, subject to the approval of the president of the United States: and provided, further, that said lands hereby granted shall not be selected beyond twenty miles from the line of said road."

The Union Pacific Railroad Company, Southern Branch, named in said act, is the defendant here, the name having been subsequently changed to that of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company. Between the fifth and twentieth of September, 1866, the defendant caused its line to be surveyed and made on the ground adjacent to the lands in controversy; which survey and location was approved by the board of directors of the defendant, and a map thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state of the state of Kansas, on November 14, 1866, and in the office of the secretary of the interior, December 16, 1866. On the ninth of June, 1870, the defendant's road was completed to the south line of the state, accepted by the governor, and by him certified to the secretary of the interior as a first-class railroad, and thereupon accepted by the president.

This constitutes the defendant's chain of title.

Looking merely to the granting clause in these acts under which defendant claims, and the words used are words of present grant,—“that there be, and is hereby, granted.” Now, if there were any designation of specific tracts, or any reference to existing lines, whether natural or artificial, from which, by mere survey and measurement, the specific tracts could be ascertained, it might well be said that the title to those tracts passed immediately, subject to be defeated by a failure to perform the conditions of the grant. Perhaps, too, if there were no other limitation than the want of a definitely located line of road, the location of the road would make the grant operative from the day of its date, and thus cut off all *intervening claims. But other limitations appear in both the acts of March 3, 1863, and July 26, 1866. It is provided that "in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of said road and branches are definitely fixed, sold any section, or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of pre-emption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it shall be the duty of the secretary of the interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest to the tiers of sections above specified, so much land * * * as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated," etc. This limitation operates to exclude from the grant any lands which at the time the line of road is definitely fixed have been by the United States reserved for any purpose whatsoever. It leaves the specific sections undetermined until the definite location of the road, and then excludes from the grant any lands to which adverse rights and interests have attached. Now, from the findings, it appears that the line of defendant's road adjacent to these lands was not definitely fixed until between the fifth and twentieth of September, 1866; but on the twenty-sixth of July prior thereto they had been by the United States duly reserved, in pursuance of positive and direct legislation therefor. It seems to us that they were, by the very terms of the acts under which defendant claims, excluded from the operation of its grant, and that, therefore, there is nothing in defendant's claim to interfere with the title which passed to the plaintiff by the completion and acceptance by the president of the United States of its road. As the facts seem to be undisputed, we can but think the case of Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72, leaves the courts free to apply the law correctly to those facts; and as, in the view we have taken of the law, the plaintiff has the better title to these lands, it becomes our duty to so adjudge. Inasmuch as no exception appears to have been taken to the facts as found, it

*26 is also our duty, under the law, to *make, so far as the courts of this state are concerned, a final disposition of the case. The judgment of the district court will therefore, as to the lands adjudged by it to the defendant, be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions, as to those lands, to enter judgment for the plaintiff, as prayed for in the petition.

LAWRENCE R. WHEELER v. JOHN T. BRADY.

July Term, 1875.

Elections and Electors: School-District Elections: Women as Voters.

A person having all the qualifications of an elector, as defined by section 1, art. 5, of the constitution, except that such person is a woman, has the right to vote at an election regularly held for the election of a school-district treasurer.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Nemaha district court.

Quo warranto, brought by Wheeler, to test the right to the office of school-district treasurer of district No. 51, Nemaha county. At the annual district meeting held in March, 1872, Brady, the defendant, was elected such treasurer, and thereafter qualified, and entered upon the duties of his office. At the annual district meeting held in March, 1873, 140 votes were cast, of which Wheeler, the plaintiff, received 70, and one George H. Adams received 70. Of those voting for Wheeler, 60 were men and 10 were women; of those voting for Adams, 50 were men and 20 were women. The election board held that there was no election, (canvassing for each candidate 70 votes,) and "adjourned the election for further proceedings" until April 5th, and the "election was subsequently, by several adjournments, further postponed until April 19th." In the mean time a call for a "special election" was signed by 60 of the electors of said district, *27 *and such special election was called for April 19th. On that day the electors of said district met at the proper place, and proceeded to elect a treasurer, and for that purpose 60 votes were cast, all for said Wheeler. Wheeler afterwards qualified as such treasurer, and demanded the books and papers from Brady, who was holding over for want of a duly-elected and qualified successor. Upon Brady's refusal to surrender the office, Wheeler commenced this action. Trial at the October term, 1873. When the plaintiff rested, Brady demurred to the evidence. The district court held that women had the legal right to vote at said school-district meeting for school-district officers; that as Wheeler and Adams had each received 70 votes, there was no election; that the "adjournments" of said election were unauthorized and void; that as the call for a "special election" was not signed by a majority of the electors of the district, such special election was illegal and void; and that, as Wheeler had not shown any right to the office, he could not maintain the action. The court dismissed the petition, and adjudged costs against Wheeler.

Johnson & Falloon, for plaintiff.

If the second clause of section 20 of chapter 92 of the General Statutes is constitutional, the judgment is right, unless the adjournment kept alive the powers of the electors until April 19th; for our call was not signed by a majority of all the voters, if females are voters, and that was illegal too. If the plaintiff has mistaken the law in this case, it arises from a misinterpretation of the constitution by the light of the case of Winans v. Williams, 5 Kan. *227. At common law females had no such right, having no political status whatever. Maine, Anc. Law, 140; Cooley, Const. Lim. 599; Bl. Comm. 171. Article 5 of our constitution limits political power to males, thus following the laws and usages of all our western civilization, which has grown up from the Roman civilization, or been influenced by its laws.

*28 *On the other side, it is claimed that section 23 of article 2 of our constitution confers this right in school elections. This section confers nothing, enlarges nothing, removes no disability, and neither declares nor creates any new right; but merely imposes a limitation upon the legislature, to-wit, that in the regulation and formation of schools no distinction shall be made between males and females; and it seems to us that its terms prohibit the distinction of a right, rather than confer any new ones. The equality perhaps related to the pupils, teachers, taxation, and possibly to the enumeration of inhabitants in the creation of districts. If the clause had provided that no distinction should be made between whites and blacks, it could hardly be claimed that this was sufficient to confer suffrage where it did not exist before. Such terms in a constitution do not enlarge rights. Bradwell v. State, 16 Wall. 130. The case of Susan B. Anthony, though not the opinion of an appellate court, by holding that the amendments to the federal constitution do not confer suffrage on females, supports this principle.

It was argued at the trial that the law authorizing women to "vote" at school meetings is not the exercise of suffrage any more than it would be to vote at a church meeting. We think this view not tenable. School-districts are municipal corporations, clothed with the exercise of dominion which belongs to the state. If it were not so, this action would not lie, as the office would not be a public one. Dill. Mun. Corp. 32, note. Nor can any distinction be maintained upon the meaning of the words "voters" and "electors." Webster makes no distinction; neither does Bouvier. Section 4 of article 2 of the constitution provides no one but a qualified "voter" shall be eligible to the legislature. If females are "voters," they are also eligible to office, unless, in law, "voter" and "elector" mean entirely different things.

Nathan Price and W. D. Webb, for defendant.

*29 The principal question here is as to whether women had the right to vote. Plaintiff relies upon the case of Winans v. Williams, 5 Kan. *227. That was a case in which the party attempted to vote at a general election. The constitution (article 4) provides for two elections, and article 5 defines who shall be qualified electors; but a school-district meeting does not come within the provisions of either of these articles. A school-district is simply a quasi corporation, organized for the purpose of the education of the children within a certain district of country. Now, if the legislature should allow the people within certain districts of the state to organize themselves into quasi corporations for the purpose of caring for and protecting the poor, would any one say that women must be excluded from such corporation, or that a law which gave them a voice in the management of its affairs would be unconstitutional? This case is, however, much stronger. Section 23 of article 2 of the constitution expressly provides that "the legislature, in providing for the formation and regulation of schools, shall make no distinction between the rights of males and females." Now, how females can have the same rights in "regulating" a school without having the right to vote in the school meeting in which all its affairs are regulated, we are unable to see. Consequently, the law which gives them such right is not only constitutional, but any law which attempted to take it from them would be unconstitutional. If we are right in this view, there was no election at the regular school meeting. As to the question of the adjourned meeting, we say there is simply nothing in it. The meeting could not "adjourn" the election, and it is conceded that if women are legal voters at a school-district meeting the call for the special election was insufficient.

VALENTINE, J. The only question involved in this case—or, rather, the only question which we need consider—is whether persons having all the qualifications for electors, as defined by section 1 of article 5 of the constitution, except that they are women, have the right to vote at an election regularly held for the election of a school-district treasurer. This case differs widely *from the case of *30 Winans v. Williams, 5 Kan. *227. While we have no statutory or constitutional provision authorizing women to vote for either state or county superintendent of public instruction, and while the constitution would seem impliedly at least to prohibit such a thing, yet we have statutory provisions which expressly authorize women to vote for school-district treasurers. Section 19 of article 3 of the school law provides that "the inhabitants qualified to vote at a school meeting, lawfully assembled, shall have power * * * (3) to choose a director, clerk, and treasurer, who shall possess the qualifications of voters." Gen. St. 918. And section 20 of the same article provides that "the following persons shall be entitled to vote at any dis-district meeting: First, all persons possessing the qualifications of electors, as defined by the constitution of the state, and who shall be residents of the district at the time of offering to vote at said elections; second, all white female persons over the age of twenty-one years, not subject to the disqualifications named in section second, article fifth, of the constitution of the state, and who shall be residents of the district at the time of offering to vote." Gen. St. 919.

But it is claimed that the second subdivision of said section 20 of the school law is unconstitutional and void, as being in contravention of section 1, art. 5, of the constitution, which reads as follows: "Every white male person, of twenty-one years and upward, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in Kansas six months next preceding any election, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote at least thirty days next preceding such election, shall be deemed a qualified elector: First, citizens of the United States; second, persons of foreign birth who shall have declared their intention to become citizens conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization."

Now, does section 1, art. 5, of the constitution, have any application to the election of school-district treasurers? The constitution provides for two, and only two, elections, to be held by the people, to-wit, general elections, and township elections, (Const. art. 4, § 2;) and it does not anywhere even mention school-district elections or meetings. It provides for, or at least recognizes, the election of various officers: First, all the state officers provided for by the constitution, to-wit, the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, auditor, treasurer, attorney general, and superintendent of public instruction, (Const. art. 1, §§ 1, 2, 14;) second, members of the legislature, (Id. art. 2, §§ 2, 4, 5, 8, 9, 13;) third, judges of the supreme court, (Id. art. 3, §§ 2, 11;) fourth, judges of the district courts, (Id. art. 3, §§ 5, 11;) fifth, clerks of the district courts, (Id. art. 3, § 7;) sixth, probate judges, (Id. art. 3, §§ 8, 11;) seventh, justices of the peace, (Id. art. 3, §§ 9, 11;) eighth, county superintendent of public instruction, (Id. art. 6, § 1;) ninth, township officers, (art. 9, § 4.) But the constitution does not anywhere even mention the election of any school-district officer. The constitution does not require that all the offices which it creates or recognizes should be filled by an election of the electors mentioned in section 1 of article 5 of the constitution, or even by an election at all. For instance, the clerk and reporter of the supreme court are appointed by the judges, (Const. art. 3, § 4;) a judge pro tem. of the district court is elected by the bar, (Id. art. 3, § 20;) trustees of the public benevolent institutions are appointed by the governor, (Id. art. 7, § 1;) directors of the penitentiary are appointed or elected as prescribed by law, (Id. art. 7, § 2;) militia officers are also appointed or elected as provided by law, (Id. art. 8, § 3;) and vacancies in various offices are filled in various ways, generally by appointment, (Id. art. 1, §§ 11, 13, 14;

Id. art. 2, § 19; Id. art. 3, § 11; Id. art. 7, § 3.) And the constitution itself specifically provides that all officers whose election or appointment is not provided for in the constitution shall be elected or appointed as may be prescribed by law. Thus section 19, art. 2, of the constitution provides that "it [the legislature] shall have the power to provide for the election or appointment of all officers, and the filling of all vacancies not otherwise provided for in this constitution;"

and section 1, art. 15, provides that "all officers whose election or appointment is not otherwise provided for shall be chosen or appointed as may be prescribed by law."

*32 Now, as we have before stated, there is no school-district election or meeting provided for in the constitution; there is no provision as to how school-district officers shall be elected, appointed, or chosen; and we suppose no one will claim that they are, by the terms of the constitution, to be elected at either of the elections provided for in the constitution. Hence it would seem that the legislature would have full and complete power in the matter; that the legislature might provide for the election or appointment of school-district officers as it should choose, when it should choose, in the manner it should choose, and by whom it should choose. This would follow even if section 1 of article 5 of the constitution were by its terms capable of being made applicable to school-district elections. But said section cannot be made applicable to such elections except by a change of its terms. If it applies in its present form, then every person who is in other respects qualified, and who has resided "in the township * * * in which he offers to vote at least thirty days next preceding such election, shall be deemed a qualified elector;" that is, a legal voter of any school-district in any township would be a legal voter of every other school-district in that township. In every school-district of that township he could certainly swear that he was a legal elector "in the township in which he offers to vote." And if said section applies, then this right to vote in every school-district in the township in which an elector resides is a constitutional right, which cannot be abridged by the legislature, or by any other power except the entire people of the state by way of amendment to the constitution. Probably nearly every township in the state contains more than one school-district. In the county from which this case comes there are seventy-eight school-districts and only fourteen townships. In many of the counties the proportion of school-districts to the number of townships is much greater. For instance, in Crawford county there are one hundred school-districts and only nine townships.

*38 Now, if section 1 of article 5 of the constitution does not apply to school-district elections, then what is there to prevent the legislature from conferring the right of suffrage in school-district elections upon women? There is nothing in the nature of things, or in the nature of government, which would prevent it. Women are members of society,—members of the great body politic, citizens,—as much as men, with the same natural rights, united with men in the same common destiny, and are capable of receiving and exercising whatever of political rights may be conferred upon them. We must answer the main question involved in this case in the affirmative; and therefore the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE CITY OF PAOLA v. F. M. SHAW and others.

July Term, 1875.

1. Building Contract: Performance: Decision of Arbitrator Conclusive, unless Impeached for Fraud or Mistake. In an action against the sureties on a penal bond, given to secure the fulfillment of a building contract, it was shown that, according to the contract, the contractor was to build a certain school-house for his employers, the board of education of the city of Paola, in accordance with certain plans and specifications furnished, and to be furnished, by the architect, who was the duly-authorized agent of said board, and appointed by them; and said school-house was to be built under the direction and to the satisfaction of said architect, who had power to make such changes and alterations in any of the plans and specifications as he might choose. The contractor constructed said building in accordance with the instructions of the architect, and to his satisfaction, and at the time of the final estimate by the architect he received a final certificate from the architect certifying to the final and proper completion of the building. The board of education then took possession of said building, receiving the keys thereto from the contractor, and they still remain in possession thereof. The building, however, was not constructed in accordance with the original plans and specifications, and the building constructed was worth about $15,000 less than the one which the original plans and specifications called for. Held, that these facts do not constitute a cause of action in favor of the board of education and against the sureties on said bond.
2. ———. Where the parties to a building contract agree upon an architect, and stipulate and agree to rely upon his judgment, skill, and decision as to the character, amount, and value of work to be done, they must abide by his judgment and decision, or impeach it upon the ground of fraud, mistake, undue influence, or some other good cause.
3. Pleading: Reply Deemed Controverted. Allegations in a reply of the plaintiff are, under our system of pleading, to be deemed controverted by the defendant without any formal denial of the same on the part of the defendant.
4. ———: Construction of Contract. Allegations in a pleading denying the legal import of a written contract (a copy of which written contract is given in the pleadings, and admitted to be correct by both parties) will not be considered by the court.

5. ———: Contradictory Averments. On the trial of a case the whole of the pleadings are considered together; and where any two allegations of the same party are inconsistent with each other, the allegation most unfavorable to such party will be deemed to override the other allegation.

Error from Miami district court.

Action by the board of education of the city of Paola, as plaintiff, against L. E. Post, F. M. Shaw, A. A. Smith, J. B. Hobson, W. G. Rainey, H. Pardee, and C. A. Leighton, as defendants, to recover the sum of $7,000 as liquidated damages, and being the penal sum named in a certain bond executed and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff to secure the faithful performance of a contract made and entered into between the plaintiff and said Post as principal, with the other defendants as his sureties. Trial at the September term, 1873, of the district court, J. B. S., judge pro tem., presiding. Demurrer to plaintiff's evidence sustained, petition dismissed, and judgment for defendants for costs.

*35 **B. F. Simpson*, for plaintiff in error.

Action on a building contract against the contractor and his sureties, on his bond for a faithful performance. The essential conditions of the contract are the "contractor shall well and substantially, and in the best and most workman-like manner, with the best material of their respective kinds, and under the direction of the architect, make, execute, finish, and complete, and deliver to the proprietors," the school-house mentioned in the contract. Allegations of breaches are "that said Post did not or has not constructed said school-house throughout in the best workman-like manner, with the best quality of new materials of their respective kinds, or in a thorough, substantial, and workman-like style, and in accordance with the plans and specifications and drawings; that the material furnished by said Post in the construction of said school-house was not the best in quality that could be procured for the purpose, but, on the contrary, was of inferior quality;" specifying particularly the inferior work and material. These provisions are distinct and independent, and a failure to perform one gives the cause of action. It is not necessary that the default or omission shall extend to and embrace all of the separate, distinct, and independent provisions. The labor of construction may have been performed in the best and most workman-like manner, and yet the material furnished be very bad; and will it be claimed that no cause of action arises on account of the defects in material? See, on this point, the case of Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145. There may have been bad workmanship and worse material, and yet all done under the direction and with the acceptance of the architect, and even then a cause of action accruing to the plaintiff. Where a contract is entered into, with specifications, for the erection of a building, the contractor must perform in every essential particular, unless performance is waived. Van Buskirk v. Murden, 22 Ill. 446; Mitchell v. Wiscotta L. Co., 8 Iowa, 209; Mon- roe Female University v. Broadfield, 30 Ga. 1; Waugh v. Shunk, 20 Pa. St. 130; The Harriman, 9 Wall. 161; Swain v. Seamens, Id. 254; Williams v. Androscoggin & K. R. Co., 36 Me. 201; Witherow v. Witherow, 16 Ohio, 238.

*36 Again, it is alleged, by way of reply to the answer of defendants, claiming an acceptance of the building by the architect, that the acceptance was a fraudulent one, and not binding on plaintiff; and this is in accordance with the books, as see Finegan v. L'Engle, 8 Fla. 413; McAuley v. Carter, 22 Ill. 53; 11 Shep. 214; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Grat. 447, 473; Mansfield & S. R. Co. v. Veeder, 17 Ohio, 385.

W. R. Wagstaff and T. M. Carroll, for defendants.

When a building contract provides that the last installment shall be paid by the proprietors when all the work is completely finished, and certified to that effect by the architect under whose direction the work was to be done, production of the certificate of the architect is conclusive upon the proprietors, unless obtained through fraud or mistake. Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143; Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173; Jackson v. Wood, 24 Wend. 445; McAuley v. Carter, 22 Ill. 53.

If the parties to an executory contract make a provision in it that any dispute that may arise between them on the subject of the contract shall be determined by an individual named, whose decision shall be final, no action will lie for a breach of the agreement by one against the other; but they must resort to the tribunal appointed by themselves, from whose award there is no appeal. If parties, by contract, appoint an arbiter to settle their differences, they are bound by his award, although he may be interested in the contract which was the subject of difference, (Monongahela N. Co. v. Fenlon, 4 Watts & S. 205; Leech v. Caldwell, 5 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 280; Delaware & H. C. Co. v. Pennsylvania C. Co., 50 N. Y. 250; Memphis, C. & L. R. Co. v. Wilcox, 48 Pa. St. 161; Easton v. Pennsylvania & O. C. Co., 13 Ohio, 79; Jackson v. Wood, 24 Wend. 445;) and fraud and collusion must be affirmatively shown, (Stebbins v. Guthrie, 4 Kan. *354; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 80; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 254.) The mistake on the part of the architect, to be available, must be one which should clearly show that he was misled, deluded, and so far misapprehended the facts that he did not exercise his real judgment in the case. Commercial Ins. Co. v. Spankneble, 52 Ill. 53. The case of Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145, the authority relied on by the plaintiff, differs from the case at bar so widely in its facts as to have no bearing on the question here. In this case the architect is made the arbitrator between the contractors, and the character and amount of the work to be done are made subject to any modification the architect may direct. The contractor is made subject to the direction and instruction of the architect, regardless of plans and specifications. It seems plain that the contractor was bound to do the work as the architect should direct, and it seems equally clear, to make the defendants answerable in damages, a breach on the part of the contractor, in failing to build as directed by the architect, should be shown. This was not done. The plaintiffs did not aver fraud in their petition, and offered no proof of fraud on the trial.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action on a penal bond given to secure the fulfillment of a building contract. The action was commenced against L. E. Post, as principal, and F. M. Shaw, A. A. Smith, J. B. Hobson, W. G. Rainey, H. Pardee, and C. A. Leighton, as sureties; but as no service of summons was ever made on Post or Smith, and as neither of them ever appeared in the case, the action was prosecuted in the court below against the other defendants alone. The following facts are admitted by the pleadings: The bond and contract above mentioned were duly executed by the respective parties. The contract contained an agreement on the part of Post to build a school-house for the plaintiffs below, the board of education of the city of Paola, a city of the second class. The house was to be built according to certain plans and specifications, and under the direction of one A. J. Kelley, an architect, who was the duly-authorized agent of the said board of education, and appointed by them. Said Kelley had power, under the contract, to make additional plans and specifications, and to make such alterations and changes in any of the plans and specifications as he might choose. Post was to receive as compensation for building said house the sum of $35,000, to be paid in monthly installments as the work progressed, the work and the amount to be paid to be estimated by the architect; but in *38 no case was he to receive (until after the building was finally completed) more than 80 per cent. of the *amount due on any estimate of the architect, and he was to receive full payment within thirty days after the final completion and acceptance of the building. Where alterations were made from the original plans and specifications, Post was to receive more or less than the contract price in proportion as the alterations involved a greater or less expense. Post constructed the building in accordance with the instructions of the architect, and to his satisfaction, and at the time of the final estimate by the architect he received a final certificate from the architect, certifying to the final and proper completion of the building. Post received from the board of education 80 per cent. of said $35,000; to-wit, $28,000, and $7,000 thereof still remains unpaid. The board of education then took possession of said building, receiving the keys thereto from Post, and they still remain in possession thereof.

We quote the following portions of the contract as indicating the power of the architect in the premises: "In the construction of these presents, when the contract will admit of it, the term 'contractor' shall mean the said L. E. Post; the term 'proprietors' shall mean the said board of education, for and on behalf of the said school-district;

the term 'architect' shall mean A. J. Kelley, employed by the proprietors to superintend the erection and completion of the works; and the term 'works' shall mean all the works, matters and things specified and described in the specifications, plans, and other drawings as furnished, from time to time, by the architect, and also such other works, matters, and things as are hereby contracted to be done and performed by the contractor." "The contractor shall," "under the direction of the architect, make, execute, finish, and complete" "the several works, matters, and things, and acts mentioned and referred to in the specifications, plans, and drawings furnished, and to be furnished, by the architect, with such additions, enlargements, and alterations of and deviations from said plans and specifications (if any) as the architect may, from time to time, during the progress of the work, direct." "The proprietors shall pay the contractor, for the full and perfect completion of this contract, the sum of $35,000, in lawful currency of the United States;

but if the architect shall direct any additions to, or omissions *39 of, or variations from, *the plans and specifications, the value of such additions, omissions, or variations shall be added to or deducted from the said sum of $35,000, as the same may be. The payments to be eighty per centum of the works, according to the architect's estimate, and his certificate."

These are probably sufficient specimens to show the nature and extent of the power of the architect in the premises. They really show that the architect had all the power that the board of education itself had. He could make such alterations and changes as he chose. The contractor had but little, if any, choice in the matter. He was required to construct the building just as directed by the architect, and if he did so, and to the satisfaction of the architect, he fulfilled his contract. The pleadings admit that the building was constructed to the satisfaction of the architect, and therefore it would seem that judgment might have been rendered for defendants on the pleadings. It is claimed, however, that the building was not constructed in accordance with the original plans and specifications. This was not necessary. The contract itself made the subsequent directions of the architect paramount to the original plans and specifications. Where the subsequent directions of the architect differed from the original plans and specifications, the contractor was bound by his contract to follow the subsequent directions of the architect, and to abandon to that extent the original plans and specifications. The original plans and specifications served merely as general guides to work by, where no subsequent directions were given, and served in all cases as criterions of the value of the work done. If the flooring used was worth $10 per thousand feet less than that which the original plans and specifications called for, then $10 for each and every thousand feet of flooring used should have been deducted from the contract price of the building. If the steps used were worth $920 less than those which the original plans and specifications called for, then $920 should have been deducted for the steps. If the whole house was worth $15,000 less than that which the original plans and *specifications called for, then $15,000 should have been deducted from the contract price for the house, and the plaintiffs should have paid only $20,000 for the house, instead of $28,000, as they in fact did pay. The fact, however, that the plaintiffs paid the contractor $8,000 more than the house was really worth does not make these defendants liable. They did not enter into bond that the contractor should not receive $8,000, or any other sum, more than he was entitled to receive under the contract. They simply entered into bond that he would fulfill his contract, and, if he did that, (and the pleadings in effect admit he did,) then the condition of their bond was fulfilled; and what the contractor received or did not receive for his work is merely a question between the contractor and the plaintiffs. If the architect—the agent of the board of education—made unwise changes and alterations in the plans and specifications for the building, and if the board unwisely paid more than the building was worth, that was their own misfortune. The sureties on the bond (the defendants) did not agree that the architect and board should always act wisely. That it may be seen what these defendants did in fact agree to, we here quote the condition of their bond in full. It reads as follows: "If the above-bounden L. E. Post shall well and truly comply with and perform each and every condition, requirement, and obligation of said contract in writing, as it now is, or may be hereafter changed or modified, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise of full force and effect in law."

But it is alleged in the reply of the plaintiffs that the acts of the architect in accepting said building, in approving the work done thereon, and in issuing said final certificate, was fraudulent. And it is also alleged in said reply that said acts of the architect were performed through a mistake, the architect believing at the time that the building was in fact completed in all respects in accordance with the original plans and specifications. And it is also alleged in said reply that when said board received said building from Post, *41 that they did not receive it as a finished *or completed building, but received it only for what it was worth. These allegations in the reply are, under our system of pleading, to be deemed controverted by the defendants without any formal denial of the same on their part. Civil Code, §§ 86, 128. These are about the only contested allegations in the pleadings; and evidence can, of course, be introduced only to prove contested allegations. Reed v. Arnold, 10 Kan. *104.

We shall take no notice of such allegations in the pleadings as deny the legal import of the contract sued on, for such allegations, in legal effect, amount to nothing. The contract is in writing, set forth in full in the plaintiffs' petition, not denied by the defendants, and it must speak for itself. Neither shall we take any notice of any allegation in any pleading where other allegations made in a pleading by the same party show that said first-mentioned allegation is untrue, for on the trial of a case the whole of the pleadings are considered together; and where any two allegations of the same party are inconsistent with each other, the allegation most unfavorable to such party is deemed to override the other allegation. Butler v. Kaulback, 8 Kan. *668, *671. The evidence introduced on the trial shows that the building was not constructed in accordance with the original plans and specifications, and that the building constructed was worth about $15,000 less than the one which the original plans and specifications called for. This evidence, as we have already seen, was, under the pleadings in the case, and in the absence of any showing of fraud or mistake on the part of the contractor and the architect, wholly immaterial. In just what the supposed fraud or mistake consisted we are not informed. No details of fraud or mistake are given. But even if the pleadings had been amply sufficient upon this subject, still the evidence failed to show such fraud or mistake as would authorize an action. In this connection, see the case of Baasen v. Baehr, 7 Wis. 516. There was not the least showing of fraud by the evidence, and the only mistakes made were in supposing that *42 *the materials, the work, and the building were worth more than they really were. But as we have already said, the sureties on the bond did not agree that no mistakes of this kind should occur. They substantially agreed that the contractor should construct the building to the satisfaction of the architect, and nothing more; and in this respect their contract was fulfilled. But in any case it would probably be difficult to imagine such a mistake on the part of the architect or the board of education as would give the board of education a cause of action against the sureties on said bond. But what chance had the architect to make such mistakes as would affect injuriously the board of education? The board appointed a building committee from their own number to watch the architect, to watch the contractor, and to watch the work as it progressed. This committee was cognizant at all times of the manner in which the building was being constructed; and although they made no written report concerning the matter, yet they made verbal reports to the board, and it must therefore be presumed that the board was cognizant at all times of the manner in which the building was being constructed. Yet the board took no action in the matter except to continue to pay the contractor the 80 per cent. on the architect's estimates. Under such circumstances it must be presumed that the changes that were made in the plans and specifications, or in the work done, were made by the consent of all the parties, and, perhaps, at the instance of the board itself; and under such circumstances the board should have paid the contractor just what the work on the building was worth, taking the original contract price of the building as the proper criterion of the value thereof. Taking the pleadings and the evidence altogether, no cause of action was shown in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants; that is, take the undisputed facts as admitted by the pleadings, and the controverted facts as proved by the evidence, and all together do not constitute a cause of action against these defendants, the sureties on the contractor's bond. Upon the *43 facts thus admitted and thus proved, the judgment *should have been for the defendants. After the plaintiffs had introduced all their evidence, the defendants demurred to the evidence. The court below sustained the demurrer, dismissed the plaintiffs' action, and rendered judgment for costs in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs. We perceive no error in this. The judgment of the court below will therefore be affirmed.

SCHOOL-DISTRICT No. 13 v. STATE OF KANSAS ex rel. etc.

July Term, 1875.

School-Districts: Division of: Apportionment of Property. On August 29, 1871, the superintendent of public instruction of Pottawatomie county formed a new school-district from territory previously belonging to school-district No. 13 of said county, and designated said new district as district No. 63. Everything pertaining to the formation of said new district was regular, except that the superintendent did not, at the time of such formation, apportion the amount of the property to which each district was entitled. The school-house and other property remained in the old district. Afterwards, and on March 25, 1872, the superintendent did apportion said property, and in the apportionment determined that school-district No. 13 should pay the new district the sum of $131.10 as its proper proportion. Held, that the apportionment is valid, notwithstanding it was not made at the time the new district was formed, but was made nearly seven months afterwards.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Pottawatomie district court.

Mandamus, brought in the name of the state by school-district No. 63, to compel the school-district board of school-district No. 13 to <sup>1</sup>When taxes are levied, and a school-house built, in a certain school-district, and afterwards a portion of the territory of such school-district is detached, and allowed to remain unorganized, and outside of any school-district, for about one year, at which time such territory, along with other territory, is organized into a new school-district; and in about three years and one month thereafter the county superintendent for the first time makes an apportionment of the property, and awards that the old school-district, which retains all the property of the district, shall pay to the new school-district $697.86, as its proportion of the value of all the property retained by the old school-district: held, that such award is valid and binding upon the old school-district, notwithstanding the delay of the county superintendent in making the award, and notwithstanding the fact that the territory detached from the old school-district was not organized or placed in any other school-district for one year. School-district v. School-district, 82 Kan. 123; S. C. 4 Pac. Rep. 189. See, also, School-district v. State, 29 Kan. 57.

levy a tax on the property of the district last named, to pay the sum apportioned to district No. 63 as its proportion of the property *44 of original dis*trict No. 13. The district court, at the February term, 1873, gave judgment awarding a peremptory mandamus.

Case & Putnam and R. S. Hick, for plaintiff in error.

District No. 63 was formed under the law of 1868. Gen. St. 926, §§ 50, 51. Under these sections the superintendent was required, at the time of forming such new district, to ascertain and determine the proportion of the value of the property justly due the new district. Under section 51 the parties could have appealed at any time, if they were aggrieved. They were not aggrieved by the division of the territory, and did not appeal. Under section 15 of said act (p. 916) the superintendent gave the notice of the first meeting.

The superintendent, on the twenty-fifth of March, 1872, four days after the law of 1872 (p. 372, §§ 1, 2) took effect, ascertained and determined the proportion of the value of the property due the new district. When this was done there could be no appeal, because by section 2, c. 185, Laws 1872, the appeal must be taken within 10 days from the time of posting the notices of its formation, which was done six months before the action of the superintendent as to the distribution of the property, and the law of 1868, (section 51, supra), was repealed by section 3 of said chapter 185, Laws 1872.

As to the time for doing an act required by statute, the court has no dispensing power. Moot v. Parkhurst, 2 Hill, 372. The nature of the act to be performed, and the language used in the section, show that the designation of the time was intended as a limitation upon the power of the officer. There is nothing in the act that justifies the inference that the valuation could be made at any other and subsequent time. The language is imperative that it shall then be done, or not done at all. The rule, "thus the law is written," commends itself to the good sense of every lawyer, both for brevity and solid logic. It is dangerous to attempt to be wiser than the law, and, when its requirements are plain and positive, the courts are not called upon to give reasons why it was enacted. Dillingham v. Snow, *45 5 Mass. *557; Reeds v. Morton, 9 Mo. 878. It is admitted there are cases when the requirements may be deemed directory. But it may be safely affirmed that it can never be when the act, or the omission of it, can, by any possibility, work advantage or injury, however slight, to any one affected by it. In such case it can never be omitted. Mayhew v. Davis, 4 McLean, 213; Chandler v. Spear, 22 Vt. 388; Hanson v. Lafayette, 9 La. 546; Sharp v. Johnson, 4 Hill, 99; Corwin v. Merritt, 3 Barb. 343; Atkins v. Kinnan, 20 Wend. 249; Torrey v. Millbury, 21 Pick. 64; People v. Michigan S. R. Co., 13 Mich. 498.

Even if it were possible to construe this valuation part of the section into a directory clause merely, before the repeal of the appealing section, how could it be so considered after that, when such construction would leave the district at the mercy of the superintendent, when he could say, "The district has now no appeal, and I can do as I please?" for if his finding is to have the force of a judgment, and he can divide the territory, and wait until the legislature has repealed the right to an appeal from his decision, and then make a valuation, which is conclusive, it gives him the power to plunder one district for the benefit of another.

Merritt & Jeffries, for defendant in error.

It was the duty of the county superintendent, upon the formation of the new school-district, to ascertain and determine the proportion of the value of the school-house and other property retained by district 13 justly due to district 63; and upon his failure and refusal, or refusal, to perform such duty, mandamus would lie against him to compel the performance of this act specially enjoined as a duty resulting from his office; and if he could be compelled by mandamus to perform such act he could perform it voluntarily.

The refusal or neglect of the county superintendent to make the apportionment as provided by section 50, c. 92, Gen. St., would not give district 63 the right to appeal to the board of county commissioners. Their only remedy would be by mandamus to compel the superintendent to make the appointment. The county board would have *46 no power or authority to take any action in relation to the apportionment. *They could only inquire into the grievances of any person or persons who claimed to be injured in the formation or alteration of the district, which can refer to nothing but the territory of the district. The language of section 50 is very clear, and the apportionment of the property is no part of the formation or alteration of the district. If it is, the formation or alteration is not complete until the apportionment is made. If it were held that, to make the apportionment by the county superintendent valid, it must be done at the time of the formation or alteration of the district, then the superintendent could easily defeat the new district from its share of the school property retained by the old district. If the apportionment had been made by the superintendent at the time of the formation, and district No. 13 was injured or wronged by the action of the superintendent, its remedy was not by appeal to the county board; for the law gives that board no authority or power to interfere with or regulate the apportionment of the property. This power and authority rests entirely with the superintendent. The legislature has vested him with this power, and if it is too great it is for the legislature, and not for the courts, to apply the cure.

VALENTINE, J. On August 29, 1871, the superintendent of public instruction of Pottawatomie county formed a new school-district from territory previously belonging to school-district No. 13, of said county, and designated said new district as district No. 63. Everything pertaining to the formation of said new district seems to have been regular, except that the superintendent did not, at the time of such formation, apportion the amount of the property to which each district was entitled. The school-house and other property remained in the old district. Afterwards, and on March 25, 1872, the superintendent did apportion said property, and in the apportionment determined that school-district No. 13 should pay the new district the sum of $131.10 as its proper proportion. The only question now

*47 presented to us for consideration is *whether said apportionment is void or valid. We think it is valid, although there are some very strong reasons tending to lead to a different conclusion. The objection to the apportionment is that it was not made at the time of the creation of the new district, and this is the only objection. Of course, under the law, it should have been made at the time of the creation of the new district. Gen. St. 926, § 50. But does its validity depend upon its being made precisely at that time? Is time of the essence of the law in this respect? We think not. It is fair and just and equitable, when a school-district is divided into two new districts, that each should have its fair proportion of the value of the property belonging to the old district at the time of the division. Or, what is the same thing, it is fair, when a new district is carved out of an old one, that the new district should have its fair proportion of the property, or value thereof, which belonged to the old district at the time the new one was created. And this fairness, equity, and justice, we think, is more of the essence of the law than mere time in making the apportionment. Will it be claimed that the new district must lose its proportion of the property, or the value thereof, if the superintendent should for a single day after creating the new district fail or neglect to make the apportionment? If neither of the districts, nor any person having any interest in either of the districts, has any right to appeal from the action of the superintendent in making or failing to make any apportionment, then there would seem to be but little reason for requiring that the apportionment should be made on any particular day, provided it be made within a reasonable time after the new district is created. And the statute (Gen. St. 926, § 51; Laws 1872, p. 372, § 2) does not, in terms, seem to give the right of appeal to either of the districts as a corporate entity, but merely to some person or persons who shall feel aggrieved. The word "person" or "persons," as used in the statute, may, however, include the corporation as well as real persons; for the corporation itself is in one sense a person,—an artificial person. And the right

*48 of individual *persons to appeal may be confined to personal grievances alone, and may not be extended to grievances which directly affect only the district as a corporation, and which indirectly affect all the individuals alike, one as much as another. As to private individuals championing the rights of the public, see Bridge Co. v. Wyandotte Co., 10 Kan. *326, *381, and cases there cited; Miller v. Town of Palermo, 12 Kan. *14.

Besides, a question may be raised under the statute whether the right to appeal extends merely "to the formation or alteration of a school-district," and no further, or whether it extends as well to all matters incidental "to the formation or alteration of a school-district." For the purpose of this case, we shall assume that the right of appeal exists, and has existed, to the fullest extent, ever since said new district was created. It would seem unreasonable that the legislature should not give an appeal in cases of this kind; and, with a liberal construction of their language, probably, they have given it. Then, if we are correct so far, we think it follows that the superintendent, after he created said new district, had the right, at any time, and of his own volition, to make said apportionment; that the new district had the right, at any time after the failure to make said apportionment, to compel him to do so by an action of mandamus; that any person or persons feeling aggrieved by such failure had a right to appeal to the board of county commissioners, (Gen. St. 926, § 51;) and, after the superintendent made the apportionment, any person or persons who felt aggrieved thereby had a right to appeal. If any right to an appeal from an apportionment has ever existed, it is because the apportionment is incidental to the creation of the new district, and the alteration of the old. And if the apportionment may be made at any time after the new district has been created, it is also because of its connection with creation of the new and the alteration of the old. And therefore, as the right to make the apportionment follows (whenever made) as an incident to the creation and alteration of the two districts, the right of appeal also follows

*49 (provided it exists in any case of *apportionment) as incidental to such creation and alteration, and may be exercised by any person feeling aggrieved by the apportionment whenever the same is made. If there should be any fraud in the apportionment, we should also think that the district defrauded would have a remedy, either as plaintiff or defendant, by a proceeding in the nature of a bill in equity.

With reference to taking an appeal from said apportionment, it has been said that the law was so amended in 1872 (just four days before the apportionment was made) that an appeal would be impossible in this particular case. Laws 1872, pp. 372, 373, §§ 2, 3. This may be true, if the law of 1872 is to govern; but, under section 1 of the act concerning the construction of statutes, (Gen. St. 999, § 1, sub. 1,) we think the law of 1872 would not govern in this case, but that the provisions of the previous laws would govern. Willetts v. Jeffries, 5 Kan. *473; Gilleland v. Schuyler, 9 Kan. *569; State v. Boyle, 10 Kan. *113; Morgan v. Chapple, Id. *224; State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. *32; Jenness v. Cutler, 12 Kan. *500, *511, *512; Ayres v. Probasco, 14 Kan. *175.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

L. C. CHALLISS v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF ATCHISON Co. and others.

July Term, 1875.

1. Injunction: Temporary: Motion to Dissolve: Hearing. Where a preliminary injunction has been granted without notice, a motion to dissolve may, upon notice, be made at any time before the trial, and this notwithstanding a demurrer has been previously filed.<sup>1</sup>

2. Taxation: Restraining Collection: Equity. Equity will not *50 in*terfere to restrain by injunction the collection of taxes where the property is subject to taxation, the tax legal, and the valuation not excessive, simply because of irregularities in the tax proceedings. And this rule applies alike to general and special taxes, and whether the application be to restrain a sale or enjoin the execution of a deed.<sup>2</sup>

Error from Atchison district court.

Injunction brought by Challiss to restrain the board of county commissioners, the county treasurer, and county clerk from transferring certain tax-sale certificates held by Atchison county on his property, and to enjoin the county clerk from issuing tax deeds thereon. The district judge granted a temporary injunction. The defendants thereafter filed a demurrer. In this condition the case passed two regular terms of the district court. In January, 1874, defendants filed two motions to dissolve,—one going to all the property, the other to a part only. The district judge sustained the second motion.

W. W. Guthrie, for plaintiff.

We insist that it was error to hear defendants' motion to dissolve while the case stood on their demurrer to plaintiff's petition. High, Inj. § 879. There were twenty-two certificates, and on each a separate deed was authorized. The time had nearly expired for deeds. The law made it the duty of the treasurer to certify to the clerk, and he to assign, and then issue deeds. In a brief time a great number of tax deeds would cover plaintiff's property, each being a cloud, and requiring many suits to remove. We insist that then was the time to enforce his remedy. Should deeds issue in case at bar, they would constitute several clouds, and would be set aside in an action to remove such clouds. And however void such deeds, such remedy exists. Dean v. City of Madison, 9 Wis. 402; Knowlton v. County of Rock, Id. 410. In these two cases injunction was allowed to restrain making a tax deed; and in Agawam Bank v. Strever, 18 N. Y. 510, and Key City G. L. Co. v. Munsell, 19 Iowa, 305, injunction was allowed to prevent a sheriff's deed on a sale on execution not against the owner. Why not, for like reason, *enjoin, where redemption existed, the issuance of a certificate of sale, and its assignment in many different parts? The office of injunction is the protection of jeopardized rights in real property, and this must be equally so whether threatened by public officers or individuals. Here it is not sought to restrain the collection of a tax. Such tax was merged in a sale years ago, as a note merges in a judgment recovered on it. Were the certificates held by an individual, it would not be questioned that the public would have no interest in the controversy; for the law clearly is that in all cases where courts will interfere to remove a cloud, on a like state of facts the courts will enjoin acts which necessarily result in clouding a title. Tucker v. Kenniston, 47 N. H. 267; Pettit v. Shepherd, 5 Paige, 493; Scott v. Onderdonk, 14 N. Y. 9; Christie v. Hale, 46 Ill. 117; Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127; Fowler v. City of St. Joseph, 37 Mo. 238; Leslie v. City of St. Louis, 47 Mo. 474. Here is no case of proceedings to embarrass the collection of the public revenues. Every step to collect these taxes has been taken; now there only remains, upon expiration of time for redemption after sale, those steps requisite to final confiscation. Is it more or less hurtful to the property owner, or more or less beneficial to the public, after sale, that the certificates are in the hands of individuals, or held by the county? But, if so, specific provisions have been made for such cases. Chapter 196, Laws 1872. Or is it more or less the collection of a tax, that suit is brought now, or brought to set aside the deeds which we now ask to enjoin?

<sup>2</sup>This case followed, Stebbins v. Challiss, post, *59; Hagaman v. County of Cloud, 19 Kan. 394. See Ottawa v. Barney, 10 Kan. 206, and note. A lot-owner, whose lot has been sold for taxes, and who has neither paid nor offered to pay the taxes, cannot, when the lot was subject to taxation, the levy legal, and the valuation not excessive, maintain an action to quiet title against the holder of the tax-sale certificate. Knox v. Dunn, 22 Kan. 683. Before a suit is commenced to set aside a tax-sale certificate, the plaintiff should pay or tender all taxes embraced therein which the public records show are valid, and which he is under obligation to pay. Miller v. Ziegler, 31 Kan. 417; S. C. 2 Pac. Rep. 601. See, also, Pritchard v. Madren, 24 Kan. 486; McKeen v. Haxtun, 25 Kan. 696.

This case stands not on "mere irregularities," but on substantial defects, creating between this property and the tax deeds sought to be enjoined from being placed thereon legal gullies that cannot be jumped or bridged with the plea of "the public good." "Mere irregularities," within section 113 of the tax law, are only such as without such provision courts of equity would disregard. Weller v. City of St. Paul, 5 Minn. 100, (Gil. 70;) Blackw. Tax Titles, 82. There was no notice given of expiration of time limited for redemption, as required by section 110 of tax law. Plaintiff was entitled to that notice to prepare to avoid the forfeiture of his property. Without it he cannot be in default. The object of that provision is to

*52 afford to property *owners "at least four months" within which to make preparations to save their property. Can the public take his property finally, and vest the title in another in entire disregard of that positive essential provision? Plaintiff has not waived any right, for at no previous time could he have acted. Davis v. Farnes, 26 Tex. 296; Brady v. Offutt, 19 La. Ann. 184. But all tax proceedings under ex parte provisions are stricti juris, and rights are not divested only when the law has been fully complied with. The rule of judicial proceedings does not apply.

S. H. Glenn and D. Martin, for defendants.

The county could not set up the taxes in an action like this, as the holder of a tax deed may do under section 117, Gen. St. 1057; and the certain result of granting an injunction would be to deprive the government of its revenue. That equity cannot be invoked for such a purpose, see Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Frary, 22 Ill. 34.

Plaintiff's counsel contended that a motion to vacate should not be entertained while the case stood on general demurrer; but, whatever may be the rule in the absence of statute, the injunction in this case having been granted without notice, we had a right to apply for its vacation "at any time before the trial." Civil Code, § 250.

BREWER, J. This is an action to restrain the issue of sale certificates, and the execution of tax deeds, upon a number of lots belonging to plaintiff in the city of Atchison. It seems to us that this case is pretty fully covered by decisions already made in this court, and that there is scarcely any new question in it for consideration. A preliminary matter is, however, thus presented: Upon the filing of a petition a temporary injunction was granted. The defendants filed a demurrer to this petition, and thereafter a motion to dissolve the injunction. Now, the contention of counsel is that it was error to hear defendant's motion to dissolve while the case stood on demurrer to the petition. Whatever may be the *rule elsewhere, or might be the rule here, independent of statute, we think this closes the question. Section 250 of the Civil Code provides that, "if the injunction be granted without notice, [and this was so granted,] the defendant, at any time before the trial, may apply, upon notice to the court in which the action is brought, or any judge thereof, to vacate or modify the same." The application here was not to restrain a sale for taxes, but the issue of sale certificates and execution of tax deeds. Upon this counsel says: "Here is no case of proceedings to embarrass the collection of the public revenues. Every step to collect these taxes has been taken. Now, there only remains, upon expiration of time for redemption after sale, those steps requisite to final confiscation."

As the property in controversy was, for lack of other bidders, all struck off to the county, and not a dollar of money has yet passed into the county treasury, it would seem that any stay of proceedings would most seriously interfere with the collection of the public revenues. But this question has already been before us, and decided. City of Lawrence v. Killam, 11 Kan. *499. It was there held that "equity will not interfere to restrain, by injunction, the collection of taxes, when the property is subject to taxation, the tax legal, and the valuation not excessive, simply because of irregularities in the tax proceedings. And this rule applies alike to general and special taxes, and whether the application be to restrain a sale or enjoin the execution of a deed." That decision disposes, not only of this question, but also of nearly every question made by counsel.

The objections to the tax proceedings are stated by plaintiff as follows: (1) That no due assessment and valuation of each parcel of real estate within the township and city of Atchison was made for the year 1869, and returned duly verified, etc., before June 1, 1869, nor was plaintiff's real property so assessed and returned in a book, etc., as required by law; (2) that the pretended assessment was made for 1869 without the assessor having received the assessment roll of 1868, before March 1, 1869; (3) that more than half the taxes *54 were percentage levied *by the mayor and councilmen of the city of Atchison, and the same were not certified to the county clerk before August 15, 1869, or at any other time, for 1869; (4) that the treasurer did not cause notice to be published stating the amount of taxes, etc., on each hundred-dollars valuation, and that he or his deputy would attend at the places of holding elections to receive the taxes, nor did he or his deputy attend in the First, Third, or Fourth wards, etc., to receive taxes for 1869; (5) that the sale was made without notice thereof being published for four consecutive weeks, commencing between March 1 and 10, 1869, describing the land and lots as on the tax-roll, etc., with a notice that so much of each tract or lot as might be necessary would, on the first Tuesday of May, etc., be sold at public auction at his office, for the taxes, etc., nor was such notice posted up for four consecutive weeks, etc.; (6) that the county treasurer did not, prior to February 1, 1873, cause to be published in a newspaper any list of unredeemed lands and lots sold for taxes of 1869, describing the same, etc., with a notice specifying the days limited for the redemption thereof.

Now, it is unnecessary to determine how these defects would be regarded in an action at law, in which the validity of a deed based upon these proceedings was involved. It may be that they would defeat the title, either before or after the running of the statute of limitations, or it may be that they would be considered mere irregularities such as are covered by section 113 of the tax law. Gen. St. 1057. The principles which would control in such an action are entirely different from those which obtain here. Here the question is whether, in equity and good conscience, the plaintiff ought to have paid these taxes; and to this question the answer must manifestly be in the affirmative. He makes no pretense that the property was not subject to taxation. Nothing is intimated to impeach the justice of the tax. True, he says that more than half was levied by the authorities of the city of Atchison, and not duly transmitted to the county clerk; but he does not question the right of those authorities to make the levy, or that it was in the slightest degree in excess of the amount absolutely necessary, or for any illegal or improper purpose. Nor does he show any excessive or unfair valuation, or valuation by the wrong officer. The objections run to the manner in which that valuation was reached,—to alleged omissions and deviations from the statutory mode of procedure, and not to the result. Thus for aught that appears in his petition, his property ought to have been charged with these taxes; the taxes were legal, just, and fair; and the valuation of his property, made by the proper party, exactly what it ought to have been. It seems as though the mere statement of these propositions was enough to show that he makes no case for the interference of a court of equity.

The judgment will be affirmed.

W. R. STEBBINS and another v. L. C. CHALLISS.

July Term, 1875.

1. Taxation: Restraining Execution of Tax Deeds. The fact that the sale certificates have been disposed of by the county, and belong to individuals, will not change the rule laid down in the cases of City of Lawrence v. Killam, 11 Kan. *499, and Challiss v. Commissioners Atchison Co., ante, *49, in reference to restraining the execution of tax deeds.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———: Assessment of Lands as Town Lots. Where the plaintiff was the owner of a tract in the city of Atchison, liable to assessment and taxation as a single tract of so many acres, and portions of it were, by descriptions through which they can be identified, assessed, and taxed as lots surrounded by streets and alleys, held, that an injunction ought to issue restraining the collection of taxes upon such assessment.<sup>2</sup>

Error from Atchison district court.

Injunction, brought by Challiss, as plaintiff, against Benjamin B. Gale, county clerk, and Stebbins, as defendants. The petition alleged that Challiss was the owner of 21 certain lots in Challiss' addition to the city of Atchison, describing *them; and also the owner of certain real estate in Spring Garden addition, which he alleges was formerly divided into lots and blocks, describing them, but that these last-mentioned lots and blocks, prior to 1869, had been vacated by the county board; that the county treasurer had advertised that the time for redemption of lands and lots sold would expire between May 3 and June 27, 1873, three years from the several sales, etc.; that Stebbins claimed to hold tax certificates for said lots in Challiss' addition and Spring Garden addition, and was about to apply to the county clerk for a tax deed thereon, which would vest the title thereto in Stebbins, or cast a cloud over the title, etc. The petition then says "that each and all of such certificates of sale are irregular, null, and void, and do not authorize the execution of any tax deed or deeds thereon, for, among others, the following reasons, to-wit," (setting up the six grounds mentioned in the opinion of the court in the preceding case of Challiss v. Commissioners of Atchison Co., ante, *53.) Upon this petition, properly verified, Challiss applied for and obtained a preliminary injunction, restraining the county clerk from issuing tax deeds to Stebbins on any of the tax certificates held by him on sales of lots in the two additions above mentioned. The defendants appeared, and demurred. Afterwards and in January, 1874, the defendants, on motion and notice, applied to the district judge, at chambers, for an order vacating the injunction as to all the property, in both additions, which motion was by said judge overruled and denied.

It is not claimed by Challiss that his lots and land are not subject to assessment and taxation, but his whole case is based upon "irregularities" on the part of the several officers in the proceedings to enforce the collection of taxes. Challiss has not offered to pay *57 any part of these taxes, but permitted *the real estate to be sold in 1870, and the purchaser to pay the taxes for 1870, 1871, and 1872, without objection; and not until a few days before the deed is to be issued does he object, and then he comes into court and invokes the interposition of equity in his behalf. By remaining quiet, Challiss was getting his taxes paid; but he must not permit a deed to be issued, for then, if the deed was set aside, he would have to pay the purchaser the taxes, costs, and interest provided by the statute. Section 117, Tax Law. When a person seeks equity, he must do equity. He must come into court with clean hands, and without laches or delay.

The decisions of this and other courts have settled all there is in this case. This action cannot be maintained unless the tax is illegal, and the execution of a tax deed is a proceeding to enforce the collection of the same. Civil Code, § 253. On what ground can it be claimed that the tax is illegal? It is not claimed that the property is exempt from taxation. It is not claimed that the state, county, or city had no power to levy taxes. It is not even claimed that the assessment or taxation is greater by reason of the real estate in Spring Garden addition being described in lots and blocks, and not as a whole. The only objection made to the city tax is that it was not properly certified to the county clerk. The petition alleges that the tax was made on the "real and personal property in such city." There is nothing alleged in this petition that renders the tax illegal and void. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 737; Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. *210, *228.

Mere irregularities do not render a tax illegal or void. Gen. St. 1057, § 113; Missouri River, etc., R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. *225; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Russell, 8 Kan. *558, *561; Smith v. County of Leavenworth, 9 Kan. *296, *300; Missouri River, etc., R. Co. v. Blake, Id. *489; Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1; Mills v. Gleason, 11 Wis. 470. Courts of equity will not interfere unless the collection of the tax would be inequitable and unjust. Missouri River, etc., R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. *210, *228; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Russell, 8 Kan. *558; Parker v. Challiss, 9 Kan. *155; Smith v. County of Leavenworth, Id. *296; Missouri River, etc., R. Co. v. Blake, Id. *489; Warden v. County of Fond du Lac, 14 Wis. 618; High, Inj. § 355. Plaintiff must tender what is right and equitable before he is entitled to an injunction. Missouri River, etc., R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. *210; Merrill v. Humphrey, 11 Amer. Law Reg. 208; Bond v. Kenosha, 17 Wis. 284; Evansville v. Pfisterer, 34 Ind. 36; Lafayette v. Fowler, Id. 141; Smith v. Pacific M. S. S. Line, 1 Cal. 455; Kellogg v. Ely, 15 Ohio St. 64; 2 Story, Eq. Jur.

*58 § 959a. The plaintiff *must not have been guilty of laches or delay. He should have enjoined the levy of the tax, or, at the latest, the sale. He cannot wait until the relief asked would work an injury to the other party. High, Inj. §§ 7, 397; Hill. Inj. § 43; Tash v. Adams, 10 Cush. 252.

It is difficult to understand the position taken by defendant in error as to the status of Spring Garden addition. He refers to a pretended vacation, yet he alleges that the property is situate in the First, Third, and Fourth wards of the city. If this addition was legally vacated, then the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  section 7, township 6, range 21, was no part of the city, but an outside tract of 80 acres of land; and a tax deed on "lot 10, block 3, Spring Garden addition," would be no cloud upon the title of the 80-acre tract. If it was outside of the city, it was not injuriously affected by city taxes, for they were levied only on the property in the city. Even if the property should have been assessed in acres, it does not appear from the petition that the taxes would have been less if they had been so levied. And if the tract of land was in the city, a tax deed on lots and blocks that had no existence would cast no cloud upon the title of the tract of land. Under the decisions of this court, the granting of an injunction to restrain the collection of a tax, for the irregularities complained of here, would be held inequitable, and against public policy.

W. W. Guthrie, for Challiss, defendant in error, submitted the same views presented in his brief in the preceding case of Challiss v. County of Atchison, ante, *50, and he added the following:

One other question is here presented as to the Spring Garden addition lots. Before the assessment for the tax for which the sale was made this property had ceased to be lots, and was only taxable as acres. Section 2, c. 128, Laws 1864, p. 241. There was, then, no assessment; the attempt made was a nullity. Henry v. Mitchell, 32 Mo. 512; Abbott v. Lindenhauer, 42 Mo. 162; Gen. St. 1032, §§ 32, 36, 37, 39, 40. Challiss was only required to inquire \*59 \*for and to pay taxes on N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , section 7, township 6, range 21; yet here are patches of clouds to be scattered over his land, absolutely without any warning which he had any right to expect. Neither, after vacation, would such property be within the city, and subject to city taxation. It never was in the city except as an addition. Section 1 of act of February 12, 1858, defined the boundaries of the city; and section 1 of act February 11, 1859, makes additions, after plat filed, a part of the city, and as such subject to taxation. This tract went into the city by virtue of said act of 1859, when it ceased to be acres, and became lots; and went out of the city by virtue of said chapter 128, Laws 1864, when it ceased to be lots, and became acres. It was an addition only by virtue of the filing a plat, and, of course, as it rested on this fact, it existed within the city no longer than the fact existed.

BREWER, J. Many of the questions in this case are similar to those in the case of Challiss v. County of Atchison, ante, *50, just decided. They need not, therefore, be considered here. One principal difference is that here the sale certificates were held by the plaintiff in error Stebbins, and it may with more propriety be said that an injunction will not "embarrass the collection of the public revenues." The county has received the money, and the controversy is one simply between two individuals,—one seeking to free his property from an apparent incumbrance, and the other seeking to perfect a title to that property,—a title which he has acquired for but a small fraction of the value of the property. Yet, notwithstanding the difference in the positions which the defendants in the two cases occupy, the same decision must be made in each, for the claim of the plaintiff in each rests upon the same foundation. It matters little what wrong a defendant may be doing, unless the plaintiff's claim is equitable; and in each of these cases the plaintiff, without paying a cent towards the public revenues, is asking a court of equity to release him from *60 all obligations to pay. And *though the county is no longer the holder of these certificates, yet, if this action be sustained, it will be compelled to refund to the defendant the money he has paid for them; so that the ultimate result would be to release the plaintiff from his share of the public burdens, to deprive the county of this portion of the public revenues, and to cast a so much heavier burden on the other citizens and property holders. True, something might be done towards avoiding this result by a reassessment, levy, and sale, if authorized by the legislature; but, owing to the delay and expense, this would only be a partial avoidance.

One other question is presented, which affects a part of the property only. At one time there had been what was known as the "Spring Garden" addition of the city of Atchison. This was duly laid off into lots and blocks, and some of the tax certificates held by the defendant were upon lots in this addition. But before any of these tax proceedings were had this addition had been duly vacated, so that the lots and blocks had ceased to exist. It is insisted that by the vacation this addition ceased to be a part of the city, or subject to city taxation. On the twelfth of February, 1858, an act was passed by the territorial legislature concerning the city of Atchison, by the first section of which the boundaries of the city were defined. The property in controversy was outside of those boundaries. On the eleventh of February, 1859, another act was passed, in the first section of which it was provided, among other things, that "all additions which have been, or may hereafter be, made, shall become and be a part of said city, after the plat thereof shall have been filed, as required by law, twelve months, and shall be liable for taxes as other city property after the commencement of the first fiscal year of said city thereafter." By this act this addition became a part of the city. And the act provides for no temporary or conditional annexation. The ground platted is not to be a part of the city so long only as it remains platted, but it is to become and be a part of the city permanently. The act provides

*61 a way in, none out of, the city. But in *1864 an act was passed providing for the vacation of town-sites and additions, (Laws 1864, p. 241,) and in that it is declared that, in case of a vacation, "all surveys for the subdivision of such lands are expunged from record, and declared null and of no avail in any court of this state, and the lands hereby restored to their original condition under the surveys of the United States government, as if no platting for a town had taken place." This language is very broad, and it may possibly sustain the claim of counsel; but we do not care to decide the question, as we deem it unnecessary for the disposition of this case; for though this still be a part of the city of Atchison, and subject to its taxation, we think the injunction must, as to it, be sustained. In the second section of the act last cited it is provided that after the vacation the "land shall be as if never a town site, and shall be taxed as parcels of land by appropriate descriptions in acres." These lots were assessed in disregard of this plain and positive requirement, and it is an error which involves something more than a mere irregularity of description. It must be presumed that the assessment was fairly made as an assessment of lots with streets and alleys surrounding them, and the fact that these streets and alleys exist, or are supposed to exist, is an element which enters into and forms a part of, and to that extent increases, the valuation. How materially they did affect the valuation in this particular instance we cannot say. Perhaps it cannot, in the very nature of things, be shown. The elements which enter into and determine the value are so essentially different in the case of town lots and open fields that it seems as though they were almost incapable of exact pecuniary measurement. As the case at present stands, there is no attempt at it. More than that, the ground covered by the streets and alleys, being then private property, and subject to taxation, may yet be reached and compelled to bear its proportion of the public burdens; for though the supposed streets and alleys may have increased the value of the supposed lots, yet they do not thereby become themselves exempt from taxation. We *62 think, therefore, the district judge *did not err in overruling the motion to vacate the temporary injunction as to these lots.

The case may be thus summed up: The plaintiff is the owner of a certain tract in the city of Atchison which is liable to assessment and taxation as a single tract of so many acres. Portions of it, by descriptions through which they can be identified, are assessed and taxed as lots surrounded by streets and alleys. Such assessment includes, and is based upon, elements of value which do not exist in the case of unplatted ground, and which, so far as now appears, have no exact pecuniary measurement. The supposed existence of streets and alleys, while it increases the valuation of the ground assessed as lots, does not exempt from taxation the ground covered by the streets and alleys, which may hereafter be assessed and taxed. The assessment, therefore, is both irregular and unjust. It presents a case for equitable interference.

The order of the district judge refusing to dissolve the injunction will therefore be reversed, except as to the lots in the so-called "Spring Garden Addition," and as to them it will be affirmed. The costs will be divided.

GEO. W. McMILLEN, Co. Clerk, etc., v. THOS. H. BUTLER.

July Term, 1875.

Officers: Action against Public Officers to Restrain Them from Removing Their Offices, etc., when not Maintainable. Where a private individual brings an action against the county officers for the purpose of obtaining an injunction to restrain such officers from removing their respective offices from the town of O. to the town of E. during the pendency of a certain suit in the supreme court, and in his petition alleges, in substance, that he is a resident, a citizen, an elector, and a tax-payer of said town of O.; that prior to the commencement of this suit

he commenced an action against the county clerk to perpetually enjoin *63 him from moving his office from *said town of O. to said town of E.; that in said action a temporary injunction was granted; that on the final hearing of said action judgment was rendered against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant, and said town of E. was declared to be the county-seat; and that the plaintiff then took the case to the supreme court, where it was still pending when this present action was commenced: held, that said present action cannot be maintained.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Neosho district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

John T. Voss, for plaintiffs in error.

W. S. Carroll, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought by Butler against McMillen and the other county officers, to enjoin said officers from moving their respective offices from the town of Osage Mission to the town of Erie, Neosho county, pending a certain suit in the supreme court. The petition below states, in substance, that Butler, the plaintiff below, "is a resident of the town of Osage Mission, and a taxpayer, a citizen, and elector of said county of Neosho; that Butler had previously commenced an action in the district court of said county against said McMillen, county clerk of said county, to perpetually enjoin him from moving his office from said town of Osage Mission to said town of Erie; that a temporary injunction was granted in that case; that the case was finally tried upon its merits; that Butler was defeated in the action,—the judgment therein being rendered against Butler and in favor of McMillen, and deciding that Erie was the county-seat of said county; that Butler then took the case *64 to the supreme court, where it is (at the commencement of this suit) now pending; that the co-defendants of said McMillen are privies in law to him, and as such are bound by the pendency of said temporary injunction;" "that each and all of said defendants are bound to take notice of the pendency of said proceedings, and the appeal therein to the supreme court;" and Butler thereupon prays in this suit for an injunction restraining all the defendants except McMillen from moving their respective offices, as aforesaid, until said case of Butler against McMillen shall be finally decided in the supreme court. That case has been decided in this court, (Butler v. McMillen, 13 Kan. *385;) but the decision of that case will not affect the present decision of this case. The defendants demurred to said petition on various grounds, among which was the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court below overruled said demurrer, and the defendants below now bring the case to this court.

It is difficult to understand upon what principle it is supposed that this action may be maintained. There is no statute authorizing such an action; and we do not think that it can be maintained under any general principles of law or equity. There is a statute authorizing suits to contest county-seat and other elections, (Laws 1871, p. 190;) but this action was not brought under that statute. The plaintiff in this case does not pretend to found his rights upon any election. He does not allege, except possibly remotely and inferentially, that any election was ever held in Neosho county; he does not at all allege that any election was illegal or void; he does not, except by a very remote inference, allege that Osage Mission ever became the county-seat by virtue of any election or otherwise; and, above all, he does not attempt in this action to contest any election. The substance of his petition is that at one time he filed a petition in another case, in which he alleged that Osage Mission was the county-seat of Neosho county; that there had been an election under which the county commissioners had declared that Erie was the county-seat of said

 *65 county; that under said election said *McMillen was about to move his office of county clerk to Erie; but either that said election was void, or that Osage Mission had become the county-seat thereunder and by virtue thereof. But we do not understand that the plaintiff below claims that he brought his action under said statute, and it is not necessary, therefore, to say anything further with reference thereto. The plaintiff is not a public officer, prosecuting for the benefit of the public; and he does not show that he has any special or private interest in the subject-matter of the action which calls for any special interposition of the courts of justice for his particular benefit. Merely being a resident, a citizen, an elector, or a tax-payer, or all combined, does not authorize a private individual to summon the public officers into the courts of justice to answer for their official conduct. Bridge Co. v. Wyandotte Co., 10 Kan. *326, *331, and cases there cited; Miller v. Town of Palermo, 12 Kan. *14. His interest must be private and special in order to invoke the special intervention of the courts in his favor.

But under no view that we may take of the circumstances, should the courts interfere in this particular case. If the judgment of the court below in the case of Butler v. McMillen is right, and in the absence of anything to the contrary we must presume that it is right, then no new injunction should be granted to restrain the county officers from moving their offices to Erie, for the court in that case determined that Erie was the county-seat. But even if said judgment is wrong, still if the theory of the plaintiff, that all the county officers are in privity with each other, that all are bound by said temporary injunction, and that said temporary injunction is still in force, is correct, then the plaintiff does not need any further injunction, and the injunction should be refused in this case for that reason alone. Why should the plaintiff want two injunctions against the same persons for the same thing? It will be remembered that the injunction prayed for in this case is only to restrain the officers until the other case can be decided in the supreme court.

JOHN R. SWALLOW v. CHESTER THOMAS, Jr., Sheriff, etc.

July Term, 1875.

Taxation: Partnership Property, where Listed. In 1872, S. and A. were partners in an unincorporated bank in Marion county. S. resided in Shawnee, and A. in Marion, county. A. was the cashier and principal accounting officer. As such, he listed the entire personal property of the bank for taxation in Marion county. Held, that this listing must be sustained, and that the entire property was taxable in that county. [Ottawa Co. v. Nelson, 19 Kan. 242.]

Error from Shawnee district court.

Swallow, as plaintiff, filed his petition against Thomas, as sheriff of Shawnee county, as defendant. The petition stated that on the first day of March, 1872, the plaintiff and one Peter Aller were the owners of a banking business in Marion county, as partners, with a capital of about $6,000, of which said sum they had invested $2,500 in real estate, for the purpose of carrying on their business; that on the said first day of March, 1872, and for eight years preceding, said plaintiff had continuously resided and domiciled in the city of Topeka, Shawnee county; that in April, 1872, he had duly listed, for said year, all personal property which by law he was required to list, either on his own account or on behalf of others, duly verified, and delivered the same to the assessor of the city of Topeka, and that he had paid to the treasurer of Shawnee county all taxes levied on said personal property assessment. The petition then alleges that the said Aller, or some other person to the said Swallow unknown, in May, 1872, in the name of "J. R. Swallow & Co.," unlawfully made out and delivered a pretended list of personal property in Doyle township, Marion county, and unlawfully returned the same to the township assessor of said township of Doyle; "that the sum of $17,240, included in said list, is fraudulent and false, except as hereinbefore stated, and that the said list was so made out and returned without the knowledge and consent of the said Swallow." On said assessment there was levied against J. R. Swallow & Co. taxes to amount of $768 by officers of Marion county. These taxes remaining unpaid, except the sum of $95.75 paid by some one unknown to Swallow, the treasurer of Marion county, in June, 1873, issued and transmitted to Thomas, as sheriff of Shawnee county, a warrant for the collection of the sum of $729.10. This action is brought to enjoin the collection of said Marion county taxes. The defendant demurred to the petition, which demurrer was sustained by the district court at the December term, 1873.

Guthrie & Brown, for plaintiff in error.

This case is settled in the case of Griffith v. Carter, 8 Kan. *570. The maxim of the common law was mobilia personam sequuntur. The domicile of the owner draws to it his personal estate, whatever it may happen to be. Section 8, Tax Law; State v. Matthews, 10 Ohio St. 437; City of Baltimore v. Stirling, 29 Md. 48; Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, Alb. Law J. May 9, 1874, p. 305.

L. F. Keller and Frank Doster, for defendant in error.

Aller, the cashier and principal and only accounting officer of the banking firm of Swallow & Co., the managing partner thereof, who had charge of, and personal supervision over the business of the firm where the property of the bank was, and where the only business office of the firm was located, was the proper person to list the whole undivided interest of the firm in the township wherein he *68      *resided, and at the place where the business of the partnership was transacted. The facts in the case of Griffith v. Carter, cited by plaintiff, are so unlike the facts here, that said case does not govern.

BREWER, J. In the year 1872 plaintiff and one Peter Aller were the owners, as partners, of the Marion County Bank, an unincorporated bank in the town of Florence and county of Marion. Plaintiff resided in Shawnee, and Peter Aller in Marion, county. The latter was the cashier and principal accounting officer. As such, he listed the entire personal property of the bank for taxation in the county of Marion. Was it properly all taxable in that county? Or only the interest of Aller there, and the interest of plaintiff in the county of his residence? This is the question presented in this case; and it is a question involving merely the construction of our statutes; for of the power of the legislature to separate, for the purposes of taxation, the situs of personal property from the domicile of its owner, there can be no doubt, (Tappan v. National Bank, 19 Wall. 490;) nor any of the fact that, unless it has so separated it, it is taxable at his domicile. This general doctrine of the common law, expressed as it is by the maxim, mobilia personam sequuntur, finds also recognition in our tax law: "All personal property shall be listed and taxed each year in the township or city in which the person charged with the tax thereon resided on the first day of March." Gen. St. p. 1023, § 8. This clause came up for consideration in the case of Griffith v. Carter, 8 Kan. *565. There the plaintiffs, partners in business, all resided in Douglas county, but had a stock of goods in Coffey county in charge of an employe. The former was held the situs of the stock for taxation. A better rule has been since established by the legislature. Laws 1874, p. 210.

Counsel for plaintiff mainly rely upon this case of Griffith v. Carter, and consider it decisive; and if the clause of the statute quoted *69      was the only one bearing upon the question, *there would be no room for doubt. But in section 7 we find this provision: "The property of persons or corporations, whose assets are in the hands of receivers, shall be listed by such receivers, and the property of every other corporation, company, or firm, subject to taxation under this act, shall be listed by the principal accounting officer, or by an agent or partner thereof." This seems to contemplate that the property of a firm should be listed as a whole, and not that each partner should list his property separately. The partnership is here regarded, as it is for so many other purposes in the law, as distinct from the individuals composing it,—as if it were a third person; and it, as a single owner of so much property, is compelled to list the same for taxation. Corporations, companies, and firms are placed upon the same basis. They are treated as separate, independent owners of property. The same thing appears elsewhere in the tax law. See sections 4, 5, 6, and 8, in which mention is frequently made of "person, company, or corporation." Now, effect must be given if possible to every portion of a law. By sustaining the listing made by Aller we do in this case give effect to both provisions quoted. The property of the firm was listed as an entirety; it was listed by the principal accounting officer, and a partner; and it was listed in the township in which the person charged with the tax resided, for each member of a firm is chargeable with its entire debts. In fact, a partner's interest in the partnership property is a right to his share of whatever remains after all the partnership debts are paid. The whole of this tax was chargeable upon Aller, and might have been collected from his separate property. The firm, too, so far as it had a residence distinct from the residence of the different partners, resided in Marion county. This case differs from that of Griffith v. Carter in this: that all the partners there resided, and the firm of Griffith, Duncan & Duncan, which owned the goods, was located in Douglas county, so that there was no one in Coffey county who could properly be said to be chargeable with the tax, or whose property would be at all diminished by its payment. Listing the *property in Douglas county, they listed the property of the firm as a whole, listed it by the partners, and listed it in the township in which all the persons charged with the tax resided. The difference is obvious and vital. Upon the facts as stated, while the case is not free from doubt, we think the listing by Aller must be sustained, and the judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

CITY OF INDEPENDENCE v. T. P. TROUVALLE.

July Term, 1875.

1. Municipal Corporations: City Liable to Marshal for Services Rendered under Ordinance. Where an ordinance of a city of the second class, in 1872, prohibited dogs from running at large in any public place in said city unless the owner of each dog should first pay to the city a tax, and should cause a collar and check (which were to be furnished by the city) to be worn by each dog, and said ordinance made it the duty of the city marshal to kill and bury every dog found running at large in violation of said ordinance, and provided that the marshal should receive from the city, as compensation for his services in this respect, one dollar for each and every dog killed and buried, held, that the marshal has a right to recover from the city, in a proper action therefor, one dollar for each and every dog he has actually killed and buried in accordance with the provisions of said ordinance.
2. ———: Ordinances: How Proven. It was not error for the court below to permit, in such an action, the ordinance to be proved by the introduction of the original ordinance book of said city.
8. ———: Judgments against: How Collected. Where no provision is made by statute for the collection of judgments against cities of the second class, it would seem that an execution may issue on such judgments.

Error from Montgomery district court.

At the December term, 1873, of the district court, Trouvalle, as plaintiff, recovered a judgment against the City of Independence for $168, and costs, and execution was awarded on the judgment.

Nathan Cree, for plaintiff in error.

That portion of the ordinance which gives the city marshal one dollar for each dog killed and buried is void. The power to give compensation for killing dogs cannot be derived from the authority conferred upon the city to regulate the compensation of the city marshal. Laws 1872, p. 197. The mayor and council had no more power to prescribe, by ordinance, the duties of the marshal than of the mayor, police judge, justices of the peace, or constables. They had as much power to make it the duty of the mayor to kill and bury dogs as to force that duty upon the marshal. A corporation cannot enlarge its own powers. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 231. Section 6 of the ordinance, making it the duty of the marshal to kill dogs, is ultra vires, and confers no right to sue for fees. The compensation of the marshal must be regulated by ordinance. Laws 1872, p. 197. Does not this provision require that there must be a separate ordinance or ordinances for that purpose, and exclude the power of the council to insert regulations on that subject, through the ordinances, at will, making perhaps a dozen disjointed regulations concerning the compensation of officers? The duties of the marshal are fixed by the statute, and the mayor and council have no power to add to them. The compensation allowed to the marshal as such by the city must be for the services fixed by the statute, and none other.

We deny the power of the mayor and council to authorize the marshal to destroy dogs in the manner pointed out in this ordinance. Well-settled principles, applicable to the forfeiture of animals running at large, require some notice to the owners, some inquiry to first determine whether he was permitting animals owned or harbored by him to run at large contrary to the provisions of the ordinance, and some warrant, issuing from the council or police judge, to destroy *72 dogs *found at large unlawfully. By the terms of the ordinance in question the marshal is made the sole judge of all facts constituting a violation of the ordinance. He may determine, without any notice to the owner of the animal, and without any inquiry, whether or not such owner is violating an ordinance, and upon such determination may destroy his property. The power to make such regulations has not been delegated to any of our municipal corporations. See Dill. Corp. §§ 281-286.

The court erred in permitting the ordinance to be read to the jury. Section 10 of the second-class city act does not pretend to make the ordinance book evidence, but merely means to provide a method of directing the inquirer to the sources of evidence. If that section makes the ordinance book evidence of the existence of an ordinance, then it also makes it evidence of the passage and publication of the ordinance, for these, too, must be set forth in the ordinance book. It can hardly be claimed that the legislature meant to do that.

It was error to award execution against the city. Property of a municipal corporation cannot be sold on execution. Dill. Corp. § 64; Merwin v. City of Chicago, 45 Ill. 133. Error will lie upon an award of execution. Harger v. County of Washington, 12 Pa. St. 251; Phillips v. Russell, 1 Hemp. 62; Powell, App. Proc. 155.

Armstrong & Gamble, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. On June 27, 1872, the city of Independence, a city of the second class, passed an ordinance that no dog should be permitted to run at large in any public place in said city unless the owner of the dog should first pay to the city a tax of one dollar for each male owned by him, and five dollars for each female, and should cause a collar and check, which were to be provided by the city, to be worn by each dog. Said ordinance also made it the duty of *78 the city marshal to kill and bury every dog found running at *large in violation of said ordinance, and also provided that the marshal should receive from the city, as compensation for his services in this respect, one dollar for each and every dog killed and buried. Under this ordinance, and from July 9 to December 30, 1872, the marshal killed and buried 168 dogs. The city then refused to pay him for his services. He then commenced this action to recover for the same. The plaintiff in error in its brief says: "The defendant in error brought suit against the plaintiff in error in a justice's court to recover the sum of $168 for services as marshal of the plaintiff in error, under an ordinance. Judgment for that amount was rendered in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appealed to the district court, where the case was tried at the December term, 1873, and judgment for the amount claimed, $168, was there rendered." The city then brought the case to this court on petition in error.

The city now claims that said ordinance is illegal and void, and imposes no binding obligation upon the city to pay for services rendered under it. It sometimes happens that municipal corporations, as well as individuals, believe that it is eminently legal to incur obligations, but manifestly illegal to fulfill them. This is a kind of frugal respect for law eminently beneficial to those who can successfully exercise it, but not so congenial to those who must innocently suffer by it. Hence what may seem to be a commendable example of prudential economy by the party pleading the illegality may be regarded as a pernicious example of moral obliquity by the other. We perceive no sufficient reason why the plaintiff cannot recover in this case. No sufficient reason has been given, and we perceive none, why said ordinance should be held to be invalid, so far at least as it affects any question involved in this case. It should certainly not be held to be invalid because of the sacredness of the property that may be held in dogs. Property in dogs is of such a low character that it is hardly considered as property at all. And a vast number of dogs running at large upon the public streets, without any known owner, is always considered as a nuisance. *We do not suppose that property in dogs is of such a sacred character that dogs found running at large upon the public streets, in violation of a city ordinance, cannot be destroyed, but must be taken up and impounded, as a cow or other more valuable animal, and notice thereof given to the owner, and that the dogs must then be offered for sale at public auction to the highest bidder, if the owners thereof (if they have any) should not in a reasonable time pay charges and take them away. The ordinance is made for dogs owned and kept in the city of Independence, and not for dogs casually there. And we must presume, as the record comes to us, that no dog was killed except such as the marshal had a right to kill.

It was not error for the court below to permit said ordinance to be proved by the introduction of the original ordinance book of the city.

There seems to be no provision made by statute for the collection of judgments against cities of the second class. If this is so, then we suppose an execution may issue on such judgments.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

(All the justices concurring.)

BURLINGTON Tp. and another v. S. K. Cross and another.

July Term, 1875.

Remedies: Bonds: Kind of Action: When Party must Resort to Legal, not Equitable, Proceedings. A township issued to a firm certain bonds for the purpose of aiding said firm in erecting a certain mill and mill-dam; and, in consideration for said bonds, C., a member of said firm, gave to said township his certain promissory notes and a mortgage. These notes and this mortgage were to be paid in money, or in said bonds, at the option of the payor of said notes and mortgage. No such payment, however, nor offer to pay, has ever been made. None of the bonds *75 have ever *been returned to the township, and no offer to return any of them has ever been made; and what has become of the bonds, since their delivery to said firm, has not been shown. Held, that an action in the nature of a bill in chancery, brought by C. against said township to have said notes and mortgage set aside and canceled, on the ground that said township had no power to issue said bonds, cannot, under the circumstances of this case, even admitting that said township had no power to issue said bonds, be maintained; but the plaintiff must rely upon his ordinary legal remedy.

Error from Coffey district court.

Action by Cross and another to set aside and cancel certain notes and mortgage. The petition described the notes and mortgage, and alleged that they were given without legal and sufficient consideration. The answer contained two defenses: First, a general denial; second, the contract between the plaintiffs and the township of Burlington, and the issue and delivery of the bonds of said township to plaintiff's firm to the amount of $10,000, for which bonds said notes and mortgage were given. To the second defense plaintiffs demurred. The district court, at the December term, 1873, sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, adjudging said notes and mortgage to be utterly void, and decreeing that the defendants, Hiram McAllister, as trustee of Burlington township, and said Burlington township, "surrender the said promissory notes and mortgage to said plaintiffs, and that the trustee of said township, within ten days from this date, enter a release of said mortgage on the margin of the record thereof in the Book of Mortgages in the office of the register of deeds of said county of Coffey, and that, in case said defendants fail for ten days from this date to enter a discharge of said mortgage, then this judgment and decree shall operate to fully satisfy and discharge said mortgage on the records of said county; and the said defendants are hereby forever enjoined and restrained from selling or disposing of said notes and mortgage, or from ever trying, in any manner or way, to collect the same."

*76 *A. M. F. Randolph, for plaintiffs in error.

The plaintiffs below in their petition ask for the rescission of a certain contract, and for the delivery up of certain notes and a mortgage, and for the cancellation of said mortgage on the records, because of the alleged illegality and alleged failure of the consideration for which said notes and mortgage were given; the consideration thereof being certain bonds of Burlington township issued for the purpose of aiding them in the improvement of their water-power and mill privileges, and putting in operation a flouring-mill at and near the town of Burlington. They claim that the transactions out of which said notes and mortgage arose are vitiated by the illegality of the bonds of said township. They, however, allege no fraud perpetrated upon them by said township, or its trustee, in making said contract; nor do they set up any false and fraudulent representation which induced them to take said bonds, and give for the same said notes and mortgage; nor do they claim that said township, in any manner, took advantage of their ignorance and inexperience; nor do they state facts which show that in case the contract should be rescinded that the parties can be put in statu quo; nor do they allege that they have not received value for said bonds; nor have they ever offered to return said bonds, nor do they now offer to do so; nor do they aver that they have suffered any pecuniary loss or damage by reason of the alleged illegality of said bonds. Adams, Eq. 174, 176, 177, and notes. Since plaintiffs below ask for equitable relief, they should remember the maxim, "He who asks equity must do equity."

W. A. Johnson and Redmond & Junkins, for defendants in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action in the nature of a bill in chancery, brought by S. K. Cross and Thomas Cross against Hiram McAllister, as trustee of Burlington township, *and also *77 against said Burlington township, to set aside and cancel five certain promissory notes, and a certain real-estate mortgage made to secure the payment of said notes. One of the notes reads as follows:

"$2,000.

BURLINGTON, KAN., February 27, 1871.

"One year after date I promise to pay to Burlington township, Coffey county, Kansas, or to the order of the township trustee of said township, in money, or in the bonds of said township issued to D. Cross & Sons, two thousand dollars. Value received.

"S. K. CROSS."

The other notes are precisely like this one, except that they are made payable in two, three, four, and five years after date, respectively. They aggregate in amount the sum of ten thousand dollars. They were given for a like amount of the bonds of Burlington township issued to D. Cross & Sons, of which firm S. K. Cross was a member. It is claimed that said bonds are void because they were issued to said D. Cross & Sons merely for the purpose of assisting them in erecting a mill and mill-dam in said Burlington township. It is not claimed that said bonds are void because of any fraud or mistake of facts, or because of any irregularity in their issue; but it is claimed that they are void solely on the ground that Burlington township had no power to issue them. Now, for the purposes of this case, but without deciding the question, we shall assume that said bonds are void, and void merely because the township of Burlington had no power to issue them; and upon this hypothesis or assumption can the plaintiffs below maintain this action? Upon what ground do they invoke the aid of a court of equity, rather than the aid of a court of law? Not upon the ground of fraud, accident, or mistake; not upon the ground of any breach of confidence or trust; not upon the ground that confiding innocence has been overreached by far-seeing vice,—for none of these things are claimed; not upon the ground that the plaintiffs have no adequate remedy by the ordinary course of proceedings at law; and not upon the ground that the plaintiffs will suffer *78 any great or irreparable injury, or indeed any injury, which *it would be inequitable for them to suffer,—for presently we shall show that the plaintiffs have an ample remedy at law, and that there is no danger of their suffering more than it is equitable and right for them to suffer.

Admitting that said bonds are void, and that they were the sole consideration for said notes and mortgage, the plaintiffs then claim that they can maintain this action solely upon the ground "that the trustee of Burlington township neglected and refused, on the demand of said plaintiffs, to deliver said notes and mortgage up to said plaintiffs, but thereafter did and does claim that he will collect the same when they become due, whereby said plaintiffs would be liable on said notes and mortgage." We, however, think differently. Said notes are not negotiable instruments. Gen. St. 114, § 1; 1 Pars. Notes, 45 et seq., and cases there cited. Even if it be considered that they are made payable to the order of the township, or to the order of its trustee, so as to make them negotiable in that respect, yet still they are not made payable in "money certain." They are made payable alternatively, either in money or in said supposed worthless bonds, at the choice and option of the payee of the notes. Hence they cannot be transferred to any one so as to defeat any defense which may be set up against them. They can never be collected against the will of the payor, except by an action in the courts; and, whenever such an action may be commenced, the payor, or any one in privity with him, may set up any defense which he may have. Besides, if the payor chooses, he may at any time pay off said notes by returning to the township said worthless bonds. These remedies are certainly ample, and the plaintiffs have no need of the present action. But if no action for the collection of said notes shall ever be commenced, so as to allow the plaintiffs to set up their defense, then the plaintiffs can certainly suffer no injury, or at most none which they ought not to suffer. They lose nothing by waiting. The statute of limitations will not run against them on said notes and mortgage, but will run in their favor. But, if it be said that the notes and *79 mortgage should not be allowed to hang over them *until the statute of limitations shall bar any action upon them, then it may be answered that the plaintiffs ought not to allow said bonds to hang over said township until the statute of limitations shall bar all action upon the bonds. It will take just as long for the statute of limitations to bar an action upon the bonds as upon the notes and mortgage.

The prayer of the plaintiffs' petition is that the defendant shall be required "to deliver up to said plaintiffs said notes and mortgage, and that said mortgage may be canceled on the records." Now, it would be inequitable and unjust to require the township to deliver up the notes and mortgage, and have them canceled, and yet allow the plaintiffs to retain the bonds, which we suppose are apparently, and upon their face, as good and as valid as the notes and mortgage. We suppose that all the instruments upon their face appear to be valid, although we have no copy of the mortgage, nor of any of the bonds. And as the notes and mortgage were given for the bonds, and the bonds for the notes and mortgage, and as all are apparently valid, but in fact void, it would seem to be just and equitable that, when one set of the instruments is delivered up and canceled, the other set should also be delivered up and canceled. The township has as much interest in protecting its reputation and character for paying its debts, as the plaintiffs have in protecting their reputation and character for paying their debts. The township no more wants bonds, apparently good and unpaid, to be standing out against it, than the plaintiffs want notes and a mortgage, apparently good and unpaid, to be standing out against them. The reputation of repudiating what appear to be valid debts will injure the credit of the township as much as the same thing would injure the credit of the plaintiffs. The township would no more want to go into the market to sell really valid bonds while these apparently valid but void bonds are still outstanding, and apparently due and unpaid, than the plaintiffs would want to go into the market with really valid notes and a valid mortgage while these apparently valid but really invalid notes, and this *80 apparently valid but really invalid *mortgage, are outstanding apparently due and unpaid. Let the plaintiffs do equity before they seek equity. There is no pretense that said bonds have ever been lost or destroyed, or transferred from D. Cross & Sons to any one else; and it will be remembered that the plaintiffs are members of the firm of D. Cross & Sons. If the bonds have in fact been lost, destroyed, or transferred, the plaintiffs should show it. But still we do not suppose that merely showing that the bonds have been transferred, if transferred for value, would be sufficient to authorize the plaintiffs to maintain this action. If the plaintiffs, or D. Cross & Sons, have sold the bonds to other persons for a valuable consideration, and are still enjoying the benefits of that valuable consideration, how in the name of equity can they ask to be relieved from paying anything for the bonds, and thereby force the township either to lose the value of the bonds or repudiate the payment? And how in the name of equity can they compel the township to repudiate their bonds, and thereby compel the purchasers of the bonds to lose what they have paid for them? Why do not the plaintiffs gather up these supposed worthless bonds and return them to the township? This would be equity on the part of the plaintiffs; and by doing this the plaintiffs would then have the equitable right to ask that their notes and mortgage should be delivered up to them, and that they be canceled.

The judgment of the court below must be reversed, and cause remanded, with the order that the demurrer to the second defense stated in the answer of the defendant be overruled, and for such further proceedings as may be proper in the case.

*MARTIN SMITH v. CITY OF LEAVENWORTH.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Municipal Corporations: Streets in: Fee in County. The fee of all streets, (including that portion of the same on which the sidewalk is constructed,) in any city in Kansas, is in the county in which such city is situated, for the use and benefit of the public.
2. ———: Use of Streets and Sidewalks. The only legitimate use that can be made of a street or the sidewalk by any private person is for passing and repassing upon the same. This would probably be different if the private person owned the fee of the land occupied by the street.
3. ———. Any person traveling upon a street has a right to use any portion of the same for that purpose not already otherwise in use.

<sup>1</sup>See Jansen v. Atchison, 16 Kan. 358, reviewing the cases, on the liability of municipal corporations for defective streets, etc. Though a city builds its sidewalks lifted above the ground, upon posts, leaving openings underneath, or permits the owners of lots abutting to excavate areas under the walk, it does not become an insurer of the strength and sufficiency of the sidewalk above such openings and areas. Its undertaking is to use reasonable care and diligence (reasonable with reference to the risk and danger) in placing and maintaining suitable and sufficient plank or other covering of such openings and areas, and is responsible only in case of a failure to use such care and diligence. *Atchison v. v. Leavenworth, 28 Kan. 745; bridge as part of street, Eudora v. Miller, 30 Kan. 494; S. C. 2 Pac. Rep. 685.

While, generally speaking, it is the duty of a city to keep its streets in reasonably safe condition for public travel, it is not thereby implied that every street, and the whole width of every street, must be placed and kept in good condition. The city may, without incurring liability, leave certain streets entirely unopened, and in others put only a portion of the width in condition for use. Wellington v. Gregson, 31 Kan. 99; S. C. 1 Pac. The control of the streets of a city is vested in the city, and its exercise is not wholly discretionary or judicial or quasi judicial or legislative, and is not divided or shared with any other corporation or board or tribunal, but is absolute and exclusive in the city itself. It is imposed upon the city as an absolute and mandatory duty. Gould v. Topeka, 32 Kan. 485; S. C. 4 Pac. Rep. 822. The fact that a person uses a street or sidewalk after he has notice that it is out of repair, is not necessarily negligence. Emporia v. Schmidling, 33 Kan. 485; S. C. 6 Pac. Rep. 893.

Action by Smith to recover damages for injuries sustained by him by reason of his falling into an open cellar-way on one of the streets of the city of Leavenworth. Trial at the February term, 1874, of the district court. Upon the facts found, the district court gave judgment in favor of the city.

F. P. Fitzwilliam and L. G. Hopkins, for plaintiff.

The city had full control over the sidewalks, freed from all obstructions, and authority to prevent and remove nuisances. City Charter, (Gen. St. c. 18, §§ 9, 19, 21.) The city had notice of the defect in the sidewalk, that it was unguarded, and dangerous for foot passengers. It made no attempt to protect any one traveling thereon from falling in. Therefore, for neglecting its duty in keeping the sidewalk in a safe condition for travelers, it rendered itself liable to plaintiff for the injury by him received. City of Atchison v. King, 9 Kan. *550; City of Topeka v. Tuttle, 5 Kan. *311; City of Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418; City of Nebraska v. Campbell, Id. 590; Smith v. City of St. Joseph, 45 Mo. 449; Wendell v. City of Troy, 39 Barb. 329; Cuthbert v. City of Appleton, 22 Wis. 642; Koester v. City of Ottumwa, 34 Iowa, 41. This liability was not changed because Kirch placed a trap-door over the cellar-way one day prior to the injury. This was done for "his own convenience, and the protection of his own customers." Requa v. Rochester, 45 N. Y. 129. The city was not absolved from the performance of its duties and liabilities to the public, in keeping the sidewalk free from defects and in a safe condition for pedestrians, because an obligation also rested on the owner or occupant of the lot to see that the cellar-way was properly *83 *guarded. The jury finds from the evidence that there was no protection to foot-passengers when the trap-door was not down, and that at the time plaintiff was injured there was no guard, and the city had no knowledge of the trap-door being there, and had taken no steps to secure persons passing along the sidewalk at that point from injury. The city is primarily liable to plaintiff for the injury. Rowell v. Williams, 29 Iowa, 210; Manchester v. City of Hartford, 30 Conn. 118; Wright v. Saunders, 65 Barb. 214; Balty v. Dubury, 24 Vt. 163; Wellcome v. Leeds, 51 Me. 313; Oakland Ry. Co. v. Fielding, 48 Pa. St. 320; Creed v. Hartmann, 29 N. Y. 592; Bloomington v. Bay, 42 Ill. 503; Trowbridge v. Forepaugh, 14 Minn. 133, (Gil. 100;) Lane v. Atlantic Works, 107 Mass. 104.

Lucien Baker, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought by Martin Smith against the city of Leavenworth, to recover for injuries received by the plaintiff by reason of a defective sidewalk in said city. The facts of the case, as shown by the special verdict of the jury, are as follows:

"First. The defendant is a municipal corporation, a city of the first class, duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of Kansas, and as such has the charge and control of the public streets within the limits of the city.

"Second. Shawnee street is a public street of said corporation, graded, curbed, guttered, macadamized, and sidewalked ten feet in width, by said corporation.

"Third. On the north side of said street was erected in 1868 a building on lot 9, in block 50. In front of said building was a cellar-way, which extended into the cellar by steps, six feet deep.

"Fourth. From the erection of said building until the second day of May, 1873, said cellar-way was unprotected, and several citizens fell therein.

"Fifth. On the evening of the third of May, 1873, between the hours of seven and eight o'clock, the plaintiff, in going from his residence to his place of business, using ordinary care, and without any fault on his part, accidentally fell into said cellar-way.

"Sixth. On the second day of May, 1873, John Kirch, who was a tenant in possession of said building, caused a trap-door to be *84 put over said cellar-way. On the third day of May said *trap-door had been repeatedly shut and opened before said accident; but there was no protection to said cellar-way when said door was not down. The defendant, the city, did not know of the fact that Kirch had caused said door to be made and put down until after the injury to the plaintiff. The cellar to which said opening or cellar-way is, was rented and used by a number of hucksters dealing on the sidewalk near by. When said door was down over the cellar-way, it sufficiently protected the same. At the time of the accident to the plaintiff it had been up from twenty to thirty minutes. Mr. Kirch put down the door for his own convenience, and the protection of his customers.

"Seventh. The corporation defendant had full notice of the existence of said opening or cellar-way from the time of the erection of said building, and of the condition it was in; but the defendant did not know that said trap-door had been put down by Kirch.

"Eighth. From said fall the plaintiff sustained a fracture of his left arm, near the wrist, whereby he was confined to his house for three weeks, and was rendered unfit to attend to his business for over three months, and had to employ assistance to attend to his business while so disabled, and had to employ physicians, and incur expenditures for medical attention.

"Ninth. We, the jury, find, if the above facts are sustained by the court, the plaintiff is entitled to recover $650 damages."

The only question involved in this case, as we think, is whether the plaintiff ought to recover upon the foregoing facts. It is true, the plaintiff suggests some other matters, but we hardly suppose he expects a reversal of the judgment below on account of them. For instance, he asked the court below to instruct the jury to make the following additional findings of fact, to-wit: "That the defendant was guilty of negligence in permitting said opening to be made and to remain in said sidewalk;" "that the defendant was guilty of negligence in omitting to have said opening properly guarded;" "that said opening never had been, and was not at the time of the injury to said plaintiff, properly and sufficiently guarded." The court refused. He assigned this refusal for error. He mentions the *85 same in his *statement of facts in his brief, but afterwards he does not even mention the matter. There are several reasons why we should not reverse the judgment of the court below on account of its rulings in this last-mentioned matter: (1) The plaintiff asked the court orally, and not in writing, to instruct the jury to make said additional findings. (2) When he made the request, it would seem that the jury had already been out for some time considering as to what their verdict should be, and had not yet returned into court with their verdict. (3) He asked that the court should instruct the jury to find a particular way, and did not propose to allow the jury to exercise any judgment or discretion in the matter. (4) He made no objection to the verdict at the time the same was rendered because it did not contain these additional findings, but, on the contrary, he seemed to be satisfied with the verdict without these findings. When the jury returned their verdict into court, the court below said to the plaintiff, "Are there any exceptions on the part of the plaintiff?" The plaintiff then made some suggestions, (not mentioning, however, these additional findings,) and the verdict was amended in accordance with his suggestions. The court then said, "Is there anything further by the plaintiff?" and the plaintiff answered, "No, sir." (5) The plaintiff seems finally to have abandoned the matter, for he has not mentioned the same in the argument in his brief.

We now return to the real question in the case, which is, which party should recover upon the facts found by the jury,—the plaintiff or the defendant? This is a difficult question to solve. It seems to be new. There is no case to be found in the books precisely like it, and different minds might reach different conclusions with reference thereto. We suppose, however, that the following propositions will be conceded to be good law: (1) The fee of all streets, including that portion of the same on which the sidewalk is constructed, in any city in Kansas, is in the county in which such city is situated, for the use and benefit of the public. Randal v. Elder, 12 Kan.

*86 *257, *261, and cases there cited. (2) The only legitimate use that can be made of a street, or the sidewalk, by any private person, is for passing and repassing upon the same. This would probably be different if the private person owned the fee of the land occupied by the street. (3) Any person traveling upon a street, has a right to use any portion of the same for that purpose not already otherwise in use. (4) A lot-owner, or any person under him, has a right to use any portion of a street in front of his lot in passing to or from his lot, and to and from the improvements on the same, including the house, cellar, etc. (5) Under existing laws, no city has any power to confer upon any private person any right to use a street, or any portion of the same, for the purpose of a cellar-way, or for any other purpose except for passing and repassing. (6) It is the duty of a city to keep its sidewalks in good repair, and in such condition as to make them safe for the traveling public. (7) It is negligence for a city to allow a cellar-way to be made and left open in a street where persons are in the habit of traveling. (8) A city is not liable for negligence which does not result in the injury of any person; and, in order to make a city liable for negligence, the negligence must still be operating when the injury occurs. (9) While the use of any portion of a street for a private cellar-way is unauthorized by law, yet, if the cellar-way were so guarded as to be perfectly safe, under all ordinary circumstances, for persons traveling upon such street, the city would not be so guilty of negligence, in such a case, as to be liable for some unforeseen injury resulting from some fortuitous circumstance, which could not in the ordinary course of events be expected or anticipated as likely to occur.

We therefore conclude that where a city permits a cellar-way to be constructed in the sidewalk of one of its principal streets, which cellar-way is not guarded in any manner except by a trap-door, and is dangerous for persons traveling on said sidewalk when said trap-door is not closed, and where said city permits the person occupying the adjoining lot, and those acting under him, to open and close said trap-door at their option, the city is liable for any injury that occurs by reason of any person falling, without fault on his part, into said cellar-way when said trap-door is left open. *87 The city was unquestionably guilty of negligence, and of gross negligence, in allowing said cellar-way to be constructed and left open, without any guard, for such a great length of time, and, even when the trap-door was put down, the city had no agency in the matter, and no knowledge of the same, and did not even afterwards have any knowledge of the same until after the accident occurred. And it will also be noticed that said trap-door was not put down as a constant and permanent guard for said cellar-way; but it was put down with the unquestioned intention that it should be opened and closed at the option of those using the cellar. Hence the original negligence of the city in allowing a dangerous opening to be made in said sidewalk was not totally terminated and ended by the construction of a guard intended to be constant, permanent, and lasting, but such negligence was merely mitigated by the construction of a guard that would sometimes be sufficient, and sometimes not sufficient. The original negligence of the city continued, merely modified and mitigated; and nothing will wholly terminate the negligence of the city except to so close up the cellar-way as to make it permanently and constantly safe for those traveling on the sidewalk.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded, with the order that the court below render judgment on the special verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $650 damages, and costs.

Error from Franklin district court.

Foreclosure, brought by Evans, as administrator of the estate of L. F. Staples, deceased, upon a mortgage given him by Brown and two others to secure a part of the purchase money for certain lands belonging to the Staples estate, sold them by Evans. The defendants claimed a set-off to amount of $197.28 paid by them, after their purchase, for taxes, interest, etc., due on the lands at the date of their purchase. Trial at the November term, 1873, and judgment for plaintiff for the full amount claimed in his petition.

James M. Hendry, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action on a promissory note and mortgage. The issues were made up by petition, answer, and reply. Afterwards the parties agreed upon the facts of the case, and submitted the case to the court below for judgment upon an agreed statement of facts. The court, however, instead of finding the facts as agreed to by the parties, and rendering judgment thereon, made findings of its own, differing in form if not in substance from the facts agreed to by the parties, and then rendered judgment upon its own findings. Of course, the court below erred. The court below had no evidence upon which to make findings of fact differing from the facts agreed to by the parties, and it should have rendered the judgment upon the facts as agreed to by the parties.

- *90 The latter part of section 559 of the *Civil Code provides that "in cases decided by the supreme court, when the facts are agreed to by the parties, or found by the court below or a referee, and when it does not appear, by exception or otherwise, that such findings are against the evidence in the case, the supreme court shall send a mandate to the court below, directing it to render such judgment in the premises as it should have rendered on the facts agreed to or found in the case." This section tells us what to do when the facts are agreed to or found, but it does not tell us what to do when all the facts are agreed to and all found. If, however, the facts agreed to and those found were precisely alike, as they in fact ought to be, then there would be no difficulty in determining what should be done in the case. But the difficulty arises when the facts agreed to and the facts found differ from each other. In such a case we think we should follow the facts agreed to, and wholly ignore the facts found. We think this has been substantially decided in the case of Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Butts, 7 Kan. *308. The parties certainly ought to have the right to agree upon the facts of their case, and they certainly ought to know better what the facts of the case are than the court. We presume, however, that the facts found in this case are substantially the same as the facts agreed to; but, as it would require considerable labor and study to determine the matter, we have chosen not to give the subject any investigation, but pass at once to the facts as agreed to by the parties, and decide the case upon those facts.

Crawford*, 19 Kan. 604. If the administrator does not need the lands of the estate with which to pay the debts, and does not sell the same, it is not his duty to pay the taxes accumulating on the real estate subsequent to the death of the intestate. Reading v. Wier, 20 Kan. 429.

The agreed statement shows, among others, the following facts: On October 9, 1866, L. F. Staples died intestate, leaving certain lands in Franklin county, which he owned at that time. In January, 1867, the plaintiff, James W. Evans, was duly appointed administrator of Staples' estate, and in December, 1868, the probate court duly authorized the plaintiff to sell said lands. During the month of February, 1870, negotiations originated between the plaintiff and the de-

*91 defendants George Brown and David Brown. During these negotiations it appears that "to induce the said Browns to *purchase said lands the said Evans assured them that the said lands were free and clear of all incumbrances, and further assured them, though not in writing, that if said lands were not free and clear of all incumbrances he would make them so, and that he further assured them that the taxes on said lands had all been paid." Said Browns relied upon these assurances, and in pursuance thereof purchased said land, paying therefor $2,000 down, and agreeing to pay $1,000 more in two years. On March 17, 1870, the deed from the administrator to said Browns for said land, and the notes and mortgage from Browns back to the administrator for $1,000, the balance of said purchase money, were executed. At the time of said sale the taxes on said lands for the years 1868 and 1869 had not been paid, but still remained due and unpaid. The lands had at that time already been sold for the taxes of 1868, and were again sold in May, 1870, for the taxes of 1869. The administrator continued to neglect and refuse to pay said taxes, although he had plenty of funds belonging to the estate, both before and after said sale, with which he could have paid them if he had chosen to do so. May 20, 1872, said Browns paid said taxes, which, with the penalties, interest, and costs, amounted to $197.28. In August, 1872, the plaintiff, Evans, commenced this action on said note and mortgage. The defendants answered, setting up the payment of said taxes as a partial defense to the action, and the plaintiff replied setting forth a general denial. In November, 1873, the case was submitted to the court below for decision and judgment on said agreed statement of facts; and in December following the court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendants, for the full amount of said note and mortgage.

Was this right, or should the court have allowed the defendants for the amount of the taxes (or some portion of the same) which they paid? This is the only question now remaining for our consideration. We do not think that an estate of a deceased person can be held liable for the false and fraudulent representa-*92 *tions of the administrator. Dunlap v. Robinson, 12 Ohio St.

530; Westfall v. Dungan, 14 Ohio St. 276. Neither do we think that the estate can be held liable for the promises of the administrator, unless the administrator has the right in law to make such promises, or to perform the thing which he promises. But we know of no good reason why an estate should not be held liable for promises made by the administrator where in law he has the right to make such promises, or where in law it is his duty, without a promise, to do just what he has promised to do. May v. Taylor, 27 Tex. 125; Moore v. Moore, 22 La. Ann. 226.

The main question, then, in this case is whether the administrator had the right, under the law, either to make the promise he did make, or to pay said taxes whether he made a promise to do so or not. That he made the promise in substance to pay them is unquestioned. Unpaid taxes levied on lands are an incumbrance thereon, (Stewart v. Clark, 8 Kan. *210;) and the administrator agreed that, if said lands were not free and clear from all incumbrances, he would make them so.

The only question, then, left, is whether it was the right or the duty of the administrator, under the law, to pay said taxes. We think it was both his right and duty. Section 137 of the tax law (Gen. St. 1062) is some evidence that it was both. Certainly; if an administrator needs the lands of the estate with which to pay debts, it is as much his duty to pay all legal charges that may accrue thereon until he sells them as it is to pay any charges on personal property for the care, preservation, and protection of the same while it remains in his custody. Upon general principles the administrator must have power to keep, preserve, and protect all property, real and personal, placed in his hands for any specific purpose, and must have power to use the funds of the estate to prevent the destruction, loss, or deterioration in value of said property. But the latter part of section 40 of the tax law (Gen. St. 1034) seems to make it plain that the administrator should pay the taxes when he sells the land. It reads *93 as follows: *"Where any real estate shall be sold at judicial sale, or by administrators, executors, guardians, or trustees, the court shall order the taxes and penalties, and the interest thereon, against such lands, to be discharged out of the proceeds of such lands."

This provision, when applied to sales of lands by administrators, includes all unpaid taxes which have accrued against the lands, whether they have accrued before or after the death of the deceased owner, and includes all unpaid taxes which have not yet been merged into tax titles; and, as the lien on real estate for taxes is paramount to all other liens or debts, it would seem that the taxes should be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the lands. It will be presumed that the order required by the foregoing section was made, and properly made; for, until the contrary is shown, it will be presumed that the probate court did its duty. The order required by said section should be made at the time that the probate court makes the order confirming the sale of the land. But whether either of said orders was in fact made, is not affirmatively shown by the record brought to this court. But even if said first-mentioned order were not in fact made, still we do not think that the omission would materially affect the substantial rights for the defendants. It was not their duty to make the order, nor to see that it was made; and until the whole transaction is finally closed up, we do not think that they would waive any of their substantial rights by suffering the omission to make the order to continue.

But it is claimed that said provision in said section 40 has been impliedly repealed by sections 132, 133, and 134 of the act concerning executors and administrators. Gen. St. 457. Now, repeals by implication are never favored in law. Besides, all these sections were passed by the same legislature; and sections 132, 133, and 134 were passed only one day after section 40. It can therefore hardly be supposed that the legislature intended to repeal said provision in said section 40; and the intention of the legislature must govern whenever that intention can be discovered. We think, how-

*94 ever, that said sections may *all have force by a fair, reasonable, and liberal construction; and, if so, then, of course, said provision in section 40 has not been repealed. This view of the law certainly subserves the ends of justice in this particular case.

This cause will be remanded to the court below, with the instructions that the judgment below be modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $197.28, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from May 20, 1872; and the defendant in error will pay the costs of this court.

July Term, 1875.

Escape: Sheriff: Liability for Escapes, in Civil Actions. The provisions of the Civil Code, §§ 164, 165, making the sheriff liable as bail for an escape, have not wholly abolished the common-law action for an escape; and therefore, where the sheriff has voluntarily permitted the escape of a person held by him on mesne process in a civil action, an action may be prosecuted against such sheriff by the party injured, for the actual damages sustained by such party, although the action in which the party escaping was arrested has never been prosecuted to final judgment.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Montgomery district court.

Action by C. D. Crane, H. D. Crane, and A. J. Wightman, as partners, against Stone, for permitting a person in his custody as sheriff, on civil process, to escape. The petition is as follows:

"The plaintiffs, partners as Crane & Wightman, complain of J. E. Hawkins*, 1 N. E. Rep. 358.

action by the clerk of said court, addressed to the sheriff of said county of Montgomery, (they, the said plaintiffs, having filed with the clerk of said court an undertaking as required by law, conditioned and in the sum of $1,000, with good and sufficient surety,) and caused the said order of arrest to be delivered, together with a copy of the said affidavit, to the defendant herein, then sheriff as aforesaid, and which said order of arrest required the said sheriff to arrest the bodies of the said Wharton and Baker, or either of them, and hold him or them to bail in the sum of $900, and to make due return of said writ and proceedings thereon on the fifth of July, 1872, with any undertaking of bail which the said Wharton and Baker, or either of them, may have given; that thereafter, and before the said fifth of July, 1872, the defendant, Stone, under and by virtue of said order of arrest arrested the said Wharton in his body, and as such sheriff, then had the said Wharton in his custody at the suit of said plaintiffs in the action aforesaid; that, in violation of his duty as such sheriff, the said defendant, to-wit, on the twenty-seventh of June, 1872, without the license or consent of the plaintiffs, or either of them, permitted said Wharton to escape, and, without any default or neglect on the part of said plaintiffs, voluntarily suffered and permitted the said Wharton to go at large out of the custody of said defendant, sheriff aforesaid, the said claim against the said Wharton and Baker then and still being wholly unpaid to the plaintiffs. Whereby the said plaintiffs have been greatly damaged, and have lost their said claim against said Wharton and Baker; the said Wharton having absconded, and gone beyond the jurisdiction of this court, with all his moneys, goods, and effects, to the damage of the said plaintiffs in the sum of $408.67, and interest from February 13, 1872, debt, and costs paid in the sum of $26.75, June 18, 1873.

To this petition Stone demurred, "for that the said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The district court, at the December term, 1873, sustained the demurrer, dismissed the petition, and gave judgment in favor of Stone for costs.

Mason & Parkinson, for plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs in this case elected to sue as at common law, instead of bringing said suit under the Code against the sheriff, as bail, and as such the petition does state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant. The Civil Code, by abolishing all forms of pleading, has not affected the liability of a sheriff for an escape. The rule of damages should be the amount of the debt in such case, and the interest. 1 Estee, Pl. & Pr. 356; Smith v. Knapp, 30 N. Y. 581; McCreery v. Willett, 23 How. Pr. 129; Whithead v. Keyes, 1 Allen, 350; 2 Hil. Torts, c. 31, § 7.

J. D. McCue, for defendant.

The only question is whether the common-law remedy for an escape is abolished by our Code. If it is, the order sustaining the demurrer was proper. We maintain that all proceedings of arrest and bail are statutory, and all rights of action, whether against the defendant arrested, his bail, (if any be given,) or against the officer making the arrest, are governed by the statute; and until the liability of the officer is fixed as provided in sections 164 and 165 of the Code, no right of action has accrued. By the express terms of the Code, the liability of the sheriff for an escape, either upon mesne or final process, is that of bail, and it "shall be the amount of the judgment, interest, and costs." But the return of "not found" upon an *97 execution against the body is a prerequisite to the *right to maintain this action. Is there any other liability? We think not. The plaintiffs cite the case of Smith v. Knapp, 30 N. Y. 581. A fair examination of that case, with the subsequent doubts expressed by the same court, will show that it is not an authority in this case. It is true that the same question was presented in that case as in this, and decided in favor of the common-law liability; but the decision was placed upon the ground that the right of action was presumed by a section of their statute of limitations which reads: "Section 94. Within one year, an action against a sheriff or other officer, for an escape of a prisoner arrested or imprisoned on civil process." Wait's Code, 105. We have no such statute in this state; and the recognition of the right of action being based upon the statute we have cited, and the action in 30 N. Y. maintained upon it, and it alone, the case cannot be considered an authority. But the position assumed by the court in Smith v. Knapp is very much shaken by the doubts expressed by INGRAHAM, J., in Metcalf v. Stryker, 31 N. Y. 257. He says: "Whether the statutory liability imposed by the Code in these cases does not take the place of the action for an escape from mesne process, admits of some doubts." We think there can be no doubt in this state. Section 147 of our Code provides that arrests can be made in the manner prescribed by the Code, and not otherwise. This negative clause we think applies to all proceedings under that article, and applies to the action against officers as well as against the bail.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action against J. E. Stone, sheriff of Montgomery county, for voluntarily permitting the escape of a party held by him on mesne process in a civil action. The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's petition on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court below sustained the demurrer, and the plaintiffs now bring the case to *98 this court. *We are at a loss to know why it is supposed that the petition below is insufficient; and the defendant has taken no trouble to inform us, either by brief or oral argument. The petition seems to state a good cause of action at common law, or, at least, we have discovered no good reason why it does not do so. We have given the subject, however, but very little critical examination, as we do not consider it to be our duty to assist either party by laboriously hunting for weak places in the other party's case. The petition, however, does not seem to state a good cause of action against the sheriff as bail, under sections 164 and 165 of the Code. Gen. St. 659. This is probably the reason why it is supposed that the petition does not state any cause of action against the sheriff. We think, however, that the only other facts needed, in addition to those already stated, to make the petition a good petition under the Code, as well as at common law, are the following: The petition does not allege that the original case in which the party escaping was arrested was ever prosecuted to final judgment, or that such party had failed to "render himself amenable to the process of the court" on such judgment, (Code, § 159,) or that an execution issued on such judgment against the body of such party had ever been returned "not found," (Code, § 165.) Now, as the petition in this case states a good cause of action at common law, and not a good cause of action under the Code, the only question involved in the case is whether the common-law action in any form still survives. We think it does. While it has, no doubt, been modified to some extent by our laws and institutions, yet we do not think that it has been wholly abolished. Smith v. Knapp, 30 N. Y. 581. According to the weight of authority, we think the damages recoverable in the two actions are different. In the common-law action, as it now exists, only the actual damages sustained can be recovered; while in the action given by the Code the plaintiff may recover as damages the amount of the judgment rendered in the original case, with interest and costs. Code, § 165. The common-law action, as it now exists, is analogous to the old common-law action on the case for an escape. The action under the Code for an escape is analogous to the old action of debt under the English statutes for an escape.

With these views, it follows that the judgment of the court below must be reversed. The cause will therefore be remanded to the court below, with the order that the demurrer to the petition be overruled, and for further proceedings. Judgment reversed.

GEORGE W. BARKLEY and another v. STATE OF KANSAS.

July Term, 1875.

1. Pleadings: Sufficiency of Petition: When and How Questioned.

Where the question of the sufficiency of a petition is raised for the first time by an objection to the introduction of any evidence under it, and not raised otherwise, courts will always construe the allegations of the petition very liberally, so as to sustain the petition if it can be sustained; and if anything should intervene between the filing of the petition and the final rendering of the judgment which could, by a fair and reasonable intendment, be construed to cure the defective allegations of the petition, the courts will hold that such defective allegations are thereby cured. [Hoge v. Norton, 22 Kan. 379; Reeve v. Downs, Id. 334; Grandstaff v. Brown, 23 Kan. 178; Barons v. Brown, 25 Kan. 411; State v. School-district, 8 Pac. Rep. 211.]

- 2. ———. Therefore, where the petition alleges and shows that the instrument sued on was an obligation of the defendants, in the form of a criminal recognizance taken by a justice of the peace on a preliminary examination in a criminal proceeding, requiring the appearance of one of the defendants at the next term of the district court to answer to the charge of embezzlement, and designated the instrument as a "recognizance," and alleged that the defendants were, at the said next term of the district court, "three times solemnly called, but came not, and made default, and thereby forfeited their recognizance;" and where the evidence clearly shows that not only the recognizance, but all the other papers connected with said preliminary examination, were duly filed in the district court before said default or forfeiture occurred, and long before the suit on the recognizance was commenced, and no objection was made in the district court to said petition for insufficiency, except by objecting to the introduction of any evidence under it: held, that the supreme court will
- *100 not reverse the judgment of the district court rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, on said recognizance, merely because said petition did not in terms allege that said recognizance had ever been filed in the district court.

- 3. ———: Recognizance: Name: Variance. Where the petition alleges that the defendant G. W. Barkley as principal, and the defendant George Patterson as surety, executed the recognizance sued on, and that they made default in not complying with the conditions of their recognizance,—the petition giving a copy of the recognizance in full; and the record of the subsequent proceedings in the case shows that the defendant Barkley made his appearance in the case both under the name of "G. W. Barkley" and "George W. Barkley," and the record of the default and forfeiture shows that "George Barkley" as principal, and George Patterson as surety, made the default; and the recognizance is so described in said last-mentioned record—the date, the amount, the name of the justice before whom the recognizance was taken, the parties thereto, and other matters descriptive thereof being given—that there can be no possible doubt but that the persons who executed the recognizance, and who are now sued thereon, made the default charged against them: held, that the variance in the name of the defendant Barkley, as stated in the petition, and as stated in the record of said default, is not material.

- 4. Recognizance: Entering Default. It is not necessary, in a suit upon a forfeited recognizance, that it should be shown that the default or forfeiture was ever in fact entered of record. Ingram v. State, 10 Kan. *680. The material question in such a case is whether a default was actually made or not; and therefore an answer that merely alleges that there is no record of such default or forfeiture states no defense.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Bourbon district court.

Action brought by the county attorney, in the name of the state as plaintiff, against G. W. Barkley and George Patterson, upon a forfeited recognizance. The petition filed was as follows:

"The plaintiff herein complains of G. W. Barkley and George Patterson, defendants, and for cause of action says that said defendants, on the twenty-sixth of November, 1872, entered into an obligation with said plaintiff, in the words and figures following, that is to say:

"STATE OF KANSAS, COUNTY OF BOURBON—IN JUSTICE'S COURT, BEFORE
WM. MARGRAVE, Esq., J. P.

"The State of Kansas against G. W. Barkley.—Charge of Embezzlement.

"We, G. W. Barkley as principal, and Geo. Patterson as surety, of Bourbon county, acknowledge ourselves to owe and be indebted *101 unto the state *of Kansas in the sum of one thousand dollars, to be levied of our and each of our goods and chattels, lands, and tenements if default be made in the condition following, to-wit: Whereas, the above-named defendant, G. W. Barkley, has been brought before the undersigned, a justice of the peace of said county, charged with having, at said county of Bourbon, on the twenty-ninth of October, 1872, fraudulently embezzled and converted to his own use the sum of $2.800 of the money of his employers, to-wit, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company; and whereas, said justice having held a court for the examination of said defendant on said charge, and having found that said offense has been committed, and that there is probable cause to believe said G. W. Barkley guilty of committing the said offense, has required said defendant to give bail in the above-mentioned sum for his appearance to answer said charge: now, therefore, the condition of this recognizance is such that if the said G. W. Barkley shall personally appear before the district court of Bourbon county, at the next term thereof, to be held in the court-house in the city of Fort Scott, in said county, on the first day of said term, then and there to answer the charge aforesaid, and to abide the order of said district court in the premises, and not depart said court without leave, then this recognizance to be void, otherwise of force.

"G. W. BARKLEY.

"GEORGE PATTERSON.

"Subscribed and acknowledged before me, and taken and approved by me, this twenty-sixth day of November, 1872.

"WM. MARGRAVE, Justice of Peace."

<sup>1</sup>Petition in action on forfeited recognizance held sufficient. Swerdsfeger v. State, 21 Kan. 477. See Gay v. State, 7 Kan. 246, and note.

"And plaintiff further avers that the said G. W. Barkley was legally in custody, charged with the crime of embezzlement, and was discharged from said custody by the reason of his giving said recognizance; and that at the December term, 1872, of said district court for the said county of Bourbon, the same being the next term thereof, on the fifth day of said term, to-wit, on the thirteenth day of December, 1872, the said cause being called for trial, the said G. W. Barkley, being three times solemnly called in open court, came not, but made default therein, and the said George Patterson, being three times solemnly called in open court, and ordered to bring the body of the said G. W. Barkley into court, as by the terms of their said obligation he was bound to do, answered not, but made default therein, and it was thereupon ordered and adjudged by the court that said recognizance be forfeited; wherefore the plaintiff prays judgment against said defendants for the sum of one thousand dollars, and the costs of this action."

Trial at the September term, 1873, of the district court; C. W. B., judge pro tem., presiding. The findings and judgment, appearing in the record of the trial, are as follows:

"And the court having heard all the evidence introduced, *102 *and being fully advised, finds as follows, to-wit: That the recognizance sued upon herein is good and valid in law; that the forfeiture of the said recognizance is in due form, and properly and legally entered. The court further finds that there is due the plaintiff from the defendant, on the forfeiture of the recognizance set out in plaintiff's petition, the sum of $1,000. It was thereupon considered, ordered, and adjudged that the plaintiff have and recover of and from the defendants, G. W. Barkley and George Patterson, the said sum of $1,000 so as aforesaid found due, together with its costs of this action expended, to be taxed."

R. H. Galloway and W. C. Stewart, for plaintiffs in error.

The petition filed in the court below does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against plaintiffs in error. An action on a recognizance is, in contemplation of law, an action on a record, and must be declared on as such. Bridge v. Ford, 7 Mass. 209; People v. Van Eps, 4 Wend. 393; People v. Huggins, 10 Wend. 472. The state should therefore have averred and shown in its petition that a memorandum of the proceedings had before the justice, including the recognizance, was duly certified by the justice to the district court, and that it was there filed by the clerk of said court; all of which is prerequisite to the legal existence of a record in said court,—a fact indispensable to constitute a cause of action in such case,—as well as to the proper averment of the same in such petition. Crim. Code, § 144. It does not appear from the petition that there was any record or certificate of the proceedings had before the justice, or of the recognizance, existing in the court where the petition was filed, at the time of the alleged forfeiture of the recognizance, or at the time of the institution of this action. The petition fails to show that the district court was in possession of the case at the time of the alleged forfeiture, and it utterly fails to allege any record on which said action could be brought. Bacon v. People, 14 Ill. 312. The record alone constitutes the basis upon which the state may proceed in this *103 class of *actions, and such record must therefore be averred in the petition. Gay v. State, 7 Kan. *402; Bridge v. Ford, 7 Mass. 210. But the defendant in error may seek shelter under section 145 of the Criminal Code, which, although it very much relaxes the rule in relation to recognizances so far as the irregularity of the acts of the justice or officer taking the recognizance is concerned, yet cannot be so construed as to relieve the pleader from stating such facts as will show the existence or fact of a filing of the transcript duly certified by the justice, and the filing or record of the recognizance in the court to which the defendant is recognized to appear, at or before the declaration of forfeiture and the institution of suit to collect the penalty. Such a construction would not only nullify section 144 of said act, and render it utterly meaningless, but would remove all necessity for making a record in the district court of the proceedings of an examining court, and of recognizances taken out of court, and thus dispense with all that portion of the statute which is intended to put the court in possession of such cases, and of such jurisdictional facts as will authorize it to declare a forfeiture on default of the recognizers.

The court erred in permitting the plaintiff below to introduce any evidence in support of said petition on the trial of the cause, over the objections of defendants that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. A party cannot be permitted to prove what he does not aver. He cannot be allowed to make another and different case, by the introduction of evidence, from that stated in his petition. He must stand or fall by the case he makes by his pleadings. The plaintiff averred in its petition, substantially, that, at the next term of the district court after the recognizance was taken, the action in which the defendant "George W. Barkley" was recognized to appear, was called, and that said George W. Barkley was called, as was George Patterson, his surety, and that, both making default, their recognizance was forfeited. The defendants answered separately. Both pleaded nul tiel record as to the recognizance, and the forfeiture thereof, to which Barkley adds a *104 general denial of the entire peti*tion. Upon the issues thus formed the plaintiff below offered in evidence on the trial a journal entry or record purporting to be an entry of a forfeiture of a recognizance of "George Barkley" and George Patterson, while the petition described the parties therein referred to as "George W. Barkley" and George Patterson. The plea of nul tiel record put in issue the existence of the identical record and journal entry set out and described in the petition. The defendants objected to the introduction of the record offered, on the ground of variance, and on the further ground that the evidence offered did not support or tend to prove the allegations of the petition. The journal entry offered was clearly not the record declared on, but another and different one, and therefore incompetent. A record such as that in question must be strictly proved as alleged. Whitaker v. Bramson, 2 Paine, C. C. 209; Bar-ringer v. Boyd, 27 Miss. 473; Central Bank v. Veasey, 14 Ark. 672; Lockwood v. Jones, 7 Conn. 434; Jordan v. Hyatt, 3 Barb. 279. The variance was material. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 60, 64, 66, 70; Lawrence v. Willoughby, 1 Minn. 87, (Gil. 65;) Smith v. Smith, 17 Ill. 482; Torbet v. Coffin, 6 Ohio, 274; State v. Dudley, 7 Wis. 664; Com. v. Brown, 2 Gray, 358; Moore v. Com., 6 Metc. 243. It certainly needs no argument to prove that "George Barkley" is not "George W. Barkley." The want of identity is palpable, and a record of a judgment against "George Barkley" is no proof of an alleged judgment against "George W. Barkley." Com. v. Perkins, 1 Pick. 388; Com. v. Hall, 8 Pick. 262; Price v. State, 19 Ohio, 423; O'Brien v. People, 41 Ill. 456. No amendment of the petition was asked for, and none could be made, as an amendment of the petition so as to conform its allegations to the proof of forfeiture would necessarily have created a similar variance between the petition and the recognizance. The petition and recognizance described the Barkley in them mentioned as "George W. Barkley," while the journal entry of forfeiture offered describes the Barkley therein referred to as George Barkley in the title, and in every recital therein contained. There was therefore not only a material variance, but a failure of proof in general scope and meaning. Civil Code, § 135. There was no proof, and the record offered did not tend to prove the default of George W. Barkley, or the forfeiture of his recognizance, the most material allegation in the petition.

*105 *The defendants requested the court to make separate findings of the conclusions of law and fact, which it was, on request, bound to do. Civil Code, § 290. But the court utterly failed and refused to find conclusions of fact, whether George W. Barkley was discharged by reason of his giving the recognizance sued on, and whether George W. Barkley failed to appear in the district court at the term to which he was recognized; and it failed to find whether the principal recognizor, George W. Barkley, was in legal custody when the recognizance was given, and whether his recognizance was legally and duly forfeited.

J. N. Binford, Co. Atty., for defendant in error.

The issues as made by plaintiffs in error admit the execution of the recognizance, and all it recites, to-wit: That Barkley was in legal custody; that he was charged with a public offense; that he was discharged therefrom by reason of the giving of said recognizance; that Patterson undertook that Barkley should appear before the district court at the December term, 1872; that the said recognizance was subscribed and acknowledged before and approved by the committing magistrate. Plaintiffs in error rest their argument entirely on the theory that it is absolutely necessary that the state declare upon a record of the district court. This theory is not sustained either on principle or authority. Crim. Code, §§ 153, 154; Gay v. State, 7 Kan. *402. The petition alleges that the said G. W. Barkley was legally in custody, charged with a public offense; that he was discharged therefrom by reason of the giving of the said recognizance. The recognizance is set out in hæc verba, and is made a part of the petition, and shows that the surety undertook that the defendant Barkley should personally appear before the district court for trial for such offense. That is sufficient. Crim. Code, § 154; Lawrence v. People, 17 Ill. 174; Gay v. State, 7 Kan. *394; McLaughlin v. State, 10 Kan. *581; Ingram v. State, Id. *630. The petition further alleges that the said Barkley wholly failed to appear, but made default.

It is true that the plaintiff's cause of action is, in one sense *106 *of the word, a record; but the recognizance is that record; and sections 153 and 154 of the Criminal Code show that the recognizance is the cause of action per se. The defendants, by entering into and signing the recognizance, admit all the facts set out in the recognizance, and make their own record of the same,—the jurisdiction of the justice, the legal custody, the charge of the offense, and the discharge of the defendant by giving the recognizance, and that the defendants were bound for the personal appearance of the said G. W. Barkley at the court therein mentioned. O'Brien v. People, 41 Ill. 459. The default was not denied by the defendants' answers. The proof of default is shown by the entire record of the district court.

Barkley was arrested, examined, held to bail, gave his written recognizance, obligated himself to appear at court, and was discharged as "G. W. Barkley." Suit was brought, and service had in this action on "G. W. Barkley." He appears by his attorneys, and answers in this action as George W. Barkley. There is but one Barkley in the entire proceedings, so there can be no confusion of names, and no doubt as to who is meant. The plaintiffs in error do not deny that default was made by G. W. Barkley on said recognizance. The journal entry of the default, by the oversight of the clerk of the court, described the said Barkley as "George Barkley." If this supposed variance is not fully explained by the record, still the plaintiffs in error did not below, nor do they now, show how or in what respect they were misled or prejudiced. Civil Code, §§ 133, 140.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action on a criminal recognizance; and, while some of the proceedings on the part of the plaintiff below (defendant in error) may not have been technically as exact as they might have been, yet we think no substantial error was committed by the court below.

It is objected that the petition below did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This objection was made for *107 the first time in the court below by objecting to the *introduction of any evidence under it. Such an objection, made at such a time and in such manner, is never favored by the courts. Mitchell v. Milhoan, 11 Kan. *617, *625, *626, and cases there cited. Justice would be better subserved if the question of the sufficiency of the petition were always raised and determined before the commencement of the trial. Hence, where the question of the sufficiency of a petition is raised for the first time, and only, by an objection to the introduction of any evidence under it, courts will always construe the allegations of the petition very liberally, so as to sustain the petition if it can be sustained; and if anything should intervene between the filing of the petition and the final rendering of the judgment which could, by a fair and reasonable intendment, be construed to cure the defective allegations of the petition, the courts will hold that such defective allegations are thereby cured. See same case as above, and other cases there cited, and Irwin v. Paulett, 1 Kan. *418. The only objection urged against the petition in this case is that it does not in terms allege that said recognizance was ever filed in the district court as required by law, (see Crim. Code, §§ 41, 64, 144;) and therefore it is claimed that the petition does not show that said supposed recognizance ever became a record, or that it ever in fact became a recognizance; for, as is claimed, a recognizance is merely "an obligation of record." Morrow v. State, 5 Kan. *566; Gay v. State, 7 Kan. *394, *402; State v. Weatherwax, 12 Kan. *463, *465.

The instrument sued on in this case was an obligation of the defendants below, in the form of a criminal recognizance, taken by a justice of the peace on a preliminary examination in a criminal proceeding requiring the appearance of the defendant George W. Barkley at the next term of the district court to be held in Bourbon county, to answer to the charge of embezzlement. The petition designates this instrument as a "recognizance." It was in form a recognizance.

And the petition further alleged that the said Barkley and his *108 surety, the other defendant, George *Patterson, were at said next term of the district court three times solemnly called, but came not, and made default, and thereby forfeited their "recognizance." Now, according to the theory of the plaintiffs in error, (defendants below,) they could not have made default, or forfeited their "recognizance," if the instrument sued on had not, at the time of the supposed default and forfeiture, been filed in the district court; for in that case it would not have been a "record," and therefore would not have been a recognizance, and therefore could not have been forfeited as such. But the petition does allege that the defendants did make "default," and did "forfeit their recognizance;" and therefore, if the theory of the defendants below is correct, the petition does allege, inferentially and by implication, that the instrument sued on had been filed in the district court and had become a record and a recognizance. This allegation would not, of course, have been considered sufficient if it had been attacked by a demurrer, or motion to make more definite and certain; but it is certainly sufficient under the circumstances of this case. It was cured by the evidence subsequently introduced, and by the findings and judgment of the court below. The evidence clearly shows that not only the recognizance, but all the other papers connected with the preliminary examination, were duly filed in the district court before said default or forfeiture had occurred, and long before this suit was brought. It is doubtful, however, whether the theory of the defendants below is correct, and more doubtful whether any allegation of the filing of the recognizance is required. Crim. Code, § 154. But even if correct, and the allegation necessary, still the defective allegations of the petition were cured by the evidence, findings, and judgment. The execution of the recognizance was not put in issue by any pleading verified by an affidavit, and therefore, under section 108 of the Civil Code, the execution of the recognizance must be taken as admitted. Ingram v. State, 10 Kan. *680, *686. Whether the execution of the recognizance means merely the execution of the same before the *109 magistrate, or whether it means that and also the filing of *the same in the district court, we need not now determine. Probably under the pleadings in this case judgment should have been rendered for the plaintiff on the pleadings.

It is claimed that there was a substantial variance in the proof and the allegations of the petition. The alleged variance is that the petition alleges that "G. W. Barkley" made default in not complying with the condition of his recognizance, while the proof shows that it was "George Barkley" who made the default. Now, the petition alleges that "G. W. Barkley" as principal, and George Patterson as surety, executed the recognizance sued on, and that they made the default; the petition giving a copy of the recognizance in full. The record of the subsequent proceedings in this case shows that the defendant Barkley made his appearance in this case both under the name of "G. W. Barkley" and "George W. Barkley;" and the record of the default and forfeiture shows that "George Barkley" as principal, and George Patterson as surety, made the default. And the recognizance is so described in said last-mentioned record (the date, the amount, the name of the justice before whom the recognizance was taken, the parties thereto, and other matters descriptive thereof being given) that there can be no possible doubt but that the persons who executed the recognizance, and who are now sued thereon, made the default charged against them; and all this may properly be shown, although slight differences in giving the name of some of the parties may occur in the different records. Gay v. State, 7 Kan. *394; O'Brien v. People, 41 Ill. 456.

But there are other reasons why the findings and judgment of the court below upon this particular matter should not be disturbed. The plaintiff alleged in its petition below that the defendants made said default. The defendant Patterson did not in any manner deny this. Upon this point he simply alleged in his answer that there was no record of the default or forfeiture. Such an answer states no defense.

It is not material, in a suit upon a forfeited recognizance, that *110 it be shown that the default or *forfeiture was ever in fact entered of record. Crim. Code, § 154; Ingram v. State, 10 Kan. *630. The only material question in such a case is whether a default was actually made or not. Of course, a record of every default should be made. Crim. Code, § 152. But so, also, should a record of every compliance with the recognizance be made, (Crim. Code, § 138;) but still the mere failure on the part of the clerk to make such record would hardly interfere with the substantial rights of any party. The defendant Barkley was in default in this case for want of an answer to the plaintiff's petition. He therefore "asked and obtained leave of the court to file a similar answer to that filed for the defendant Patterson, and the same is [was] filed accordingly." The remarks already made with reference to the answer of Patterson will equally apply to this answer of Barkley, for the two answers are precisely alike. But afterwards Barkley filed another answer. He filed his second answer without any leave of the court or consent of the plaintiff. It contained a general denial of all the allegations of the plaintiff's petition. Whether the court below took any notice of this second answer or not we cannot tell. Probably the court did not.

But there is still another obstacle in the way of the plaintiff in error, which obstacle will not only reach to the question now under consideration, but will also reach to every question which we may hereafter discuss in this case. It is not shown in any proper way that all the evidence that was submitted to the court below has been brought to this court. The record brought to this court is a transcript of the record of the proceedings of the court below; it is not a "case made" for the supreme court, nor a copy of any such "case made;" and hence we can consider nothing therein contained except what property belonged to or was made a part of the record of the proceedings of the court below. Now, there is nothing in the record of the proceedings of the court below that shows that all the evidence has been preserved, or brought to this court. In the record *111 *brought to this court, with the other papers attached to the petition in error, we have the following: First, the proceedings which go into the record without any special order of the court; second a bill of exceptions ordered to be made a part of the record, and signed by the judge who tried the cause; third, then comes a certificate of the judge who tried the cause, who was merely a judge pro tem., not embodied in a bill of exceptions, not ordered to be made a part of the record, not a journal entry, not any proceeding of the court, as a court, which certifies "that said bill of exceptions contains and refers to all the evidence offered on the trial of said action;"

fourth, then comes the usual certificate of the clerk appended to such records. Such a certificate as the one signed by the judge is unknown to any practice of the law that we are acquainted with, (Bartlett v. Feeney, 11 Kan. *594;) and there is nothing except said certificate that pretends to show how much of the evidence was brought to this court. Now, for the purpose of promoting justice, all courts are generally very liberal in construing irregular modes of getting cases into court, or irregular modes of presenting questions for the consideration of the court. But we are not aware that any court has ever felt itself bound to resort to far-fetched presumptions for the purpose of defeating justice. Therefore, where parties are attempting to defeat justice by mere technicalities, they ought to be careful to have the record of the proceedings made so technically exact that everything favorable to themselves should be affirmatively shown.

The special findings of the court we think are sufficient. It is true, the court might have entered into greater detail in stating the facts found if it had chosen to do so; but as the plaintiffs in error did not point out any specific matters upon which they desired further or more definite findings to be made, and did not express any desire that the court should go into any greater detail in its findings, we think the findings as they were made are sufficient. Besides, *112 as we have before said, it is probable that judgment *should have been rendered for the plaintiff on the pleadings; but, as the pleadings of both the plaintiff and the defendants were defective, we do not now wish to decide that question. The evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the findings and judgment of the court below. The recitals of the recognizance, which were admissions on the part of the defendants, were of themselves sufficient evidence prima facie to show that Barkley was in legal custody when the recognizance was entered into.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

JOSEPH McCrum and others v. AMANDA CORBY, Ex'x, etc.

July Term, 1875.

1. New Trial: Conflicting Evidence: Review in Supreme Court.

Where the district court has set aside the verdict of a jury, and granted a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence, and there appears to have been conflicting testimony upon all the essential facts, this court will not reverse the ruling of the district court, and order judgment on the verdict. [Day v. Harris, 23 Kan. 217; Brown v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 29 Kan. 189.]

2. ———: Effect of Order. Where, in addition to the general verdict, answers are returned by the jury to particular questions, a motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, if sustained, sweeps away both verdict and answers, and leaves the case as though no trial had been had.

Error from Doniphan district court.

Action by Amanda Corby, as executrix, etc., plaintiff, against McCrum and three others, defendants. This action was once before in this court, and is reported in 11 Kan. *464. A new trial of the case was had in the district court at the March term, 1874. On the trial, findings of fact were submitted to the jury, and a general verdict for the defendants returned. *A motion was made by the plaintiffs to set aside the verdict, and was sustained, and a new trial ordered. From this order of the district court the defendants appeal.

The action was brought to foreclose notes and mortgage executed by Willis J. Vancuren and Henrietta Vancuren to H. W. Boone. They were made payable to order, and were not indorsed. The petition alleged "that on the twenty-sixth of November, 1865, said Boone sold, transferred, and delivered said notes," etc. Vancuren and wife answered, admitting the execution of the notes and mortgage, but denied all other allegations of the petition. They further answered that in April, 1869, at a term of the district court for Doniphan county, Willis J. Vancuren confessed a judgment on said notes and mortgage in favor of H. W. Boone; that, at the time of the confession of said judgment, said Vancuren had no notice of any transfer of said notes to said John Corby, plaintiff's testator; that afterwards said McCrum became the assignee of said judgment; and that before the commencement of this action he paid large sums of money on said judgment, and without any knowledge of any claim of Corby; and averring that, at the time of such payment, said Corby was not the owner and holder of said notes. Boone answered by a general denial. McCrum answered, by general denial, that the notes sued upon were, in February, 1869, deposited with John Corby, who was a banker at St. Joseph, Missouri, for safe-keeping; and setting up the judgment recovered by Boone on the notes, and the transfer of the judgment to him, and praying a foreclosure of the mortgage as against Henrietta Vancuren. Replies to these several answers by denial were filed. [Before the commencement of this suit an action had been commenced by Vancuren and wife against McCrum and others, by injunction, to restrain the collection of his judgment, which action was consolidated with this. At the March term, 1874, the order consolidating said action with this was set aside, and that action dismissed.]

On the trial, one Culligan, for plaintiff, testified that in 1866 these notes were deposited with John Corby as collateral security for money loaned by Corby to Boone, and for advances of money that Corby should make to Boone from time to time; that, about a year after, Boone deposited with Corby notes of one Robbins for a like purpose; that Boone has not yet paid all the indebtedness for which these notes were pledged; that on November 28, 1868, Boone executed for his indebtedness to Corby a note of $2,437.56, which is now due, except the sum of $256 paid by Robbins on one of his notes in Corby's hands, and that Boone also executed a mortgage on property in St. Joseph to secure this note; that the property in St. Joseph was worth about $2,500; that the property in St. Joseph was incumbered by deeds of trust to Boylan, to O'Keefe, and Devors; that in 1869 the property in St. Joseph was advertised for sale under the Boylan deed of trust; that Corby purchased said Boylan, Devors, and O'Keefe notes, stopped the sale, and immediately sold it under his deed of trust, subject to the other deeds of trust, and Corby became the purchaser. The testimony of the defendants showed the judgment recovered on these notes. The testimony of McCrum, the purchase of the judgment without notice of any claim of Corby; that, after such transfer, Vancuren paid on said judgment $273.47. Willis J. Vancuren testified that he had no knowledge or notice, at the time the judgment was confessed, that the notes were owned or controlled or in the possession of Corby. Boone testified that these notes were deposited with Corby as security for the delivery to Corby of St. Joseph city bonds, upon which advances of money were being made by Corby to him; that the agreement was that the notes were to be returned to him when the bonds should be delivered; that the bonds were delivered. Boone also testified that when the note of $2,437.56 was executed, and a mortgage to secure it, it was the understanding and agreement between him and Corby that Corby had no lien on the Vancuren note or the Robbins notes. Boone testifies that a settlement was had with Culligan, Corby's clerk, in February, 1869, and the St. Joseph city bonds were then all delivered; that the *115 package *containing the notes was handed him by Culligan, and they were returned, to be kept at the bank for him. Two witnesses testify to the same fact. The jury, in their findings of fact, found that Vancuren, at the time of the confession of judgment, had no notice of any claim of Corby to the notes; that McCrum, at the time he purchased the judgment, had no notice of any claim of Corby to the notes; that at the time of the execution of the $2,437.56 note, and the mortgage to secure it, the Vancuren notes were released. They found that the $2,437.56 note was executed in Missouri, and upon usurious interest.

The court set aside the verdict and granted a new trial on the ground that it believed Culligan rather than Boone. It had no legal authority to grant a new trial in the case, and the order is reviewable. Com. v. Manson, 2 Ashm. 31; State Bank v. Hunter, 1 Dev. 107; Bobb v. Lambdin, 7 Mo. 601; White v. Trinity Church, 5 Conn. 187; Norwich & W. R. Co. v. Cahill, 18 Conn. 484; 4 Gilmore, 11; Houghton v. Slack, 10 Vt. 520. A discretion of a court is a sound legal discretion. Reab v. McAlister, 8 Wend. 114.

A court can set aside a verdict and grant a new trial because the verdict is against the evidence, or the weight of evidence. But when, upon a question which is decisive against either party, there is evidence on one side to support a verdict, and none on the other side, and a verdict is returned for the party who has offered evidence, it is error to set aside the verdict. 3 Grah. & W. New Trials, 1284, 1312; Rathbone v. Stanton, 6 Barb. 141; Noyes v. Hewitt, 18 Wend. 141; Hope v. Deaderick, 8 Humph. 1; Sweany v. Bledsoe, Id. 612; Elswick v. Newsom's Adm'r, 9 Dana, 260; Grimke v. Houseman, 1 McMul. 131; Hall v. Page, 4 Ga. 428; Williams v. Brasfield, 9 Yerg. 270; Kincaid v. Turner, 2 Gilman, 618; Pell v. Grigg, 4 Cow. 426. The jury found that at the time of the execution of the note of $2,437.56, and mortgage to secure it, (which note embraced all the indebtedness of Boone to Corby,) it was the intention to release the notes Corby had of Boone in his hands. Boone swears that such was the agreement between him and Corby. Culligan does not deny it. Boone testifies that Culligan's ground for refusal to give up the notes in March, *116 1869, was that there was *more due on the Boylan note than Boone had represented; and Culligan in his testimony does not deny this. This one fact found against the plaintiff is decisive of the case against her. And in other respects Boone is corroborated.

BREWER, J. The only error complained of in this case is the granting of a new trial. This, under our statute, is doubtless an order which is reviewable; but, as was said in the case of Field v. Kinnear, 5 Kan. *238, "this court will require a much stronger and clearer showing of legal error, or abuse of judicial discretion, before it will interfere when the new trial has been granted than where it has been refused, for the very obvious reason that where a new trial has been granted an opportunity is afforded for another full and fair trial upon the merits of the case; but where it has been refused it operates as a final adjudication between the parties." Here the new trial was granted because, in the judgment of the district court, the verdict was against the evidence. That there was a contradiction in the testimony is conceded. Indeed, it is stated in the record that the court sustained the motion for a new trial upon the ground that it "believed the testimony of Culligan rather than that of Boone." Now, it is peculiarly the province of the trial court to see that the jury have not erred in weighing the testimony. Not unfrequently jurors, little used to the sifting and weighing of evidence, are misled, and give undue importance to some of the testimony, or undue credence to some of the witnesses. It is essential to the due administration of justice that there be some tribunal to correct these errors, and none so competent or fitting as the court who, with them, has listened to all the evidence, seen all the witnesses, noticed all the indications in each witness of truthfulness or falsehood. In the very nature of things, an appellate court, which sees only so much of the case as can be reduced to writing, is wholly inadequate to such a duty. Hence great reliance is placed upon the judgment of the trial court.

*117 When it approves the finding of *the jury, and decides that there was evidence sufficient to sustain it, very rarely is that decision disturbed. The records of this court abundantly show that upon any question of fact that is almost invariably the end of controversy. It is useless to cite cases. On the other hand, when the trial court fails to approve the findings of the jury, this court must, for the same reasons, accept that as the legal and proper conclusion. The number of witnesses does not always decide the weight of evidence; and though Boone's testimony may, as counsel state, have been supported by other witnesses, yet Culligan's solitary testimony may properly have outweighed all on the other side. The district court so thought, and we cannot say there was any error in so holding.

Again, counsel for plaintiff in error contend there was error in the ruling of the district court because the motion for a new trial was not broad enough. The jury returned a general verdict, and with it answers to some questions of fact which had been duly submitted to them. The motion was "to set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial." Nothing was said in the motion about the answers returned by the jury. Counsel claim that, as no motion was made to set them aside, they still stand, and must control any subsequent verdict, and therefore a new trial is unnecessary and improper. We do not so understand the law. When the verdict was set aside and a new trial granted, everything appertaining to the verdict fell; and the case stands for trial as though no trial had ever been had. We see no fact established by undisputed testimony conclusive against the claim of the plaintiff.

The judgment will be affirmed.

*118 *GEORGE H. WINSOR v. GEORGE W. GODDARD and another.

July Term, 1875.

Judgment: Proceedings to Set Aside: Unavoidable Casualty and Misfortune. Where the vacation of a judgment is sought on the ground that, through unavoidable casualty and misfortune, the defendant in the judgment was prevented from making his defense; and where the facts are that defendant left Sumner county, the county of his residence, to go to Miami county, to be absent ten or twelve days, leaving at home his wife and eight children, (the oldest son twenty-one years old,) was detained on the way by sickness for a week, and did not return for a month, and during his absence suit was commenced before a justice, service made at his usual place of residence, judgment taken, but not taken until the fifteenth day of his absence, and the time to appeal past; and where it does not appear that any effort was made by his family to postpone or defend the suit, or take an appeal, or communicate to defendant the fact of the suit, nor for what purpose his trip was taken, whether business or pleasure, nor why he was detained so much longer than he intended, other than by the week's sickness: held, that there was no unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the defendant from making his defense.<sup>1</sup>

Action commenced by Winsor as plaintiff, against George W. Goddard and Byron S. Goddard as defendants, in the district court of Sumner county, to set aside a certain judgment. The venue was changed to Harvey county, where the action was tried at the April term, 1874.

Hackney & McDonald, for plaintiff.

Pendery & Goddard, for defendants.

BREWER, J. In the winter of 1871-72 the defendants in error obtained judgment against the plaintiff in error before one FRANK WISE, a justice of the peace of Sumner county. Winsor was absent from the county at the time of the commencement of the action, *119 and of the judgment, and for more *than ten days thereafter.

Service was made at his usual place of residence. Upon his return he took the judgment up on petition in error, it being too late for an appeal. Both the district and this court affirmed the judgment, there appearing no error in the record. Winsor v. Goddard, 10 Kan. *625. Thereupon he commenced this action, seeking to have the judgment vacated on the ground that it was obtained by fraud on the part of the Goddards, and through unavoidable casualty and misfortune on his part. The district court, before whom the case was tried, found that there was no fraud on the part of the Goddards, and no unavoidable casualty on his part. He now alleges error.

As to the charge of fraud, there is a manifest want of harmony between the testimony on the two sides. The contradiction is so strong and decided as scarcely to be explainable upon any theory of the imperfections of memory. It is more than probable that one side or the other has willfully trespassed on the truth. The district court, with that contradiction before it, found that the charge of fraud was not made out. We cannot, under well-settled rules, reverse that finding. It is supported by clear and positive testimony.

The district court found that there was no unavoidable casualty or misfortune by which Winsor was prevented from defending before the justice. It appeared that Winsor left home on the twentieth of December to go to Miami county, and did not return until the twenty-first of January. He was detained a week at Leroy, by sickness. This was as he was going from his home to Miami county. He claims to have told one of the Goddards, before he left, that he intended to go and be absent ten or twelve days. On the twenty-third of December suit was commenced before the justice. The return-day was the 27th. On that day the plaintiffs appeared, but, the defendant not appearing, the justice of his own motion continued the case to the fourth of January. Then, the defendant still failing to appear, the judgment was taken. Winsor left his family at home.

His family consisted of a wife and eight children; the oldest *120 son being then twenty-one years of age. It does *not appear that any effort was made by any of them either to postpone or defend the action, to take an appeal, or communicate to Winsor news of what was taking place. No other explanation is given of Winsor's absence than the week's detention by sickness. He says he was "otherwise detained;" but whether by business, pleasure, or the difficulties of travel, we are not informed. Indeed, for aught that appears, the whole trip of Winsor may have been merely for pleasure. Under those circumstances, we cannot say that there was any error in the finding of the district court that there was no unavoidable casualty or misfortune which prevented him from defending.

As to the question whether the justice could enter a judgment "by default" upon the bill of particulars, it appears upon the face of the record, and should have been raised on the proceedings in error. It is not now a proper matter for consideration. We do not, however, mean to be understood as holding that the record carries with it necessarily the idea of a judgment rendered without any testimony, but simply that whatever of question there may be should then have been raised. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

The case of Winsor v. Cole is similar, and the same order will there be entered.

A. JAEDICKE v. C. G. SCRAFFORD.

July Term, 1875.

Instructions Inapplicable. There is no error in refusing an instruction which, however good in the abstract, is inapplicable to the facts in the case on trial, as testified to by either party. [Grant v. Pendery, post, *243.]

Error from Washington district court.

*121 Scrafford obtained a judgment against Jaedicke, at the August term, 1874, of the district court, for $200 damages, *for breach of contract for the sale and delivery of corn.

T. J. Humes and J. W. Rector, for plaintiff in error.

S. Conwell and W. C. Webb, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. This was an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract to deliver corn. Two questions are presented by counsel for plaintiff in error in their brief: First, it is claimed that the court erred in ruling out a deposition; and, second, that it improperly refused an instruction.

The undisputed facts are that on the twenty-sixth of December, 1873, the parties made a contract by which plaintiff in error (defendant below) agreed to deliver 2,000 bushels of corn on the cars at Hanover, within thirty days, at thirty cents a bushel. Before the thirty days were passed corn was worth forty cents, and no corn was delivered. At the time of the making of the contract Scrafford gave Jaedicke a check for fifty dollars on the banking-house of Lappin & Scrafford, and Jaedicke signed what was both a receipt and also a memorandum of contract. By the terms of this memorandum two hundred dollars more was to be paid on the delivery of 1,000 bushels, and the balance on the delivery of the other thousand. Scrafford testified that the further agreement was that Jaedicke, when he was ready to deliver the corn, should call upon the station agent at Hanover for the cars, who, by previous arrangement, was to furnish the cars whenever notified. Jaedicke, on the other hand, testified that Scrafford was to procure the cars, and notify him when they were at Hanover ready for the corn. Jaedicke never called on the agent for the cars, and never bought the corn. Upon this disputed testimony the court charged the jury very fairly and clearly. No objection is made to the charge in this respect; indeed none could be.

On the twenty-sixth of January, 1874, Scrafford wrote this letter to Jaedicke:

"DEAR SIR: When you are ready to deliver the corn, call on the station agent at Hanover for the cars. C. G. SCRAFFORD."

This letter was received on the day it was sent. On the twelfth of February, Jaedicke wrote this reply:

"Inclosed please find your draft of fifty dollars. In reply I will state that I must have cash money here to do business with. Therefore I send the draft back. If you will send the money for the draft, the 2,000 bushels of corn are engaged and bargained for, but I cannot buy them without the cash money, and I am not able at present to go ahead, as I have stated."

This letter was directed, with the draft or check previously given by Scrafford inclosed, to "Lappin & Scrafford," but was not taken by them out of the post-office, and subsequently returned to Jaedicke. This last letter, and a deposition of the postmaster at Seneca as to the receipt and return of the letter, and what was said by Scrafford in reference to the refusal to take the letter out of the office, were offered in evidence, and ruled out as irrelevant. The language of the deposition is, "I can't now give the reason assigned by him, but it was something about an anticipated lawsuit about a corn contract with the sender of the letter." This ruling is one of the alleged errors. We fail to see any error in it. Counsel for plaintiff in error contend that the letter of Scrafford was a waiver of the thirty-days clause in the contract, and an offer to extend indefinitely the time for the delivery of the corn, and that the letter of Jaedicke was an acceptance of this offer, and that, therefore, before any action would accrue to Scrafford, he must prove a tender of the money and demand of the corn. We do not think either letter justifies fully the construction placed upon it. While from Scrafford's letter a willingness might be implied to receive the corn, though the thirty days had elapsed, and he testified that he would have been willing, *123 we do not understand it as convey*ing any proposition for a change of the contract. It was properly admitted by the court, as tending to throw light upon the disputed terms of the original contract, but beyond that we think it has no force. Neither the letter of Jaedicke, nor the deposition of the postmaster, throws any light upon the terms of the contract, or affects in any way the right of recovery, or the measure of damages. So far as the testimony of the postmaster in any respect conflicts with that of Scrafford, it was upon a purely collateral matter.

The instruction refused was "that if, by the terms of the contract, the defendant was to deliver to the plaintiff certain corn within thirty days from the making of said contract, and that plaintiff was to pay for said corn at the time of said delivery, then, before plaintiff can recover, he must show that at the expiration of said thirty days he made demand of defendant for said corn, and paid defendant, or tendered him payment, therefor." It was sufficient reason for refusing this instruction that it was inapplicable to the contract as testified to by either party, and omitted matters which in either case were vital to the question of the right to recover.

There being no other error complained of, the judgment must be affirmed.

STATE OF KANSAS v. SIDNEY A. BREESE.

July Term, 1875.

1. Mandamus to Compel Performance of Official Duties: Application for, where Made. An application to compel the performance, by an officer of the district court, of a duty devolving upon him by virtue of such office, should ordinarily be made, in the first instance, to that court.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup>Discretion of court, State v. Anderson Co., 28 Kan. 70; Evans v. Thomas, 32 Kan. 476; S. C. 4 Pac. Rep. 833. When mandamus will or will not lie, see notes to Hussey v. Hamilton, 5 Kan. 278; State v. Stockwell, 7 Kan. 64.

- 2. ———: Power of Supreme Court. While the power of this court is unquestioned, it will generally refuse an application without a showing of satisfactory reasons for not first applying to that court.

*124 *Original motion for mandamus.

The county attorney of Chase county, as relator, filed in this court a petition and motion for a mandamus to compel Breese, as clerk of the Chase district court, to issue a warrant in a criminal action. The petition shows that one J. W. Ferry was, on the twentieth of February, 1875, arrested and brought before a justice of the peace of Chase county on a charge of assault with intent to kill one Daniel Wood; that a preliminary examination was held by the justice, which resulted in binding Ferry over to appear at the next term of the district court, and that in default of giving the required bail he was committed to the county jail; that on the same day he applied to the probate judge of Chase county for a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that he never committed the offense charged, and for which he was held, and that there was an entire absence of probable cause that he committed such offense; that the writ of habeas corpus was granted; that on the fifth of March the county attorney filed an information in the office of the clerk of said district court against said Ferry, charging him with the same offense for which he was bound over by the justice; that on the sixth of February, Ferry had a hearing on his writ of habeas corpus before the probate judge; that the probate judge, upon such hearing, discharged him; that the county attorney then ordered the defendant Breese, as clerk of the district court, to issue a warrant on the information filed; that the clerk refused to issue the warrant. Upon these facts the county attorney asks this court to issue a writ of mandamus to compel the clerk to issue the warrant. The defendant Breese appeared, and admitted that the facts stated in the petition are substantially true, but objects to the issuing a writ of mandamus thereon upon the ground that said petition does not state facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff therein to a writ of mandamus.

S. N. Wood, Co. Atty., in support of the motion.

Ruggles & Sterry, for defendant, contra.

- *125 *BREWER, J. This is an application for a mandamus to compel the defendant, the clerk of the district court of Chase county, to issue certain process. It is addressed, in the first instance, to this court, and no reason is given why the application was not made to the district court. The defendant is an officer of the district court. The duty which he is charged with neglecting is one devolving upon him as such officer. It seems to us there are many reasons why an application to compel him to discharge any of those duties should be addressed in the first instance to that court. There can be no question of the power of that court. It is especially charged with the duty of regulating the proceedings of its own officers. It will tend to promote harmony in those proceedings to have them all controlled by one tribunal. It will prevent conflicting orders. That court is better acquainted with its officers, can more fully appreciate the reasons for their action, and more justly measure the punishment to be awarded in case of disobedience. There are still other considerations of a different nature, which are generally true. The costs of proceedings in this court are greater than those in the district court. The party is compelled to carry on a litigation away from home, and therefore at greater expense. Testimony will be more by deposition, and therefore less satisfactory. We do not doubt the power of this court, and there may be cases where it would be proper for the application to be first made here; and when such cases arise we shall not hesitate to act. But in this case we see nothing to induce a deviation from that course which seems to us ordinarily appropriate and just. The writ of mandamus lies largely within the discretion of the court; and the existence of absolute legal rights in the party, and jurisdiction in the court, does not always compel the issue of the writ. State v. Marston, 6 Kan. *525; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. County of Jefferson, 12 Kan. *127.

*126 The writ will be refused. But this disposition of the case *is not to be taken as an adjudication of the merits of the controversy, or to prevent an appeal to the district court for such adjudication, or to this court a second time, with a showing of sufficient reasons, if any exist, why appeal is not made in the first instance to the district court.

THOMAS YARNOLD and others v. CITY OF LAWRENCE and another.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Municipal Corporations: Powers of: Street Improvements: Patented Pavements. The law of 1868 concerning cities of the second class provided that, before any contract for street improvements should be let, the city engineer should make and submit to the council an estimate of the cost thereof, and that in advertising for bids such estimate should be published. Held, that thereby the city was not precluded from making a valid contract without any advertisement for bids, and was not compelled, in case of an advertisement, to let the contract to the lowest bidder.
2. ———. May not a city, though expressly required to let all contracts to the lowest bidder, let a valid contract for improving its streets by a process covered by a patent, and subject to a monopoly?

<sup>1</sup>Under the laws of Kansas as they existed in 1874 and in 1875, cities of the second class had the power to issue bonds in payment for the building of sidewalks, notwithstanding the fact that the money to be obtained with which to pay said bonds had to be collected as special taxes from the abutting lot-owners; and, after such bonds had been issued and had become due, judgment might properly

3. ———: Street Bonds: Contract for Improvements. A contract by a city of the second class for street improvements may be made payable in the street bonds provided for in section 17 of chapter 62 of the Laws of 1871.
4. ———. In such a case all the proceedings anterior thereto, including the estimate of the cost required of the city engineer, may be had upon the basis of the manner of payment.

Error from Douglas district court.

Injunction brought by Yarnold and fifty-eight other lot-owners of the city of Lawrence as plaintiffs, against said city and the treasurer of Douglas county as defendants, to enjoin the collection of certain special taxes. A temporary injunction granted at the commencement of the action *127 was afterwards, in June, 1873, on defendants' motion, dissolved.

Nelson Cobb and Riggs, Nevison & Simpson, for plaintiffs.

The powers of municipal corporations are strictly construed, (City of Leavenworth v. Rankin, 2 Kan. *357; Paine v. Spratley, 5 Kan. *543; Burnes v. City of Atchison, 2 Kan. *489; Leavenworth v. Norton, 1 Kan. *432;) and, where the corporation exercises a power conferred by statute, it must strictly pursue the power, or its acts are void, (Thompson v. Schermerhorn, 6 N. Y. 92; Cuyler v. Village of Rochester, 12 Wend. 165.) Where a municipal corporation is by law required to let contracts for paving to the lowest bidder, it has no power to let contracts for patent pavements, because that excludes competition. Charleton v. Treasurer, etc., 23 Wis. 590; Harlem v. City of New York, 33 N. Y. 309, 323; Brady v. City of New York, 20 N. Y. 312; Dolan v. City of New York, 4 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 397; Burgess v. City of Jefferson, 21 La. Ann. 143; Nicolson P. Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 389, and note. When law requires officers to advertise for bids, it is their clear duty to let to the lowest responsible bidder. The only object of the bidding is to secure competition. The ordinance of the city which is unrepealed, is a law; and it can be repealed only by ordinance. The statute and ordinance clearly make it the duty of the city government to advertise for bids, and let its contracts to the lowest responsible bidder, (Gen. St. 169, § 81,) and no valid contract could be made without complying with the provision, (Leavenworth v. Ranklin, 2 Kan. *367.) No such estimate as the law requires was made by the city engineer. The estimate was of the costs of the pavement, including royalty on the patent-right, and payable in bonds of the city, without estimate of the value of the bonds.

There is no authority for making the contract payable in bonds. There is no authority for doing so in any case. The authority for issuing street bonds to contractors performing work, or furnishing mabe rendered on them against the city, notwithstanding the fact that the city had properly levied special taxes against the abutting lot-owners to raise funds with which to pay such bonds, and notwithstanding the fact that such special taxes had not yet been collected. Wyandotte v. Zeitz, 21 Kan. 649.

materials, does not authorize the making of contracts for work payable in bonds to pay an indebtedness existing against the city. That clause (subdivision 38, p. 166) is qualified by section 32, p. 169, providing that bonds shall not be sold for less than 90 cents on the dollar. *128 If bonds could be contracted to be taken in payment in a contract for work and materials, this provision would be entirely evaded, and no check on the power of the public agent as to the price of bonds would remain. If they desire to dispose of bonds at fifty cents discount, they can do so. The law must be so construed as to carry out its policy, and prevent the disposition of bonds at a sacrifice of over ten per cent. Starin v. Town of Genoa, 23 N. Y. 439, 453, 458; Gould v. Town of Sterling, 1 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 290. Authority to borrow money to pay, is not an authority to issue bonds in payment. Navigation Co. v. Commissioners of New Bern, 7 Jones, 275. The city having no authority to issue such bonds, they were void, and the assessment to pay them is void. Commissioners of Shawnee Co. v. Carter, 2 Kan. *115. The assessment being illegal, injunction may properly be granted to restrain its collection. Code, § 253; and see People v. County of Tazewell, 22 Ill. 147; Bates v. Sutherland, 15 Johns. 510; Norton v. Dow, 10 Ill. 461; Hawley v. Truax, 21 Barb. 361.

The principal question is whether a municipal corporation has in this state the right to use a patent process of street pavement or not. Upon principle it would seem that there should be no question, unless the use was expressly prohibited by plain legislative enactment. Patents are issued to individuals for meritorious inventions, and the world would go back many years if to-day we could be deprived of all use of articles for the invention of which patents have been issued. The hand-sickle would take the place of the reaper; the ox, with his tread, would replace the thrasher; the wooden plow would again scratch the ground; the steam-engine would vanish; the post-boy replace the telegraph; and the man who would think of paving the place where Massachusetts street now is, would be justly laughed at as a visionary schemer. And, while the world advances, can there be a reason why municipalities should stand still? Is there anything compelling them to do so, short of the coercion of the legislature? It is not charged that such legislation exists, except inferentially in compelling the advertising for proposals. But the statute un-*129 der which the most of the acts in *ascertaining and assessing these special taxes were done, and under which all were so done which affect this question, contains no provision whatever requiring the contract to be let to the lowest bidder; nor did the statute require the city government to seek for competition in any form. Laws 1871, p. 149. The plaintiffs are then bereft of their whole argument. The city government is given full power, in their discretion, to make the improvement. They have exercised that discretion, have even gone the full length of advertising for proposals for various kinds of pavements, and have accepted such proposal as they deemed best for the interest of the city. Even had they been compelled by statute to so advertise, and to let the work to the lowest bidder, their action is legal, and will be upheld. Bruyn v. Comstock, 56 Barb. 1; Hobart v. City of Detroit, 17 Mich. 246; In re Ford, 6 Lans. 92; In re Dugro, 50 N. Y. 513.

BREWER, J. Plaintiffs in error (plaintiffs below) brought their action in the district court of Douglas county, seeking to restrain the defendants from selling their property for the non-payment of certain special taxes, and obtained, without notice, a temporary injunction. Subsequently, upon motion, the injunction was dissolved, and this ruling is the matter brought here for review. Two or three important questions are presented. One, and perhaps the most important, is this: The tax in dispute was for the pavement of Massachusetts street, in the city of Lawrence, with the Wyckoff pavement. It is insisted that this pavement, being covered by a patent, excludes competition, and that, therefore the city, which was by law obliged to let all contracts to the lowest bidder, had no power to let a contract for such an improvement. The right of a city to avail itself of patented inventions in the improvement of its streets, etc., where the law required the letting of contracts to the lowest bidder, has been before the courts of several states, and the adjudications thereon are not uniform. In Wisconsin, California, and Louisiana the right has *130 been denied; while in Michigan and New York it has *been sustained. Dean v. Charlton, 28 Wis. 590; Nicolson Pavement Co. v. Painter, 85 Cal. 699; Burgess v. Jefferson City, 21 La. Ann. 143; Hobart v. City of Detroit, 17 Mich. 246; Matter of Dugro, 50 N. Y. 513. These cases are alike in these matters: That in each the precise question was as to the power of the city to charge the cost of the improvements on the adjacent lots, and also that the city was expressly required to let the contract to the lowest bidder. They differ in these respects: In Wisconsin it is provided that the estimates of total cost and expense to each lot shall be filed in the office of the city clerk, time fixed for doing the work, and notice thereof given to the lot-owners. If the work is not done by the lot-owners within that time, then it may be let by contract to the lowest bidder. In California the bids are opened and the work awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. Then notice is published of the award, and the owners of a major portion of frontage may take the contract upon the same terms. If they fail to take the contract within the specified time, it is then finally given to the party to whom it was first awarded. In both these states, therefore, it will be noticed that special provision is made for securing to lot-owners the privilege of doing the work themselves,—a privilege the courts consider of no value if the contemplated improvement is covered by a patent, and can only be made by the patentee, or such person as he chooses to permit. In Louisiana the court notices and lays stress on the fact that the city may, under the general grant of power to improve, etc., avail itself of any patent, by making the cost of such improvement a charge on the general funds of the corporation; and is only restricted to contract with the lowest bidder when it seeks to throw the cost of the improvement on the adjacent lot-owners; while in New York and Michigan there is a general restriction on the power of the city to enter into contracts above a specified amount without letting them to the lowest bidder; thus, as the courts say, if the doctrine announced in the other courts be correct, cutting off the *131 city from the right to avail itself of those improvements *in pavements, sidewalks, etc., which the genius of our inventors is constantly discovering, until after the expiration of the patents therefor.

The question is a doubtful one, and one on which courts will continue to differ. The writer of this opinion is inclined to favor the views of the courts in Michigan and New York upon this question. There is, however, such a distinction between the case before us and those cited as will enable us to dispose of it without definitely deciding this question. In each of those cases there was an express direction that the contract be let to the lowest bidder, and upon that rested the argument of the courts. Here there is no such express direction; nor is it, we think, necessarily implied from any of the express directions. Section 31, c. 19, Gen. St. 1868, p. 169, is the section from which the implication is claimed. That section provides that, prior to any contract, the city engineer shall make and submit to the council an estimate of the cost, and that in advertising for bids the amounts of such estimate shall be published. Counsel contend that the city is required to advertise for bids, and that, therefore, when the bids are received, she must let to the lowest bidder. We dissent from both premise and conclusion. The section does not declare that before any contract is let an advertisement shall be made for bids. It simply says that "in advertising for bids" certain things shall be published. Requiring that, when an advertisement is made, certain things shall be published, is by no means equivalent to requiring that advertisement be made in all cases. We see no reason to doubt the right of the city, under that section, to make a valid contract without any advertisement. Nor does it necessarily follow from the fact of an advertisement for bids, that the contract must be let to the lowest bidder. There is a strong implication that such ought to be the result, but it is not the necessary legal conclusion. We think, therefore, that the contract in question must, under the law in force at the time it was made, be sustained.

Another important question is as to the power to pay, and to *132 contract to pay, for such improvements, in bonds. The *contract provided for the payment in bonds, one-third payable in one year, one-third in two, and the balance in three years; and the entire transaction, from the first resolution of the council to the acceptance of the work, seems to have proceeded upon the idea of payment in such manner. It is earnestly contended that this was beyond the power of the city. By paragraph 38 of section 30 of the act of 1868 incorporating cities of the second class, (Gen. St. 166,) such cities are authorized "to issue, from time to time, street bonds to contractors * * * on such terms and in such manner as the council may provide." This, it is contended, is limited by a clause in section 32 of same act which declares that "the mayor and council shall have no power to sell or dispose of scrip, orders, or bonds at less than ninety cents on the dollar." If the city may legally contract for labor to be paid for in bonds, this prohibition is practically nullified, and the city disposes of its bonds at just such a value as the contractor places upon them. Therefore all contracts must be made upon the basis of payment in cash, though, after the debt has been contracted, it may be settled by the city, by the issue of its bonds therefor at ninety cents on the dollar. But section 30 was repealed in 1871, (Laws 1871, p. 166, § 81,) and in lieu thereof upon this matter this was enacted: "The assessments [those like the one in question] shall be known 'as special assessments for improvements,' and except as hereinafter provided shall be levied and collected as one tax. * * * But the mayor and council shall have power to issue the bonds of the city for the costs of paving, * * * to be made payable as follows: One-third of the aggregate amount of such bonds of any issue in one year; * * * and, for the payment of said bonds, assessments shall be made in each year," etc. Laws 1871, p. 149, § 17.

Now, the purpose and scope of this enactment was to grant authority to a city to distribute over three years the burden of street improvements. That being the obvious purpose, it is both fair and legal that the city should contract with reference to this authorized mode of payment. It is just to the lot-owners, that they may

*133 know whether to encourage or ob*ject to the proposed improvement; for they might well object to that, the cost of which must be met in a single year, when they would gladly indorse the same work if they could have three years in which to pay for it. It is just to all bidders for the contract, for often the time and manner is as important as the fact and amount of the payment. It must be borne in mind that these bonds are to be paid in the same way, and out of the same property, as though the improvement was paid for in a single year, and by one assessment; so that, though these instruments issued to the contractor are called bonds of the city, yet they are not, like ordinary obligations, primarily chargeable upon its entire property, while the "scrip, orders, and bonds" spoken of in section 32 are doubtless its ordinary and general obligations. We think, therefore, that the city might legally contract for the street improvement upon the basis of payment in the manner provided in the contract before us. It would seem, therefore, to follow that all the other proceedings, including the estimate of the engineer required by section 81, (Gen. St. p. 169,) should be had upon the same basis. These are the principal questions in the record as presented by counsel, and, in them appearing no error, the judgment will be affirmed.

It is understood that the same questions are involved in the case of McCurdy v. City of Lawrence, and therefore the same judgment must be entered in that case.

GEORGE E. HUTCHINSON and others v. MAURICE HARTTMANN.

July Term, 1875.

1. Conveyances: Title: Unrecorded Deeds: Possession. A deed executed September 24, 1855, and never recorded in the county register's office, has never had any validity as against a subsequent innocent bona fide purchaser from the same grantor, for a valuable consideration *134 actually paid, where such subsequent purchaser has taken possession of the property under his purchase, and has had his deed duly recorded.
2. Notice: Public Record: What Notice It Imparts. The record of a quitclaim deed executed May 2, 1861, and recorded December 5, 1861, simply gives notice of the existence and contents of such deed to all subsequent purchasers from the same grantor. It does not give notice to any person that such grantor had any right to the property, nor does it give notice to any person of any prior unrecorded deeds constituting a chain of title to said grantor.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Douglas district court.

Action by Harttmann, as plaintiff, to quiet title to a lot occupied and claimed by him. Both parties claimed title in fee, and from the same common grantor. The district court, at the November term, 1872, gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the Hutchinsons, defendants, bring the case here for review.

Riggs, Nevison & Simpson and Wilson Shannon, for plaintiffs in error.

The only evidence offered by plaintiffs in error, and objected to by Harttmann, on the ground that it was secondary, and not the best evidence, was admitted by the court, and no exception was taken by Harttmann. The objection that such evidence, or any part of it, was secondary, cannot, therefore, be made here. Plaintiffs in error also offered in evidence certain other records, the reading of which was objected to. It was finally stipulated that the records should be read in evidence, subject to the decision of the court upon their admissibility, thereafter to be given. This decision was never given. Plaintiffs in error were thus deprived of their exceptions in case the records were excluded; and, in the event that only a part was received, plaintiffs in error were entitled to notice thereof, that they might supplement the rejected part with other proof. It follows that all the evidence offered by plaintiffs in error must be considered as having been duly received, or as having been erroneously excluded. If the evidence was erroneously rejected, we do not need other *135 *grounds for reversal of the judgment. If it was duly received, the court committed an error in reaching the result it did.

The Hutchinson title, derived through Addis' deed to Mott, is good as being the elder, unless there was a law in force on the twenty-fourth of September, 1855, which rendered unrecorded deeds invalid as against subsequent innocent purchasers. 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 67; Broom; Leg. Max. 345; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. 210. A law requiring deeds to be recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of the county in which the land was situated is found in St. 1855, p. 182, § 42. But nothing in the official volume fixes the date when the statute took effect. The law, it is true, contained a provision that it should go into effect on its passage; but the date of its passage is not given. The court certainly will not divest a title, otherwise good, on the strength of a presumption that a certain law, not published until after November 1, 1855, (see preface to Statutes of 1855,) went into effect before September 24, 1855. If the court, to ascertain the date of the recording act of 1855, should consult the state archives, it will also learn that the first clerk of the probate court of Douglas county was James Christian, whose commission bears date September 29, 1855. The clerk of the probate court was ex officio recorder of deeds, (St. 1855, p. 650, § 4;) but the clerk was forbidden to act as recorder until he had filed a certain bond, (St. 1855, p. 651, §§ 5-7.) This bond could not have been of earlier date than the commission, September 29th. It undoubtedly bore a later date. There was therefore no obligation, because it was not possible to record real-estate transactions before September 29th; probably not till long after. The legislature could not impose a duty impossible of performance. Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 630. The recording act of 1855 did not, therefore, become binding until a registry office was provided. The date of the taking effect of the registration act cannot be earlier than the date of the opening of *136 the recorder's office in the county in which the *land was situated. An earlier date would render the law unconstitutional. None of the registration laws of Kansas have, in express language or by implication, applied to transactions in real estate of earlier date than the date of the law. We concede that a statute may be constitutional which requires the recording of deeds executed before its passage, provided, always, that a reasonable time is given after the law goes into effect in which to make the record, and that reasonable notice is given of the passage of the act. Ross v. McClung, 6 Pet. 289. The recording law of 1855 is not, either by express language or by implication, retrospective; and even if it were, as it did not allow a reasonable time in which to make the record of past transactions, and as the law took effect without notice, and long before its publication, (see preface St. 1855,) it follows that the construction claimed is indefensible on every ground, and is supported neither by reason nor authority. The burden of proving when the first registration law of Kansas took effect is therefore cast upon defendant in error, who seeks to avoid a title otherwise good by calling to his aid the registration laws. It is for him to show that the common law was supplanted by the recording act before the twenty-fourth of September, 1855.

At the time when Rebecca D. Hutchinson, the ancestor of plaintiffs in error, acquired her title, the deed from Addis to Harttmann was not of record in the county registry office. Mrs. Hutchinson, therefore, bought without knowledge, actual or constructive, of the Harttmann claim. By the terms of the registry law the deed to Harttmann, as to Rebecca D. Hutchinson, was therefore invalid and void. But there was an act passed in 1857, (Terr. Laws 1857, p. 316,) which legalized the Ladd records, and by section 3 thereof all deeds recorded before the date of the act should take effect according to their date, and not according to record. If this law is constitutional, the Hutchinson title is the best, because the conveyance from Addis to Mott was prior to that from Addis to Harttmann. The record was also prior.

Harttmann clearly proved title in himself by his deed from Addis, the common source of title. The defendants proved no title. The only evidence that appears to have been given by defendants below, and received by the court, was a copy from the office of the register of deeds, purporting to be a conveyance of the property from Walter C. Hutchinson and wife to Rebecca D. Hutchinson. The paper purporting to be a copy of a deed from Addis to Mott; also the so-called "power of attorney" from Mott to G. W. Hutchinson; also the copy deed by G. W. Hutchinson to Walter C. Hutchinson; also the letter from Mott to G. W. Hutchinson as to the sale of his property, and the certificate of Mott, indorsing the action of George W. Hutchinson,—were all objected to by plaintiff, and by the consent of counsel taken by the court, subject to the exceptions, to be afterwards decided by the court. The court never announced its decisions upon these objections, and was never requested to do so by counsel, and consequently no exceptions were ever taken to his rulings upon these questions; nor is it known except by inference whether the court admitted or rejected such testimony. It is necessary for the counsel to show error upon the record. They must show the specific error of which they complain, and that it was duly excepted to at the time. They cannot claim that the court erred in rejecting the testimony, for they did not except to any such ruling; nor can they assign error in the alternative, that the court erred in the rejection of testimony, or in the judgment, because the errors in rejecting testimony, if any, were not excepted to, and the motion for a new trial does not make the rejection of evidence a ground of the motion.

Harttmann being admitted by the pleadings to be in possession, and having proved a conveyance to him from Addis, who was admitted on the trial to have been the owner at the time of such conveyance, thereby made out his case. The defendants gave in *138 evidence a deed of the same property *from Walter C. and Mary F. Hutchinson to Rebecca D. Hutchinson, and it was admitted that said Rebecca was dead at the time of the commencement of the action, and that the plaintiffs were her only children, and living and of full age at the institution of the suit, and were the only heirs at law of the said Rebecca. This is all the evidence received for the defendants below. Now, no title having been shown in Walter C. Hutchinson or Mary F. Hutchinson, this evidence clearly constitutes no defense to Harttmann's action.

But if the evidence offered had all been received, Harttmann was still entitled to judgment. He was a bona fide purchaser, for valuable consideration paid before the deed to Mott was recorded, either according to law or in the book kept by Ladd. His deed bears date March 1, 1856, and the deed to Mott was not recorded anywhere at that time, and it never was recorded according to the laws of the territory or state. The deed of Addis to Harttmann, duly acknowledged, was recorded in the office of the register of deeds, July 30, 1864. The title, as against Mott's unrecorded deed, passed by the payment and conveyance to Harttmann without waiting for Harttmann to record his deed. 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 182; Steele's Lessee v. Spencer, 1 Pet. 552; Lessee v. Smith, 17 Ohio, 226; Coster v. Bank of Georgia, 24 Ala. 61.

But it is claimed that the act of February 20, 1857, entitled "An act appointing trustees for the city of Lawrence," (Laws 1857, p. 316,) gives Mott's title the preference on account of its prior date. That act can have no such effect. It was not intended to have such effect, as its preamble, title, and subject-matter clearly show. Section 3 of that act, in providing "that no preference shall be given to any person on account of prior registry in said book of record up to this time, when two or more persons shall have a deed to the same lot, but those of the oldest date shall take precedence," was meant only to say that the trustees should deed to the person having the oldest deed, without reference to Ladd's record, but did not undertake to interfere with the right of the courts to protect rights vested *139 already under *contracts of purchase. But if this law was intended to affect titles like this it could not have such effect, because it would in that respect be unconstitutional and void. When Harttmann made his purchase bona fide, and paid his money, and took his deed, Mott's deed not having been recorded according to the laws of the territory, or in any other manner, Harttmann's title vested. He acquired all the title Addis had to convey before the deed to Mott, because Mott's deed was void as to him. See Laws 1855, p. 182, § 42; Coster v. Bank of Georgia, 24 Ala. 61; Steele's Lessee v. Spencer, 1 Pet. 552; Lessee v. Smith, 17 Ohio, 226.

Rebecca Hutchinson does not take the title from the plaintiff by prior registry. The registry act protects only subsequent purchasers from the same grantor. Raynor v. Wilson, 6 Hill, 469; Stuyvesant v. Hall, 2 Barb. Ch. 151; Bates v. Norcross, 14 Pick. 224; Crockett v. Maguire, 10 Mo. 34; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566; Keller v. Nutz, 5 Serg. & R. 246. Again, if she would make her prior registration available, it could be done only by registering her whole chain of title back to Addis, the common grantor. The registration of a deed is constructive notice only of what the record shows. The record in this case shows a conveyance from Walter C. and Mary Hutchinson, but does not show and is no notice that they had any rights to convey. Roberts v. Bourne, 23 Me. 165; Spencer v. Babcock, 22 Barb. 328. But she is not protected, because it is not proved that she paid the consideration money. See the recording acts in force when her conveyance was taken. Comp. Laws, 355, § 13; Bishop v. Schneider, 46 Mo. 473; Jewett v. Palmer, 7 Johns. Ch. 65; Wood v. Mann, 1 Sum. 506; Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. 421. And such payment must be proved by evidence other than the deed. As to persons other than the parties to the deed, the acknowledgment of the payment of consideration in the deed is mere hearsay. Even allowing the books kept by Ladd to be legal books of registration, her chain of title would not be recorded. The power of attorney under which the deed from Mott was made, was never registered in Ladd's books. The paper so registered was not a power to convey anything, but if there was any power to convey it was contained in the letters, which were neither acknowledged nor recorded. The power of attorney under which the deed was made was part of the conveyance, *140 and the statute expressly required it to be registered. Laws 1855, p. 182, § 48.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action to quiet title brought by Harttmann against the Hutchinsons. The plaintiff in his petition set up title and possession in himself. The defendants in their answer denied the plaintiff's title; and set up title in themselves, but did not deny the plaintiff's possession. "On the trial it was stipulated and agreed that on the twenty-fourth of September, 1855, the legal title to the lot in controversy, to-wit, lot No. 64, on Massachusetts street, in the city of Lawrence, was vested in A. S. Addis, and that both plaintiff and defendants claim title from and under said A. S. Addis." The plaintiff's title is a deed from Addis to himself, dated March 1, 1856, recorded in E. D. Ladd's Register, September 2, 1857, and recorded in the county register's office, July 30, 1864. He was a bona fide purchaser of the lot, without notice of any prior deed having been executed by Addis. The defendants' title is as follows: Deed from Addis to John S. Mott, dated September 24, 1855, never acknowledged, nor recorded in the county register's office, but recorded in Ladd's Register, March 23, 1857; an informal and conditional power of attorney from Mott to G. W. Hutchinson to sell lots in Lawrence, (not naming the lots,) dated December 4, 1855, not acknowledged, nor recorded in the county register's office, but recorded at some time (when not shown) in Ladd's Register; two letters from Mott to G. W. Hutchinson, not acknowledged or recorded anywhere; deed from Mott, executed by G. W. Hutchinson as attorney in fact for Mott, to Walter C. Hutchinson, dated March 1, 1857, not acknowledged, nor recorded in the county register's office, but recorded in Ladd's Register, March 23, 1857; deed from Walter C. Hutchinson and wife to Rebecca D. Hutchinson, dated May 2, 1861, acknowledged, and recorded in the county register's office, December 5, 1861.

Rebecca D. Hutchinson is dead, and the defendants are her *141 heirs. Some of these matters were *proved on the part of the defendants by very questionable evidence, but, for the purposes of the case, we shall consider them sufficiently proved. The judgment in the court below was in favor of Harttmann.

We do not understand that the plaintiffs in error claim that the recording of said deeds in Ladd's Register, or the act of the legislature of February 20, 1857, entitled "An act appointing trustees for the city of Lawrence," (Laws 1857, p. 816,) affect the merits of this case in the least. While they may claim that said act gave them a right to read from said register copies of said deeds as evidence, we do not understand that they claim that said act dispensed with any of the requirements of the general registry laws, or relieved any person from any of the consequences that would naturally result in any case from a compliance or non-compliance with said registry laws. Hence we shall have nothing further to say with reference to said Ladd's Register or said act.

The principal portion of the argument of the plaintiffs in error is made upon the hypothesis that the act of the legislature of 1855, "regulating conveyances," (Laws 1855, p. 173 et seq.) was not in force on September 24, 1855, when the deed from Addis to Mott was executed; and upon this hypothesis they seem principally to rest their case. But the hypothesis is not correct. Said act took effect and was in force from and after its passage, which was some time in August, 1855. The legislature that passed said act adjourned sine die on August 30, 1855. Now, under said act, (Laws 1855, p. 182, § 42,) said deed never had any validity as against Harttmann, for it was never recorded in the county register's office; and although Harttmann was a subsequent purchaser of the property, yet he was an innocent and bona fide purchaser of the same, for a valuable consideration actually paid, and he took possession of the property under his purchase, and had his deed therefor duly recorded in the county register's office. Even if Harttmann's deed under the same act was void as to Mott and the Hutchinsons (as it probably *142 was) until he had it recorded in the county register's office, still he finally had it so recorded. The act of 1859, "regulating conveyances," (see Laws 1859, p. 290, § 13; Comp. Laws 1862, p. 355, § 13,) could not, by its terms, make Mott's deed valid as against Harttmann without being recorded, although such act may have made Harttmann's deed valid as against Mott and the Hutchinsons before it was recorded; for none but Harttmann was a "subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice," from Addis, within the meaning of section 13 of that act. Only one deed in the defendants' chain of title from Addis down to Rebecca D. Hutchinson was ever recorded in the county register's office, and that was the deed from Walter C. Hutchinson and wife to Rebecca D. Hutchinson. Now, probably, all the deeds in the defendants' chain of title from Mott down to Rebecca D. Hutchinson were void on account of the defective and informal execution of the deed from Mott to Walter C. Hutchinson; but even if they were not void for that reason, still we think they cannot affect the plaintiff's title, because the title of Mott himself is void as against the plaintiff's title. Neither can the recording of the deed from Walter C. Hutchinson and wife to Rebecca D. Hutchinson affect the plaintiff's title. The record of that deed simply gives notice of the existence and contents of such deed to all subsequent purchasers of the property from Walter C. Hutchinson. It does not give notice to any person that Walter C. Hutchinson and wife had any right to the property in controversy; nor does it give notice to any person of any of the prior deeds in the defendants' chain of title. That is, the recording of one deed does not constitute a record of all deeds prior to it, and which with it constitute a chain of title. But the said deed from Walter C. Hutchinson and wife to Rebecca D. Hutchinson does not pretend or purport to show where Walter C. Hutchinson obtained his interest in the property. It is merely a quitclaim deed. The authorities sustaining these propositions will be found in the brief of defendants in error, and in 3 Washb. Real Prop. 285, 591.

*143 *The judgment of the court below, in addition to what is necessary to be contained therein, contains an order that the plaintiff shall recover the premises from the defendants. Now, while this order is wholly unnecessary, and therefore erroneous, yet we cannot see how it can affect the substantial rights of the defendants. Of course, the plaintiff does not want to recover what he already has. He merely wants to have his title and possession quieted, and this is all that the judgment below should have attempted to do. The judgment may be corrected in this respect, without costs. In all other respects the judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

MOSES KEYES v. J. SNYDER.

July Term, 1875.

1. Stock: Herd Law of 1872. The act of the legislature entitled "An act to provide for the regulating of the running at large of animals," approved February 24, 1872, commonly known as the "herd law," is constitutional and valid.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———: Order of County Board. An order made by the board of county commissioners prohibiting certain stock from running at large in a portion of said county only, to-wit, in certain townships thereof, and not in the whole county, is void.<sup>2</sup>

Error from Morris district court.

Replevin brought by Keyes to recover possession of two head of neat cattle. The defense was that the cattle in question were allowed by Keyes to run at large in Elm Creek township, in which defendant, Snyder, resides, and that they did then and there, and "on the fifteenth of July, 1873, enter upon the farm of said Snyder, and did then and there eat, trample down, and destroy the crops of said defendant then and there standing and growing, and did then *144 and there dam*age defendant's said growing crops to the amount and of the value of one dollar; that said defendant has never been paid said damages; that he took said cattle into custody until such damages should be paid; that he claims a lien upon said cattle for said damages; and that, within five days after taking such cattle into his possession as aforesaid, he commenced an action against said Keyes before a justice of the peace for said Morris county to recover said damages, and enforce said lien, and said action is now pending," etc. This action of replevin brought by Keyes was commenced before a justice of the peace, and was removed by appeal to <sup>2</sup>Under the night herd law, an order of the commissioners requiring animals to be confined in the night-time during the entire year is, if proper prior proceedings are had, within the statute, and valid. *Lauer v. the district court, where a trial was had at the October term, 1873. Snyder justified his taking up and detention of the cattle under an order adopted by the board of commissioners of said county, February 17, 1873, which order is as follows: "Be it ordered by the board of county commissioners of Morris county, Kansas, that the following described animals are hereby prohibited from running at large in the following named townships of the aforesaid county of Morris: This order shall include all horses, asses, and neat cattle in the townships hereinafter named. It shall be in force in the townships of Parker, Clark's Creek, Diamond Valley, Elm Creek, and Ohio; and shall take effect on the first day of April, 1873, and continue in force until the first day of December, 1873. It is further ordered that this order be published for four weeks prior to its taking effect in the Morris County Republican." It was admitted that the townships named in the order were only a portion of the townships in Morris county. The district court, a jury being waived, found that the defendant had a valid lien on said cattle for the amount of the damages claimed by him, and the costs of taking up said cattle and enforcing said lien, and was entitled to the possession of the cattle until said damages and costs were paid; and gave judgment accordingly, and against the plaintiff for costs.

Sharp & McDonald, for plaintiff.

*145 *VALENTINE, J.. The only questions involved in this case which we shall consider are as follows: First. Is the act of the legislature entitled "An act to provide for the regulation of the running at large of animals," approved February 24, 1872, (Laws 1872, p. 384,) commonly known as the "herd law," constitutional and valid? Second. Is a certain order made by the board of county commissioners of the county of Morris, prohibiting certain stock from running at large in a portion of the townships of said county, and not prohibiting such stock from running at large in the whole of the county, valid? We must answer the first of these questions in the affirmative, and the second in the negative. That the act is constitutional and valid, see the case of Noffziger v. McAllister, 12 Kan. *315; and that the act does not apply to townships, but to counties, see the act itself. Section 1 of the act reads as follows:

"Section 1. The board of county commissioners of the different counties of this state shall have power, at any session after the taking effect of this act, to direct by an order what animals shall not be allowed to run at large within the bounds of their county."

There is no provision authorizing the county board to "direct by an order what animals shall not be allowed to run at large within the bounds of" any township, school-district, road-district, or fraction thereof. The whole power that the commissioners possess to prohibit stock from running at large, they get from said section 1, and, unless that should clearly give them the power to prohibit stock from running at large in fractions of the county, we should not hold that they possess any such power.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

*SEYMOUR TARRANT v. JOHN SWAIN.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Homestead: Equitable Owner. Where a person resides upon and occupies a certain piece of land, he may acquire a homestead interest therein under the homestead exemption laws of Kansas, although he may have only an equitable interest in the land. [Moore v. Reaves, post, *150; Hixon v. George, 18 Kan. 259; Hogan v. Manners, 23 Kan. 557.]
2. ———: Owner of Undivided Half. Where a person owns an undivided half of a certain piece of land, and resides upon and occupies the land with his family, he may acquire a homestead interest in the land, under the homestead exemption laws of Kansas, so far as such interest does not conflict with the rights and privileges of his co-tenant, although he owns only an undivided half of the land.

Error from Cowley district court.

Tarrant owned the undivided one-half of certain real property, which he occupied with his family, and which he claimed as his homestead. Swain owned a judgment against Tarrant, and caused Tarrant's interest in said land to be sold by the sheriff under an execution issued on such judgment. Tarrant moved to set aside said sheriff's sale on the ground that his homestead interest was exempt. The district court, at the March term, 1874, refused to set said sale aside, but made an order confirming said sale.

Alexander & Saffold, for plaintiff in error.

The legal signification of the word "owner" in the constitution is whatever interest the party owns in what constitutes the residence of his family. It may be an equitable interest under a contract of purchase, or simply a leasehold. Gunnison v. Twitchel, 38 N. H. 62; McKee v. Wilcox, 11 Mich. 358; Pelan v. De Bevard, 13 Iowa, 53; In re Beckerford, 1 Dill. 45; Bartholomew v. West, 2 Dill. 290. It seems to us an anomaly in law that if a debtor be sole owner of realty, he may claim a homestead exemption in it; but if he be so unfortunate as to own but the half of it, his plea for exemption must be disregarded, and his wife and children thrust out into the street.

*147 *Such could not have been the intention of the framers of our constitution and the makers of our laws.

Pryor & Kager, for defendant in error.

Whether the property is or is not a homestead the court is not bound to decide, on confirming a sale of real estate; and a decision either for or against a party, upon such motion, is not res judicata and conclusive between the parties; hence it cannot affect the substantial rights of the party, and will not be considered by this court. But suppose this court should consider this homestead question, then the question would arise in this case as to whether or not a homestead exemption exists in favor of the owner of an undivided half of real estate, and against the owner of the other undivided half. We think our own statute settles this question in the negative, that it does not exist. Can this property be sold under "forced sale" without the consent of husband and wife? If it can, it is not a homestead. Suppose one of the part owners should bring an action for partition, and the property be sold under section 626 of the Civil Code, the husband being part owner, and residing upon the premises with his wife and family, would it be contended that the husband and wife, setting up a claim of homestead, could nullify the statute? Then the interest of a part owner may be, and is, subject to forced sale under process of law. And it appears to us that the word "owner," in the exemption law, means "one that has such a title to land that he is by virtue of such title entitled to the exclusive possession thereof." That a tenant in common has no such title in Kansas, see Gen. St. 748, § 597.

VALENTINE, J. This petition in error is prosecuted in this court for the purpose of reversing an order of the district court of Cowley county overruling a motion of the plaintiff in error to set aside a sheriff sale. On the twenty-seventh of October, 1873, said district court rendered two judgments in an action in which Swain *148 was plaintiff and Tarrant was defendant. *The first judgment was that Tarrant should pay to Swain, on or before December 31, 1873, $452.63, and that Swain should then convey to Tarrant the undivided half of lot 11, in block 129, in the city of Winfield, Cowley county. The other judgment was in favor of Swain and against Tarrant for $226.71. This second judgment was merely a personal judgment, and had no connection whatever with said lot. Ever since and before said judgments were rendered, Tarrant and his family have resided on said lot, claiming the same as their homestead. On November 19, 1873, an execution was issued on said second judgment, and levied December 17, 1873, on the undivided half of said lot. Tarrant paid to Swain the amount required by said first-mentioned judgment within the time prescribed by the judgment; and the said Swain conveyed to said Tarrant by his deed of quitclaim said property, as required by said decree, on the first of January, 1874. On February 9, 1874, said property was sold at sheriff's sale on said execution, and this is the sale now in controversy. We suppose the only question involved in this case is whether said property was exempt from said execution and sale by virtue of the homestead exemption laws. We think it was. Both parties admit, and in fact claim, that at the time said judgments were rendered, and at the time said execution was issued and levied, Tarrant had an equitable interest in said property. Tarrant claims that this equitable interest was sufficient to uphold his homestead claim, and Swain claims that it was sufficient to uphold the levy of said execution. We think it was sufficient to uphold either, in the absence of the other; and as the homestead claim is prior in time to the levy of said execution, and indeed prior in time to the rendering of the judgment upon which said execution was issued, it is prior in right, and paramount to any claim founded upon said execution. If Tarrant's equitable interest in said property was sufficient to uphold the levy of the execution, we know of no good reason why it should not be considered sufficient to uphold the homestead claim; and if it was not sufficient to *149 uphold the levy, then manifestly *the sale of the property should have been set aside. That an equitable interest in real estate, or an interest less than a freehold, will uphold a homestead interest, see McKee v. Wilcox, 11 Mich. 358; Pelan v. De Bevard, 13 Iowa, 53; McCabe v. Mazzuchelli, 13 Wis. 478; Blue v. Blue, 38 Ill. 9; Conklin v. Foster, 57 Ill. 104.

But it is claimed that Tarrant owns only the undivided half of said lot, and that such an interest in property is insufficient to uphold a homestead claim. We can perceive no good reason why this should be so, under our broad and comprehensive homestead provisions. Thorn v. Thorn, 14 Iowa, 49; McClary v. Bixby, 36 Vt. 254. The laws, however, of the various states upon this subject differ, and several decisions may be found on the other side of the question. Of course, a tenant in common can obtain no such homestead interest as will interfere with the rights or interests of his co-tenant, or any person rightfully holding under his co-tenant. But this is probably the only limitation upon his acquiring a homestead interest in such property. Third parties cannot say that, because a tenant in common cannot obtain such a homestead interest as will defeat or destroy the interest of his co-tenant, that, therefore, he cannot obtain any homestead interest at all. Neither can his co-tenant question his right to acquire a homestead interest in the property, so long as such co-tenant is allowed to enjoy all his rights and privileges in and to said property as a co-tenant. There is a vast difference between holding property as tenants in common and holding it as coparceners. Each co-tenant has a known, absolute, fixed, and determinate individual interest in the property. No coparcener has any such interest. In estates in coparcenery the whole of the property belongs to the coparceners jointly, as an aggregate and individual entity. It is like the property of a copartnership, no member of which has any specific interest in any article of property belonging to the copartnership. His interest is merely to share in the profit, or profit and loss, and receive dividends made from time to time, and at the final closing up of the copartnership; *and he really has no interest as an individual in any specific article of the property belonging to the copartnership.

The order of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

A. K. MOORE v. DANIEL REAVES and wife.

July Term, 1875.

1. Homestead: Equitable Owner. An equitable owner of real estate may occupy and hold the same as his homestead, subject to all the rights, privileges, immunities, and disabilities given and imposed by the homestead exemption laws; following Tarrant v. Swain, ante, *146.
2. ———: Possession is Notice to All. When an equitable owner of a homestead is in the actual occupancy of the land, all persons must take notice of his homestead interest. [Davies v. Cole, 28 Kan. 260.<sup>1</sup>]
3. ———: Conveyance by Husband Alone. An actual occupant of land, claiming the same as his homestead, cannot transfer his equitable title to the land, even conditionally, while he occupies the same as his homestead, except with the consent of his wife.
4. ———. And where an attempt is made by the husband alone, without the consent of the wife, to transfer such title, so as to secure the payment of a pre-existing debt not previously a lien on the homestead, such debt does not thereby become a lien on the homestead.<sup>2</sup>
5. ———: Trust: Lien of Transferee. And where the transferee in such a case afterwards procures the legal title to himself, without the consent of the wife, he holds such legal title in trust for the occupants of the homestead, and is entitled to be reimbursed only for such sums as he has actually and properly paid to disincumber the property from valid liens.

<sup>1</sup> A person in actual possession of real estate under an unrecorded deed is, as against all persons who have actual notice of such deed, the legal and absolute owner of such real estate; and, as against all other persons, he is the equitable owner. Error from Brown district court.

Action by Reaves, and Jane, his wife, to quiet their title to certain lands occupied and claimed by them as their homestead. Moore, defendant, claimed to be the owner in fee of said lands. The *151 district court, at the April term, 1873, found *and adjudged that Reaves and wife were the equitable owners, and that Moore had a lien on the lands for certain moneys paid thereon by him, and decreed that Reaves should pay to Moore the amount of his lien, and that Moore should thereupon convey the legal title to them.

W. W. Guthrie and Killey & May, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. On July 27, 1867, the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company owned the W.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 21, township 3, range 17, in Brown county, and on that day entered into a written contract for the sale of said land to Thomas J. Payne. Payne paid \$10 down, and was to make two other payments at stated periods, up to July 27, 1876, when the railroad company was to convey said land to Payne, or to his heirs or assigns, by a good and sufficient warranty deed. In March, 1868, Payne, in consideration of \$42.50 to him paid, assigned his claim to said land to Alfred S. Jones, by a written assignment indorsed on the back of said contract. In February, 1869, Jones, in consideration of \$500 paid to him, assigned his claim to said land to Daniel Reaves, (plaintiff below, defendant in error,) by a like written assignment indorsed on the back of said contract. Reaves took immediate possession of said land, and with his wife and family has occupied the same as his homestead ever since. On the fifteenth of October, 1869, Reaves, by a like written assignment indorsed on said contract, except that the assignee's name was left blank, assigned his claim to said land to secure the payment of a certain promissory note of \$150 held by Samuel Lappin, and delivered said contract, with the indorsements thereon, to said Lappin. This assignment was made, and the contract and indorsements delivered, without the knowledge or consent of the wife of said Reaves. Reaves and his grantors made the \*152 first five payments on said contract \*as they became due.

Reaves continued to occupy said land as his homestead, and made improvements thereon of the value of $300. Afterwards, A. K. Moore (defendant below, plaintiff in error) obtained said contract and assignments from said Lappin. What he paid for them, or how he got them, is not shown. His name was inserted in said blank assignment from Reaves to Lappin, so as to make the assignment appear to be an assignment from Reaves to Moore; but Moore did not make the insertion, and there is nothing in the record that shows that he knew how or when it was inserted, or in what manner the assignment was made. From anything appearing in the record he may have properly supposed himself to be a bona fide purchaser of the land. On the twenty-first of December, 1871, Moore paid the other five payments on said contract, and procured a deed to be executed from the railroad company to himself for said land. At the time he made said payments there were none of them yet due. Upon these facts the court below rendered judgment that plaintiff Reaves should pay to the defendant, Moore, the amount, with interest, to-wit, $292.40, which Moore in good faith paid to the railroad company, and that Moore should convey to Reaves, by deed, said land. Moore complains of this judgment. We, however, perceive no error therein prejudicial to Moore. Reaves was the equitable owner of said land. He held the same as his homestead. (And that such may be done, see Tarrant v. Swain, just decided, ante, *146, *148, and authorities there cited.) And, being in the actual possession thereof, every person was bound to take notice of his homestead interests; and therefore, although Moore may have been a bona fide purchaser in fact of said land, yet in law he took it subject to all the homestead interests of the plaintiff. The blank assignment to Lappin, even if it had been valid, would have been nothing more than a conditional alienation of the plaintiff's equitable interest in said land, in the nature of a mortgage to secure the payment of said $150 note, and would not have been an absolute conveyance to Lappin or Moore of the *153 plaintiff's equitable title. But as the assignment was of *land held by the plaintiff as his homestead, and was made by the plaintiff alone, without the consent of his wife, the assignment itself was and is absolutely void. McKee v. Wilcox, 11 Mich. 358; McCabe v. Mazzuchelli, 13 Wis. 478.

We think the following is the law of this case: An equitable owner of real estate may occupy and hold the same as his homestead, subject to all the rights, privileges, immunities, and disabilities given and imposed by the homestead exemption laws; following Tarrant v. Swain, supra; and, being in the actual occupancy of the land, all persons must take notice of his homestead interests. He cannot transfer his equitable title to the land, even conditionally, while he occupies the same as his homestead, except with the consent of his wife; and where an attempt is made by the husband alone, without the consent of his wife, to transfer such title, so as to secure the payment of a pre-existing debt not previously a lien on the homestead, such debt does not thereby become a lien on the homestead. Where the transferee in such a case afterwards procures the legal title to himself, without the consent of the wife, he holds such legal title in trust for the occupants of the homestead, and is entitled to be reimbursed only for such sums as he has actually and properly paid to disincumber the property from valid liens.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

*154 *MATHIAS OSWALT v. J. R. HALLOWELL, Treasurer, etc.

July Term. 1875.

Taxation: Agricultural College Lands Held under Contracts of Purchase are Taxable. In 1867 the plaintiff purchased from the state, through its proper agents, a quarter section of the ninety thousand acres of Agricultural College lands. The purchase money was to be paid "in eight equal annual installments, with ten per centum interest on each installment, payable annually; the first installment to be paid at the date of purchase," and the last installment to be paid December 6, 1874. Plaintiff paid the first installment at the date of the purchase, and probably paid the other installments as they became due, though this is not shown. When plaintiff purchased said land he received only a bond for a deed, and gave his promissory notes for the balance of the purchase money. Plaintiff has never received a patent from the state for said land. In 1873 said land was assessed for taxation, and taxes were levied upon the same. Held, that as section 1 of the tax law provides that "all property in this state, real and personal, not expressly exempted therefrom, shall be subject to taxation," and as no provision of the constitution or statutes "expressly" or even impliedly exempts such property from taxation, the same is taxable.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Washington district court.

J. D. Brumbaugh, for plaintiff.

VALENTINE, J. This was an application to the judge of the court below, at chambers, for a temporary injunction to restrain the defendant, as treasurer of Washington county, from selling the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 20, township 2, range 5, in said county, for taxes assessed upon said land for the year 1873. The plaintiff purchased said land of the state of Kansas; the same being a portion of the ninety thousand acres of land granted by the government of the United States to the state of Kansas under the act of congress entitled "An act donating public lands to the several states and territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862. 12 U. S. St. at Large, 505. He purchased said land under the provisions of an act of the legislature of Kansas entitled "An act for the sale of lands belonging to the State Agricultural College," approved February 22, 1866. Gen. St. 78. Said land was sold December 6, 1867, and the purchase money was to be paid "in eight equal annual installments, with ten per centum interest on each installment, payable annually; the first installment to be paid at the date of purchase," (Gen. St. 78,

§ 2,) and the last installment to be paid December 6, 1874. Plaintiff paid the first installment at the date of the purchase; but whether he has paid any of the other installments is not shown. When plaintiff purchased said land, he received only a bond for a deed, and gave his promissory notes for the balance of the purchase money. At the time said land was assessed and taxed in 1873, all of said notes except two were due. Whether any of them, or some of them, or all of them, had been paid at that time is not shown. We shall assume, however, that all of those which had become due up to that time were paid, and those which had not yet become due were not paid. No patent had yet been issued by the state to the plaintiff for said land. The main question, therefore, presented by these facts, and, indeed, we think the only one, is whether said land was taxable for the year 1873. We suppose it will be conceded that the legal title to said land still remained in the state of Kansas when said land was taxed, and that the equitable title thereto had been transferred to the plaintiff. The purchaser of such lands is not required, under the statutes, to do anything more than to pay his eight annual installments of the purchase money, with interest; and there is no provision made by statute or otherwise for any forfeiture of the land back to the state on failure by him to make such payments. Hence the whole *156 question of the forfeiture of the land in such cases would *rest upon broad equitable principles; and, as equity abhors forfeitures, but few forfeitures would be declared. Therefore, under such circumstances, we think the plaintiff holds the equitable title to said land; and, if so, then we think the land is taxable. Even where the United States holds the legal title, and an individual holds the equitable, the land is taxable. McMahon v. Welsh, 11 Kan. 291, and cases there cited.

But do the laws of Kansas make this kind of land, held in this manner, taxable? Now, there can be no question as to the power of the state to tax all land within its borders not belonging to the United States or to Indians, even though the state may own the land itself. The only question is whether the state has attempted to make these lands taxable. The first section of the tax law provides that "all property in this state, real and personal, not expressly exempted therefrom, shall be subject to taxation." Gen. St. 1019, § 1. Now, are these lands "expressly exempted" from taxation? We think not. The constitution provides that "all property used exclusively for state, county, municipal, literary, educational, scientific, religious, benevolent, and charitable purposes, and personal property to the amount of at least two hundred dollars for each family, shall be exempted from taxation." Const. art 11, § 1. This is the only constitutional exemption of any kind of property from taxation. Section 3 of the tax law, among other things, provides that "the property described in this section, to the extent herein limited, shall be exempt from taxation. * * * Fifth, all property belonging exclusively to this state, or to the United States." This is the only provision of the statutes that may be supposed to have any application to this question. No one will suppose that the lands are exempt from taxation after being sold, merely because the proceeds of the sales are to be used for educational purposes only, (Washburn College v. Shawnee Co., 8 Kan. *344; Vail v. Beach, 10 Kan. *214; St. Mary's College v. Crowl, Id. *442, *450;) hence we have not quoted the statutory provisions exempting property used "exclusively" for educational purposes. Now, the land in question *is not "used exclusively for state purposes," as required by the constitution in order to make it exempt from taxation; and it does not belong to the state exclusively, as required by the statute in order to exempt it from taxation. Indeed, the land is not used for state purposes at all, and the state only holds the legal title, with a lien upon the equitable title, to secure the payment of the unpaid purchase money. The purchaser has the entire use of the land, and has the entire equitable title, subject only to a lien upon the same for the unpaid purchase money. With reference to this kind of lien, see Stevens v. Chadwick, 10 Kan. *406; Curtis v. Buckley, 14 Kan. *449. Under section 1 of the tax law, land must be "expressly exempted," in order to be exempt from taxation. But in this case the land is not exempted even by implication. It will be the duty of the board of regents, and of the legislature; which meets annually, as well as the purchaser of the land, to see that no tax title is obtained against the land.

The order of the judge of the court below refusing the temporary injunction is affirmed.

BERNARD SETTER v. C. P. ALVEY.

July Term, 1875.

1. Contracts: Parties in Pari Delicto. Where both parties to a contract void as against public policy are equally at fault, the law will leave them where it finds them. If the contract be still executory, it will not enforce it, nor award damages for its breach. If already executed, it will not restore the price paid, nor the property delivered.
2. ———. So, where a town company, the occupants, and all interested in the town-site, made a contract with a county to deed it certain lots on the town-site, providing the county-seat was located at the town, and afterwards the county-seat was so located and the lots deeded, held, that neither the town company, the occupants, the parties interested in the town-site, nor one claiming under them, could avoid the deed, or recover the land.
- *158 *3. Town-Sites: Deed by Trustee of Town-Site: Grantee not an Occupant. Where a party in whose name a town-site is pre-empted for the benefit of the occupants, thereafter makes a deed for a town lot to a party who was not an occupant, but who might lawfully receive a deed, and there is nothing to show the purpose or consideration of the deed, or that it was not made with the assent and pursuant to the direction of all the occupants, held, that it was error to hold such a deed void and of no effect, as not made in conformity to the duty of the trustee and pre-emptor.<sup>1</sup>

4. Conveyances: Rights under Unrecorded Deed. A party, to avail himself of section 13, c. 80, Laws 1859, for the purpose of obtaining precedence of a prior unrecorded deed, must be a "subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice."<sup>2</sup>

Error from Anderson district court.

Ejectment, brought by Alvey as plaintiff, against Setter as defendant. The case was tried before W. S. as referee, who found, "as matters of law, that said plaintiff has a valid legal and equitable title to the premises in dispute, having derived his title from G. W. Iler, chairman of the board of trustees of the town of Garnett, without any notice, either actual or constructive, to plaintiff's grantor, of the previous deed given by the said Iler to the board of commissioners of Anderson county; that said plaintiff has a right to avail himself of the absence of notice, actual or constructive, to his said grantor; and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant for the recovery of the premises in his petition described, and for his costs." The district court, at the March term, 1874, confirmed this report, and gave judgment thereon in favor of Alvey.

Bergen & Kirk, for plaintiff in error.

W. A. Johnson, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. This was an action of ejectment for half a town lot in Garnett. The facts are these: In October, 1861, the town-site of Garnett was pre-empted by G. W. Iler, chairman of the board of trustees, for the use and benefit of the occupants, and patent issued June 1, 1863. On April 11, 1862, Iler conveyed the lot in controversy to the commissioners of Anderson county. This deed was not recorded until November 30, 1863. On April 14, 1863, Iler also conveyed the lot to J. M. Alvey, and this deed was recorded February 2, 1864. In 1869, J. M. Alvey conveyed to C. P. Alvey, the plaintiff below, now defendant in error. The same year the county conveyed to one Hedley, who conveyed to Setter, defendant below, now plaintiff in error. J. M. Alvey had no notice, actual or constructive, of the deed to the county at the time of his deed from Iler. It does not appear what he paid, if anything, for the deed, nor whether the deed to him (J. M. Alvey) was made in disregard of the claims of C. P. Alvey, or in pursuance of his request. The lot was drawn, at the regular drawing of lots, by said C. P. Alvey, who was an actual occupant of the town-site, and a stockholder in the Garnett Town Company. It was drawn upon share 153. It was also drawn, at the same time, by the county of Anderson, being the fifty-sixth lot drawn. The county became interested in the town-site, under an agreement between it and all parties interested in the town-site of Garnett that, if the county-seat should be located there, 400 lots in Garnett would be given to the county. It does not appear whether plaintiff was or was not ignorant of the deed of the county to this particular lot, though, as an occupant, he was a party to the original contract. Upon these facts the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, (defendant in error.)

The lot was first drawn by the county; first deeded to the county. Why should this priority be set aside, and one holding under a subsequent drawing and subsequent deed be given the lot? It is insisted that the deed to the county was void because the contract upon which it was based was against public policy. Concede, for the purposes of the argument, that the contract was so, and therefore void, and we do not think it follows that the deed can be avoided. The *160 town of Garnett and the occupants were in fault equally with the county. And the rule is general that the law will not in such cases interfere in favor of either party. If the contract remains executory, the law will neither enforce it nor award damages for its breach; if already executed, nothing paid or delivered can be recovered back. So here, no deed having passed, and the contract being void, as stated, the county could not have compelled the deed; and, on the other hand, the contract having been executed, and the deed passed, neither the town company nor the occupants can set it aside and recover the land. And what they cannot do, no one claiming under them can do.

Again, it is claimed that the deed is void because of the provision in the act of congress of March 2, 1867, which declares that "any act of the trustees not made in conformity to the regulations" alluded to in the section granting the right of entry shall be void. U. S. Rev. St. 440, § 2391. Iler was, under the act, a trustee for the occupants, and the county could not in the nature of things be an occupant. Therefore a deed to the county was to one not an occupant, and not in conformity to the regulations referred to. It may properly be noticed here that, so far as the findings of the referee are concerned, nothing is shown as to the consideration or purpose of the deed. He simply finds that the county drew the lot and received the deed. All the information we have as to the contract is from the answer of the defendant, which alleges the making of the contract, and the execution of the deed in pursuance of it. Of course, then, while the facts alleged in the answer may be used as against the defendant, they must all be taken together, and it is there alleged that the contract was made by the county with the town authorities, who furnished the money to enter the town-site, and with the assent of the occupants, and all other persons interested in the town-site. With the answer out, we have simply the drawing and the deed; with it in, we have also a contract, assented to by the plaintiff, and all other parties interested. No-*161 where does it appear for what purpose this lot was conveyed to the county,—whether for use as a site for a court-house, jail, or other public building, or purely for purposes of speculation. Now, if a county may lawfully take a deed for a town lot from the authorities of a town for any purpose, and if the party in whose name a town-site is pre-empted may, with the assent of all the occupants and parties interested, lawfully deed a lot to the county, then this deed must, as against this objection, be held good; for there is nothing to show the purpose, and it cannot be presumed to have been illegal; and nothing to show a want of assent, and it cannot be presumed that a trustee has violated his trust. Indeed, the plaintiff's title rests upon a deed made to one not an occupant, and without any apparent right to a deed.

Plaintiff in error devotes a considerable portion of his brief to show that section 13 of chapter 30, Laws 1859, does not avail the title of defendant in error. Defendant in error seems in his brief to concede the point; at least, he makes no claim under that section. Nor, indeed, could he make any successful claim, for the only persons entitled to any rights under it are "subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice;" and there is nothing to show that plaintiff's grantor, J. M. Alvey, ever paid anything for the lot, or that plaintiff was not fully cognizant all the time of the county's claim and deed.

The judgment of the district court must be reversed; and, there being no exception to the referee's findings of fact, the case will be remanded, with instructions to enter judgment for plaintiff in error, defendant below, for his costs.

*162      *L. Scott, Mayor, etc., v. J. W. PAULSEN.

July Term, 1875.

1. Injunction: Restraining Execution of Judgment: County-Seat Contest. Where, after a county-seat election, mandamus proceedings are had in the district court, and judgment rendered commanding certain officers who are holding their office at one place to remove them to another, which the court finds to be the legal county-seat; and such judgment is brought to this court on error, and by it affirmed; and while such proceedings are pending a new election is duly held in such county for the relocation of the county-seat, at which election the first above mentioned place receives a majority of the votes, and is duly declared the county-seat: held that, upon the application of the defendants in the judgment showing the above facts, an injunction might properly issue restraining any execution of such judgment.

2. County Commissioners: Sessions of County Board: Jurisdiction: Special Sessions: Presumption. Where the record of the proceedings of the board of county commissioners shows that at a regular adjourned meeting, on the twenty-second of November, only one commissioner and the clerk were present, and ordered an adjournment to the sixth of December; that on the sixth of December a meeting was had, at which two of the commissioners, with the clerk, were present and transacted business as a county board, but fails to show whether it was a meeting pursuant to the supposed adjournment, or a special session called by the chairman, and contains no record of a call by the chairman, or a request therefor from two of the members; and where, among other matters, a petition duly signed by three-fifths of the electors is presented, praying for an election for a relocation of the county-seat, and an election ordered; and where, in obedience to such order, public notice having been duly given, two elections are had and generally participated in by the electors, and the final vote canvassed, and the result declared, and no objection thereto made for more than a year: held, that there was no error in refusing to hold the election void because of the informalities in the record of the session of the county board at which the election was ordered.<sup>1</sup>

8. County-Seat Election: Publication of Notice: Time. Where thirty days' notice of an election is required, a publication in a weekly newspaper is sufficient, provided that the first publication is at least thirty days prior to the election, and it is continued in each successive issue of the paper up to the time of the election.

*163 *Error from Wilson district court.

In May, 1871, the county-seat of Wilson county was at Fredonia, having previously been duly located there. On the twenty-third of said May an election was held to relocate the county-seat of said county. Judicial proceedings growing out of this election (Russell v. State, 11 Kan. 308-323) resulted in the decision that by such election the county-seat was relocated and established at Neodesha. But such final decision was not made until June, 1873, when the mandate of this court was sent to the district court to carry into effect said judgment in favor of Neodesha. While said litigation was pending and undetermined, and on the twenty-eighth of January, 1873, another election was held in said county to relocate said county-seat, which resulted in locating said county-seat at Fredonia, where it had in fact remained pending the litigation mentioned. Upon the receipt of said mandate, defendants Scott, the mayor of Neodesha, and William Nicholson, who as relator had commenced the proceedings to contest and determine the result of the election of May 23, 1871, were proceeding to have said mandate and the judgment therein mentioned carried into effect by the removal of the county offices and county records to Neodesha; whereupon Paulen, the clerk of the district court, commenced this action to restrain said defendants from further proceedings under said mandate and judgment. Upon notice to the defendants the application for a temporary injunction was heard by the district court at the May term, 1874, and such injunction was granted. From this order the defendants appeal, and bring the case here on error.

P. C. Smith, L. W. Keplinger, and McComas & McKeighan, for plaintiffs in error.

Peffer & Clark and Hudson & Chase, for defendant in error.

*164 *BREWER, J. This was an action for an injunction. A temporary injunction was granted by the judge of the district court, to reverse which order this proceeding in error has been brought. Three questions are presented by counsel.

1. It is contended that this was an attempt to stay the execution of a mandate of this court, and that such a stay was beyond the power of the district court. The facts are these: An election had been held for the relocation of the county-seat. The canvass of the commissioners had given it to Fredonia. Application was made for a mandamus to compel certain of the county officers to remove their offices from Fredonia to Neodesha, alleging that Neodesha had received a majority of the legal votes, and was therefore entitled to the county-seat. The district court sustained the application, and awarded the mandamus. On error to this court the judgment was affirmed. Russell v. State, 11 Kan. *308. Paulen (the defendant in error here) was the successor in office of said Russell, and as such successor was made a party to that judgment. Pending the proceedings in that suit another county-seat election was had, and, as declared by the canvass of the commissioners, Fredonia received a majority of the votes, and became the county-seat. Paulen now brings this action to stay execution of the former judgment on the ground that by the subsequent election all rights which Neodesha had at the time of the commencement of that action have been swept away, and that, Fredonia being the legal county-seat, it would be illegal to compel the county officers to remove their offices therefrom. We fail to see any such trespass by the district court on the prerogatives of this court as counsel for plaintiffs in error conceive. There is no attempt to question the validity of the judgment previously rendered, or disregard the adjudication upon the rights in controversy. It is conceded that at the time of the commencement of that action

*165 Neodesha was the county-seat, and entitled to the county offices; but it is claimed that, by subsequent proceedings within the power of the people to make, the county-seat had been located elsewhere, and therefore this last determination of the people should be upheld by the courts. We think this entirely proper, and no trespass on the power of the court, or disregard of its authority. It would be worse than useless to insist on an actual enforcement of the judgment by a removal of the offices to Neodesha, to be followed by an immediate removal back, in obedience to the declared result of the last election. It would be a judicial farce, equaled only by that suggested by the oft-quoted couplet:

"The King of France, with twenty thousand men, Marched up the hill, and then marched down again."

2. The second question is one of more difficulty. The petition and order for the county-seat election were presented and made on the seventh of December, 1872. It is contended that there was no legal session of the board upon that day, and that, therefore, all orders attempted to be made were void, and no foundation for any subsequent proceedings or rights. The only evidence offered on the hearing of the application, upon this point, was the record of the county commissioners. This record showed a meeting on the ninth of November, at which two of the commissioners were present, and an adjournment to the twenty-second of November. On the twenty-second of November this entry appears:

"BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS, November 22, 1872.

"Present: M. A. Brooks, commissioner; C. C. Chase, county attorney; James C. G. Smith, clerk. Met, but not being sufficient members of the board present, adjourned until December 6, 1872.

"M. A. BROOKS, Commissioner.

"Attest: J. C. G. SMITH, County Clerk."

The next entry that appears is of a meeting on December 6th, and commences as follows:

"DECEMBER 6, 1872.

"State of Kansas, Wilson County—Board of County Commissioners. Present: Henry Brown; Milton A. Brooks; W. A. Peffer, acting county attorney; James C. G. Smith, county clerk. Commenced by electing Henry Brown chairman."

*166 *Then follows a record of the transaction of sundry business, and an adjournment to the next day. On the next day the petition and order for the election were presented and made. Now, it is contended that, as no quorum was present on the twenty-second of November, there was no power on the part of a single commissioner to order an adjournment, and that, therefore, the regular session, which commenced on the first Monday in October, and had been continued from time to time by adjournment, was then ended. The board could not thereafter meet before the first Monday in January, except in special session, which it is conceded might be had at any time, but only "on the call of the chairman at the request of two members of the board." Gen. St. 256, § 18. The record does not purport to be the record of a special session; shows no request or call therefor. It is a session on a day to which there was an attempted adjournment. On the other hand, it does not recite a meeting pursuant to adjournment, and there is nothing in the record inconsistent with the fact of a special session. The law nowhere requires any record to be made of the call; does not require even that it should be in writing. The call need not precede the session any definite amount of time, nor is any public notice required. We see no reason to doubt the legality of a session called by the chairman on the request of two members, when the request is verbal, the call verbal, the notice to the members verbal, and the session held at the very hour of the call, provided that all the members receive notice of the session in time to attend, and a quorum is actually present. And a record which shows a session, purporting to be a special session, and at which all the members are present, will unquestionably show a valid session, even though it does not in terms state that the session was called by the chairman at the request of two of the members.

Again, it must be noticed that in the location or relocation of county-seats the important matter is the action of the people, and little if anything is committed to the discretion of the county *167 board. "Upon the petition of three-fifths *of the legal electors * * * the board of county commissioners shall order an election," is the language of the statute. It is not a matter which they may or may not do, according to their judgment of its wisdom, but the duty is imperative upon the presentation of the petition to order the election. And the result of the subsequent election or elections determines the county-seat, independent of the wishes or judgment of the commissioners. Hence it seems to us that when a quorum of the county board, with the clerk, is present, assuming to act as a county board; and at a time and place at which a legal session is possible; and to such board, in actual session, a proper and legal petition is presented for a county-seat election; and an election ordered; and thereafter full and legal notice given of such election; two elections had, generally participated in by the electors; the result canvassed and declared; and no objection made thereto for more than a year,—it will be too late to question the validity of the election on the ground that the record of the proceedings of the commissioners shows that the chairman was absent, and fails to show a session pursuant to a legal adjournment from a regular session, or that the session was a special session, and duly called by the chairman on the request of two members. This is not a case in which parties are claiming adverse to the county upon the basis of the action of the county board. Where a party insists that a county is bound by the action of its agents, it may well be held that he must show affirmatively, not merely that those agents acted, but that they acted in the manner in which alone they could legally bind the county. But the county here has no adverse interests; and the only duty of the commissioners is the formal one of submitting the question to the electors for decision.

In a certain sense, all the parties interested—the electors of the county—have accepted the action of the commissioners, and treated it as valid; and while the doctrine of estoppel can have technically no application to a matter like this, yet courts should, if possible, without too great a disregard of the established rules of procedure, uphold that which has received the general assent of the parties interested and affected thereby. We conclude, though with some hesitation, that the election cannot be set aside upon this ground.

3. The remaining question has little difficulty. The statute requires thirty days' notice of the election. The notice was published in a weekly newspaper, the first publication more than thirty days prior to the election, and in each successive issue to the time of the election. This was sufficient. McCurdy v. Baker, 11 Kan. *111; Whitaker v. Beach, 12 Kan. *492.

This temporary injunction was granted upon notice, and after hearing both parties. Of course, then, the court was not bound to entertain a motion to vacate, based upon matters existing at the time the suit was commenced, and evidence of which could have been had if desired. Gen. St. 676, § 250. There being no other question, the judgment will be affirmed.

Action by school-district No. 72, Cherokee county, against Hiram Riddel and George W. Riddel, on a school-district treasurer's bond which they executed as sureties for their principal, who was *169 *appointed to fill an unexpired term. The bill of exceptions shows that the whole of the moneys sued for came to the hands of defendants' principal after the term for which he had been appointed, and for which said bond was given, had expired, and during the succeeding term, to which he had been elected, but for which he had not qualified. The liability of sureties is limited to the exact letter of the bond. Nothing can extend this liability. "There is no construction—no equities—against sureties." As the bond was given for the appointive term, which expired on the twenty-seventh of March, 1873, no construction or law could extend the liability of the sureties for acts done beyond that term. *Bank of Steubenville v. ble for the dereliction of duty in this respect on the part of the district board.

Hutchinson & Cowley, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. On the eighteenth of February, 1873, there being a vacancy in the office of treasurer of the school-district, one W. F. Riddel was duly appointed to fill such vacancy, and qualified as such officer, among other things giving the bond sued on. On the twenty-seventh of March, 1873, at the regular annual election, the said W.

F. Riddel was duly elected treasurer for the ensuing year.
 *170 He took no new oath of office, and gave *no new bond, but continued to act as treasurer until his death, November 10, 1873. Were the sureties on the bond responsible for moneys that passed into his hands after the election? The bond does not in terms fix any limits to the time of its running. It does not purport to be given for a year, or a month, or any other period of time. Neither does it specify the length of the term of Riddel's office. Its condition is as follows: "The condition of the above obligation is such that, if the said treasurer shall faithfully discharge his duties as treasurer of said district, as prescribed by law, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to be and remain in full force." Again, the law provides that school-district officers "shall hold their respective offices until the annual meeting next following their election or appointment, and until their successors are elected and qualified." Now, do either or both of these facts render the sureties liable for default occurring subsequent to the term for which the principal was appointed? We think not. The silence of the bond as to its own duration is immaterial. The law fixes the length of the principal's term, and the obligation of the sureties extends only to the term existing, and for which the bond is given. Nor does the failure of the people to elect a successor, or of the successor elected to qualify, extend the term for which the principal was appointed. He may, it is true, be continued in office, as the statute has provided, for preventing a vacancy between the close of the one term and the election and qualification of a successor; but he is simply filling a part of his successor's term.

The authorities generally coincide with the views above expressed. See Wapello v. Bigham, 10 Iowa, 39; Chelmsford Co. v. Demarest, 7 Gray, 1; People v. Aikenhead, 5 Cal. 106; Mayor, etc., v. Horn, 2 Del. 190; Rany v. Governor, etc., 4 Blackf. 2. In the first case, the suit was on a county treasurer's bond, who by statute held until his successor was elected and qualified. Elected his own successor, he gave no new bond, and the sureties on the bond given for the first term were held not responsible for default occurring during the *171 second. The second was the case of a *bond given by the treasurer of a private corporation. He was to be chosen annually, and to hold till another was chosen and qualified. The third case is like this, in that it was the duty of another officer, on the failure of a party elected to give bond, to treat the office as vacant and appoint some one to hold. The court say the sureties might well rely on the proper discharge by that officer of this duty. Here, if the district treasurer fails to give bond, it is made the duty of the board to appoint one who will. Gen. St. 923, § 37.

The cases of Kruttchnitt v. Houck, 6 Nev. 163; State v. Wells, 8 Nev. 105; and Thompson v. State, 37 Miss. 518,—are partially against the views here expressed. But the first case the court treats as an appointment during pleasure; and in the last there was no fixed time for the commencement and close of a term, or the appointment of a successor, and the case is really not in conflict with the general current of the decisions.

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial.

ADDISON W. JAY v. GRANBY MIN. CO.

July Term, 1875.

1. Occupying Claimant: Plain and Connected Title. A quitclaim deed from a mere trespasser, although duly recorded, does not make the "plain and connected title in law or equity" which entitles a party to relief under the first clause of the occupying claimant law.<sup>1</sup>
2. Real Estate: Indefinite Description. A description of a tract of land as "the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  sec. 14, town 33, range 25 east, in the county of Cherokee, Kansas," does not enable the court to say that said tract is within the territory ceded to the Cherokees by the treaty of 1835.

*172 *Error from Cherokee district court.

Action by the Granby Mining & Smelting Co. against Jay and two others, to recover possession of a certain quarter section of land. Plaintiff had judgment for the land at the April term, 1874, of the district court, whereupon defendant Jay claimed the benefit of the occupying claimant act, and asked that the value of his "lasting and valuable improvements" on said lands might be ascertained, etc. The court held, upon the showing made by Jay, that he had no rights under that act, and refused his application.

Hutchinson & Cowley, for plaintiff in error.

BREWER, J. The only question presented in this case is whether plaintiff in error was entitled to the benefit of the occupying claimant law. The facts are these: On November 7, 1870, a patent issued to the Missouri River, Ft. Scott & Gulf Railroad Company for the land in question. Title passed from the company to defendant in error, first, by bond to convey, and then in September, 1873, by deed. One Glover Pickerell settled on the land in 1869, and built a house thereon the same season. In April, 1872, plaintiff in error purchased from Pickerell, took a quitclaim deed therefor, and had it duly recorded. There is no evidence as to the condition of the title prior to the patent to the railroad company, and nothing to show that Pickerell was other than a naked trespasser. Counsel in the brief say that the fair presumption is that the "title was yet in the United States, unless it yet remained in the Cherokee tribe of Indians, the original owners of the lands known as the 'Cherokee Neutral Lands,' of which said premises was a part." It may be that this is a *173 part of those lands, but the evidence fails to show it. All *we can gather from the evidence is the description, by section, township, and range, and that it lies in Cherokee county. The patent is not recited, so its recitals avail nothing. Ephraim v. Garlick, 10 Kan. *280.

Counsel claim that Jay is within both the first and fifth classes of those entitled, under the amendment of 1873, to the benefit of the occupying claimant law. Laws 1873, p. 203, § 1. The first class includes all who "can show a plain and connected title, in law or equity, derived from the records of some public office." Counsel's claim cannot be sustained under this clause. A quitclaim deed from a trespasser can by no ingenuity of construction be called "a plain and connected title, in law or equity." It means a title connected with the legal and unquestioned title by a succession of conveyances apparently regular and legal, but really passing no title. The case of Krause v. Means, 12 Kan. *335, is a good illustration. Neither does he come within the fifth class. That includes those who have made settlements upon Indian lands, or Indian trust lands. But the testimony, as we have seen, is lacking upon this point.

The ruling of the district court was therefore correct, and the judgment must be affirmed.

JAMES CARLIN v. DANIEL F. DONEGAN.

July Term, 1875.

New Trial: Misconduct of Judge: Form of Verdict. Where a new trial is sought on the ground of the alleged misconduct of the judge, and in support thereof it is shown that the action was one for an accounting between partners, in which a principal question was whether a certain writing contained the terms of the partnership, and that the judge, after charging the jury that it was for them to determine what were the terms of the partnership, and instructing them specially to find for what purpose the writing was executed by the parties, without the knowledge of counsel handed to the jury, as they were about to retire, a form of a verdict, to be used in case they found that the writing did contain the *174 terms of the partnership, which form the jury adopted; and where it is not shown that he did not at the same time submit a form to be used in case the jury found otherwise, or that he made any suggestions or intimations to influence the jury to adopt that form, or that his charge was not in all respects entirely fair and impartial: held, that there was no sufficient showing to entitle a party to a new trial.

Error from Saline district court.

At the March term, 1874, Donegan, in an action in which he was plaintiff, and wherein Carlin was defendant, recovered a judgment against Carlin for $1,077.23, and costs. After the close of said term, Carlin, as plaintiff, commenced this action against Donegan, as defendant, as provided by section 310 of the Civil Code, to vacate and set aside said judgment, and for a new trial of said first-mentioned action, on account of alleged misconduct of the district judge. No answer was filed to this petition, said section 310 of the Code providing that "the facts stated in the petition shall be considered as denied without answer." The transcript shows that afterwards, and at the May term, 1874, of said district court, the following proceedings were had, and entered upon the journal: "This day comes on for hearing the petition of the said James Carlin, plaintiff herein; said plaintiff appearing in person and by his attorney, T. F. Garver, and the defendant, Daniel F. Donegan, appearing by his attorneys, Spivey & Wildman; and thereupon the said petition is read to the court, and the plaintiff offers to introduce witnesses to support the allegations of said petition, which is refused by the court; and the said plaintiff is not allowed to introduce any testimony to maintain the issues herein on his behalf,—to which ruling of the court the said plaintiff excepts; and judgment is thereupon rendered against said plaintiff for costs of this suit." Carlin brings the case here on error for review.

T. F. Garver, for plaintiff.

Spivey & Wildman, for defendant.

*175 *BREWSTER, J. This was a petition for a new trial, brought after the term at which judgment was rendered, and on account of the alleged misconduct of the judge before whom the case was tried. As the district court refused to hear any testimony under this petition, the allegations in it must, for the purposes of this case, be taken as true; and the only question is whether, upon those allegations, there is any ground for relief. A brief statement of the facts as alleged will be necessary. "Before the March term of the Saline district court, the defendant in error, Donegan, commenced an action against the plaintiff in error, Carlin, for an accounting between them as partners, and to recover the amount that might be found due from Carlin to Donegan. Said case was tried, and at the March term, 1874, a judgment was entered therein against Carlin for the sum of $1,077.23, and costs. One of the issues submitted to a jury for trial was, what were the terms of the partnership agreement? Donegan claimed a certain writing to be the agreement. Carlin denied that it was executed for such purpose, and alleged in his answer that it did not contain, and was not intended to contain, the terms of the agreement. Testimony was introduced by both plaintiff and defendant as to the character and purpose of the writing, and the terms of their agreement. The jury returned a special verdict of the terms of the partnership; said verdict embracing the disputed writing, without change, and saying that the terms of the agreement were as contained in it. This verdict was allowed to stand by the court, and the rights of the defendant therein determined by it. After the term of court at which the trial was had, Carlin discovered and learned for the first time that so much of the special verdict of the jury as was made up of the disputed writing had been inserted in the blank form for the verdict by the judge before the jury retired, and as they were about to retire, to deliberate upon their verdict. The jury added a *176 *few unimportant conditions, and brought in as their verdict the form given them by the judge with the writing. The action of the judge was secret, and unknown to the defendant or his attorneys until long afterwards."

We have taken this statement from the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, as presenting in full the facts upon which he founds his claim for itself. It should also be stated that the petition alleges that the court instructed the jury that it was for them to determine what were the terms of the partnership agreement, and also instructed them "specially to say for what purpose the writing set up in said petition was executed by said parties." The form of the verdict as given is: "We, the jury impaneled and sworn in the above-entitled cause, do, upon our oaths, find that the terms of the partnership between plaintiff and defendant were as shown by the writing set up in plaintiff's petition, which writing is as follows, to-wit," etc., (giving the writing.) It would seem from the petition that the judge prepared and handed to the jury more than the one form, for it alleges that "the judge of said court, on said trial, prepared, or caused to be prepared, forms of verdict for the jury." But the form we have above copied, and which was the one returned by the jury, is the only one recited, or whose character is given in the petition. If the judge simply prepared two forms, one answering to the case as the plaintiff claimed it, and the other to that as the defendant claimed it, and submitted the two to the jury, with instructions to determine between them, or if, preparing but one form, he instructed them that the insertion of negative words was all that was necessary for the appropriate opposite verdict, it would be difficult to see how either party was wronged. The case, however, might have been one in which it were easy to prepare a form for the verdict if in favor of the one party, and impossible to prepare it if in favor of the other. Thus, if the claim of the one party was that the terms of the partnership were expressed in a certain writing, it would be perfectly easy to prepare a form for the jury if they found that to be the fact; while if the *177 claim of the adverse party was *that the terms of the partnership were not so expressed, but rested in parol, and the evidence of that parol agreement was not harmonious, but conflicting and indefinite, it would be impossible for a court to determine beforehand what might be the conclusions of the jury upon this conflicting testimony, or prepare a form to express those conclusions. But whether either of these suggestions be true in this case we can only conjecture, for the petition is silent; and surely, before misconduct is imputed to a judge on the trial of a cause, the whole of his conduct in respect thereto should be disclosed.

We might properly stop here. Indeed, this is as far as, under the record, we can legitimately carry a decision. We may be pardoned, however, a few suggestions beyond. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that it affirmatively appeared that the judge submitted only the one form, and that under the testimony it were perfectly easy to have submitted a form answering to the claim of the opposite party, and then could this action be maintained? It is not pretended that he directed the jury to return this verdict. On the contrary, it is expressly stated that he charged the jury that it was for them to determine whether the writing contained the partnership agreement. There is no intimation that the charge was other than fair and impartial. That which was handed to the jury was a mere form,—was handed to them as such. It is often not merely the privilege, but the duty, of the court to assist the jury in placing the verdict in proper form; especially when, as in this case, a special verdict is asked. It does not appear that anything more was done in this case than simply discharge this duty. All that could possibly be urged against it is that from the simple form the jury might be led to think that the opinion of the court was in favor of such a verdict. Now, while it is the province of the jury to settle all disputed questions of fact, and the duty of the judge in no way to trespass upon their functions, and to be careful not to cast his own judgment upon the facts into the scale to affect their conclusions, yet the simple fact that from some portion of his

*178 conduct an intimation may be derived as to his *own convictions of the testimony is not of itself sufficient to disturb a verdict. We do not mean to say that the conduct of a judge may not be so partisan, his expressions or intimations of his own views so strong and decided, that, though he in terms charges the jury that they are to determine the facts, and not he, yet in furtherance of justice a reviewing court ought to set the verdict aside. But this is no such case. It does not appear but that the judge was acting in the utmost good faith, with that clear impartiality which distinguishes the learned judge before whom this case was tried, and with a simple desire to assist the jury in the preparation of that most difficult of all verdicts, a special verdict; and in such a case something more than the mere handing of a form of a verdict to the jury must exist before a new trial should be granted.

The judgment will be affirmed.

THOMAS H. BUTLER v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF NEOSHO Co.

July Term, 1875.

Counties: Liability on Implied Contract. Where the admitted facts are that the county treasurer occupied for his office a room belonging to plaintiff; that the defendant made no other provision for such office than by suffering him to occupy said room; and that the plaintiff gave notice, pending the occupation, to at least two of the members of the county board that he should expect and demand compensation for its use, and that said occupation was with the knowledge and consent of the defendant: held, that the defendant was liable for the value of the use of said room, although there was no express contract between the plaintiff and defendant that he should receive compensation therefor.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Neosho district court.

Action by Butler to recover for use of a room occupied as the county treasurer's office from September 20, 1871, to March *179 20, 1873. It was agreed that the rent of said room *was worth $18 per month, and that, if plaintiff was entitled to recover, the amount due him was $234. The district court, at the July term, 1874, held that the county was not liable, and gave judgment against Butler for costs.

Stillwell & Baylies, for plaintiff.

C. F. Hutchings, for defendants.

<sup>1</sup> Action on claim against county—failure of county commissioners and clerk to record proceedings in reference to contract, see Gillett v. County of Lyon, 18 Kan. 413; where a county attorney goes beyond the limits of his county to do business for his county, at the instance and with the consent of the county board, he may recover reasonable compensation for such services, in addition to his salary, although there is no express contract between the attorney and the board that he shall receive compensation therefor—the law implies a contract, Huffman v. County of Greenwood, 23 Kan. 281; legal meeting of county board, see Scott v. Paulen, ante, *162, and note.

BREWER, J. This was an action to recover for the rent of a room occupied by the county treasurer. No testimony was heard, but the case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts. So much thereof as is material is as follows: "That said county treasurer held his office in said building during the time that plaintiff was the owner thereof, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff herein." "There was no express contract between plaintiff and defendant that plaintiff should receive compensation for the use of this building by said county treasurer, but defendant knew that said building was so occupied, and plaintiff informed at least two members composing the defendant board that he should expect and demand compensation for the use of his said building." "This information was given to these two members, not to the board of county commissioners, shortly after September 20, 1871, and frequently after said date, and neither of the members of the defendant board made any objection when said information was so conveyed." "The defendant herein, during said period, had not provided the county treasurer of said Neosho county with any place to hold his office, further than their suffering said treasurer to occupy the building of plaintiff would constitute such provision."

Was the county liable? There would be no question if the *180 defendant were an individual or a private corporation. *The law would imply a contract, and a promise to pay the reasonable value of the use of the room. And we think the same result must follow from the agreed facts, though the defendant is but what is sometimes called an involuntary quasi corporation. To provide suitable rooms for county officers is a duty expressly cast upon the defendant. Gen. St. c. 25, §§ 4, 16, 172. The only provision made was in the occupation of plaintiff's room. The only way, therefore, in which this duty was discharged, was by an appropriation of the property of plaintiff, and it was so appropriated with the knowledge and consent of the defendant. Here are all the elements of an implied contract. And, to make the matter stronger, the plaintiff, pending the occupation, gave notice to two of the three commissioners that he should expect pay for his property. The case of County of Neosho v. Stoddart, 13 Kan. *207, is by no means similar. There an attempt was made to bind the county by the contract of the sheriff, or district court, or both, for the furnishing of matting for the courthouse; and the only point decided was that neither the court, nor the sheriff, nor both together, could so bind the county without the consent of the commissioners. The very thing which was wanting there is present here, to-wit, the consent of the commissioners; for the consent of the defendant means the consent of those officers, or that agent of defendant charged with the duty of consenting or dissenting. Where there is an express contract, that will control, and the rights of the parties must be settled by it, (Perry v. Bailey, 12 Kan. *539;) but, when there is no express contract, the law may imply one, when a party knowingly receives and appropriates to his own use the property of another.

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for agreed value of the rent.

•JOHN A. LEWIS v. MARY ANN LEWIS.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Divorce: Constructive Service. The mailing of a copy of the petition and publication notice, required by section 641 of the Civil Code, is a part of the service required, in cases of divorce, upon non-resident defendants.
2. ———: Opening Decree. Where a decree of divorce was duly and legally entered, after service by publication, and the mailing of a copy of the petition and publication notice, as required by section 641 of the Code, held, that the defendant could not come in under section 77 of the Code, and upon the showing of want of actual notice have the decree set aside and be let in to defend.
3. ———: Barring Defendant's Interest in Property. Where the decree of divorce contained no other order concerning property than one barring defendant of all right and interest in the property of plaintiff, held, that this order must stand with the decree, and, the decree being undisturbed, the order could not be set aside.

Error from Wabaunsee district court.

Lewis filed his petition for a divorce, alleging his intermarriage with defendant at Edinburgh, Scotland, in May, 1859; that he had resided in Kansas more than a year, and was now a resident of Wabaunsee county; that he had at all times been a faithful and obedient husband; that defendant, disregarding her duties as a wife, had been willfully absent from plaintiff for more than one year last past, without any cause or justification therefor. He prayed for a divorce from defendant, and for the custody of a minor son, the issue of said marriage, and for a decree that defendant be debarred from any interest or dower estate in property of plaintiff. This petition was sworn to "as true," by Lewis, August 5, 1873. The decree was entered September 18, 1873. On the twenty-first of said month Lewis intermarried with Sarah Elizabeth Hafer, to whom was born a daughter June 23, 1874, the issue of said marriage. On the twentieth of June, 1874, notice was served on Lewis, by the attorneys of the divorced wife, *that application would be made to the court, at the next term thereof, to have said decree of divorce opened, and letting the said Mary Ann Lewis in to defend said action. Said motion was made, accompanied by an answer, verified by said Mary Ann at Edinburgh, Scotland, March 17, 1874. In this answer, among other matters, said Mary Ann alleges that on the fifth of August, 1872, at the township of St. George, Pottawatomie county, Kansas, where she and the said plaintiff then were, and for a long time had been, residing, "the plaintiff freely consented to the defendant leaving said Pottawatomie county and going to Edinburgh, Scotland, for her health," and that she did thereupon so leave "on the representation that he intended to rejoin her there so soon as he could wind up his affairs in said Pottawatomie county." Said motion was brought on for hearing at the September term, 1874, of the district court. On such hearing, said Lewis appeared, and filed an affidavit, alleging that he mailed a copy of his original petition, and a copy of the publication notice to defendant on the ninth of August, 1873, as required by section 641 of the Civil Code; that said petition and notice were received by said Mary Ann, who, on the twenty-fourth day of February, 1874, "commenced a suit against this affiant in the courts of Scotland, to-wit, the court of sessions of Edinburgh, Scotland, for alimony, in which suit this affiant had been duly notified by 'summons of aliment,' and which suit so commenced is now still pending and undetermined;" and he annexed to his affidavit a copy of the "summons of aliment" served on him, as follows:

<sup>1</sup>Effect of foreign divorce, see note to Van Orsdal v. Van Orsdal, 24 N. W. Rep. 580. A judgment rendered by a probate court of Utah territory, attempting to dissolve the marriage relation existing between a husband and wife who had neither of them ever resided there, or been within the territory, and being rendered without any actual notice to the wife, is void absolutely and entirely. Litowich v. Litowich, 19 Kan. 451.

"Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, queen, defender of the faith, to messengers-at-arms, our sheriffs, in that part conjunctly and severally specially constituted, greeting:

"Whereas, it is humbly meant and shown to us by our lovite, Mrs. Mary Ann Montgomery Jollie Devlan, otherwise Lewis, presently residing in Buccleuch place, Edinburgh, wife of John Augustus Lewis, sometime manufacturer of cut and engraved glass in Edinburgh, now farmer, and residing near Wamego, Pottawatomie county, Kansas, United States of America, or elsewhere furth of Scotland to the pursuer unknown, pursuer against the said John Augustus Lewis, her husband, defender, against whom arrestments have been used ad fundandam jurisdictionem, in terms of the condescendence and note of pleas in law hereunto annexed; therefore the defender ought and should be decreed and ordained by decree of the lords of our council and session to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of one hundred pounds sterling yearly, for aliment to her, payable at two terms in the year, seventeenth August and seventeenth February, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of said aliment as at seventeenth August, 1872, for the half year immediately following, and so forth half yearly thereafter during their joint lives, or until the defender adhere to the pursuer, with the lawful interest on each half year's aliment from the term of payment until payment, but under deduction of the sum of fifty pounds paid by the defender at various times between the said seventeenth day of August, 1872, and the twenty-fourth day of November, 1873; and, further, the said defender ought and should be decerned and ordained by decree foresaid to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of fifty pounds sterling, or such other sum as our said lords shall modify, as the expenses of the process to follow hereon conform to the laws and daily practice of Scotland used and observed in the like cases as is alleged.

"Our will is herefore, and we charge you, that on sight hereof ye pass, and in our name and authority lawfully summon, warn, and charge the said defender, personally or at his dwelling-place, if within Scotland, and if furth thereof, by delivery of a copy hereof at the office of the keeper of the record of edictal citations, in terms of the statute thereanent, to compear before the lords of our council and session, at Edinburgh, or where they may happen to be for the time, the said defender, if within Scotland the seventh day, and if furth of Scotland the fourteenth day, next after the date of your citation, in the hour of cause, with continuation of days, to answer at the instance of the pursuer, in the matter libeled; that is to say, to hear and see the premises verified and proven, and decree and sentence pronounced by our said lords, or else to allege a reasonable cause in the contrary, with certification as effiers: Attour that in the mean time ye lawfully fence and arrest all and sundry the whole readiest movable goods and gear, debts, and sums of money, and other *184 *movable effects belonging or addebted to the said defender, wherever or in whose hands soever the same may be found; all to remain under sure fence and arrestment aye, and until sufficient caution and surety be found acted in the books of council and session, that the same shall be made forthcoming to the pursuer, as accords of law, according to justice, as ye will answer to us thereupon. Which to do we commit to you, conjunctly and severally, full power by these our letters, delivering them, by you duly executed and indorsed, again to the bearer.

"Given under our signet, at Edinburgh, twenty-fourth February, 1874.
 T. E. O. HORNE, W. S."

To this summons was annexed a "condescendence," which answers to a bill in chancery, or a petition under the Code, (in which, as in the foregoing summons, the plaintiff therein is called "pursuer," and the defendant "defender,") setting up the relation of the parties, and the grounds upon which the decree for alimony (or "aliment") is asked. Among other matters it alleges that Lewis supplied said Mary Ann with the means for her trip from Kansas to Edinburgh, and had continued to write and send her money thereafter until November 24, 1873, (two months subsequent to the decree of divorce.) Said summons also bears the following indorsement:

"COPY OF MESSENGER'S EXECUTION.

"This summons executed by me, Andrew Webster, messenger-at-arms, against John Augustus Lewis, defender, (as being furth of Scotland,) by delivering for him a full double thereof, excepting the will, having a just copy of citation subjoined, at the office of the keeper of the record of edictal citations within the general register-house, at Edinburgh, in presence of Alfred McLellan, residenter in Edinburgh, this twenty-seventh day of February, eighteen hundred and seventy-four years. AW. WEBSTER.

"ALFRED McLELLAN, Witness."

The district court, upon the hearing of said motion, made an order vacating said decree, and permitting said Mary Ann to appear *185 and defend, *and also made a separate order granting temporary alimony to enable defendant to return from Scotland, and to pay counsel for prosecuting her defense. The first-mentioned order is as follows: "And now comes the said Mary Ann Lewis, defendant, by her attorneys, R. S. Hick and Merritt & Merritt, and also comes the said plaintiff, John A. Lewis, by A. H. Case and D. V. Sprague, his attorneys, and thereupon comes on to be heard the motion, amended motion, answer, and affidavit of the said defendant filed in this action to obtain an order of said court opening the judgment obtained by said plaintiff against said defendant at the September term, 1873, of said court, and allowing said defendant to be let in to defend said action; and, after hearing the evidence in the case, and argument of counsel, it is considered and adjudged by the court now here that the said judgment and decree heretofore, and at the September term, 1873, of this court, rendered in this action, be, and the same is hereby, opened, and the said defendant is let in to defend said action. And it is further ordered that the cause be continued until the next term of this court," etc.

D. V. Sprague and Case & Putnam, for plaintiff.

As to the notice to defendants who were absent from the state. As we understand it, if the notice has been made according to law, or the order of the court, such notice gives the court complete jurisdiction of the case. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 314. The court has found that such notice had been given, and that it had jurisdiction of the case. But the defendant says, "I had no actual notice until the decree was entered," and in her affidavit says that she had no notice until after the court had adjourned. Section 77 of the Code reads that "a party against whom a judgment or order has been rendered without other service than by publication in a newspaper may," etc. But here there was "other service." A "copy of the petition, with a copy of the publication notice attached thereto, addressed to the defendant at her place of residence," were served as required by section 641 of the Code. Said section 641 is not directory, but mandatory. It must be strictly complied with, or the affidavit excusing the service made. In Bloomfield v. Chicago, 5 Ohio, 318, the court refused to dismiss for want of it, but continued the case for service, and held that without this service the court had no jurisdiction. So, also, Freeman v. Freeman, 1 Mich. 480. Section 77 does not apply to divorce cases. McJunkin v. McJunkin, 3 Ind. 30.

2. As to the policy of the law. Where a divorce is granted upon which one of the parties contracts new relations, and a third party acquires rights, it cannot be that a process could be had to reverse a decree, the consequences of which would be a severance of all those new relations. Brice v. Myers, 5 Ohio, 126; Kemper v. Seminary, 17 Ohio, 318; Dunn v. Dunn, 4 Paige, 425; and see Allen v. Maclellan, 12 Pa. St. 328. There is no charge of fraud in this case, consequently all decisions based solely upon charges of fraud have no application, and are not referred to. Considerations of policy unite with the dictates of justice in forbidding any interference with the parties after a divorce has once been granted. The first marriage, in all such cases, without regard to the divorce, has ceased for all the purposes for which it was contracted. Its sorrows and disappointments have come, and are without a remedy. The breaking up of the second marriage may be revenge, but it is no reparation for the evils that have been already done. It is only a multiplication of the distresses and misfortunes of innocent women and children. The woman marries the man on the faith of the decree, which assures her that he is an innocent and injured party.

Merritt & Merritt and R. S. Hick, for defendant.

In opening and reversing judgments rendered, the Code makes no distinction between divorce and other cases. Section 72 of the Code enumerates all cases in which constructive service may be made, which includes specifically actions for divorce. Section 77 provides for opening judgments where service has been made as provided by section 72, and when the defendant had no actual notice of the pendency of the action before its determination. Section 568, subd. 2, provides for vacating a judgment for a divorce in the following language: "By a new trial granted in proceedings against defendants constructively summoned, as provided in section 72." In this case there was no other service than by publication.

The copy of the petition, with a copy of the publication notice attached, required by section 641 of the Code to be mailed to the defendant when his or her residence is known, even if received, is not service. If it is not part of the service by publication, it is not "other service,"—is not service at all. What is meant by "other service than by publication in a newspaper" is evidently actual service,—the service of a summons, either within or without the state, the only "other service" known to the Code. See Code, art. 6; Laws 1871, p. 273. But, even if the mailing of such copies to the defendant is service when received, it certainly is not service when not received, by the defendant. It is only an attempt at service, which fails. It is no more service than is merely delivering a summons to an officer. In this case the court found that the defendant did not receive the copy of petition and publication notice mailed to her until after the decree was rendered.

There is no reason of public policy, or of hardship to innocent parties, that can be assigned against the power to open a decree of divorce under section 77 of the Code, which does not apply with equal force against opening such a decree on the ground of fraud in obtaining it, or by proceedings in the supreme court to reverse it within three years after its rendition. The consequences to innocent parties are precisely alike in all of these cases. Yet the reports are full of precedents for opening and setting aside such decrees for fraud, and on proceedings in error, without regard to the consequences which may ensue to those who are not parties. Talbot v. Calvert, 12 Pa. St. 328; Martin v. Veeder, 20 Wis. 499; Strahlendorf v. Rosenthal, 30 Wis. 677; Adams v. Adams, 51 N. H. 388; Vischer v. Vischer, 12 Barb. 640. In the case of Warner v. Warner, 11 Kan. *121, this court says: "The defeated party in a divorce suit can take the case to the supreme court, and, if error be shown, can obtain a re-*188 *versal, as in any other action." To deny the authority of the court to open the decree and let the defendant in to defend, under section 77 of the Code, would be to hold that the law does not mean what it says in plain English; and this, as we understand it, the court is asked to do, because, and only because, to hold otherwise would work wrong and injury to others who are not parties to the suit. But this question of hardship, we think, is one for the legislature, and not for the courts.

In any event, we apprehend there can be no doubt of the power of the court to open the decree and let the defendant in to defend as to alimony; and, if it should be held that the court could do no more, the order opening the decree should only be modified so as to give it that effect.

BREWER, J. The plaintiff, on the fifth of August, 1873, filed his petition for divorce against the defendant, in the district court of Wabaunsee county, and at the September term, 1873, of said court, obtained a decree of divorce. The service was by publication in the local paper, and by sending a copy of the petition and publication, as provided by section 641 of the Civil Code. Shortly after this decree, the plaintiff married one Miss Hafer, and by this last marriage had a child born to him. His second wife acted in good faith. His second wife and the child are alive, and living with the plaintiff. Such marriage and birth were prior to the proceedings of the first wife to set aside the decree. Before the September term, 1874, of said court, but after the September term, 1873, and the March term, 1874, had adjourned, the defendant filed her affidavit and answer, under section 77 of the Code, to set the decree aside, and to open it, and to let her in to defend, on the ground that she had no actual notice of the pendency of the action before the decree was entered, and before the court adjourned at the September term, 1873. Upon the hearing of this application the court found as follows, to-wit:

"(1) That there was due and legal service made by publication *189 in a newspaper, as prescribed by law; *(2) that there was a copy of the petition and publication notice sent by mail, postage paid, as prescribed by section 641 of the Civil Code of 1868, on the ninth day of August, 1873; (3) that said copy of petition was not received by the defendant, who was then at Edinburgh, Scotland, until after the decree of divorce was rendered, and that no other service in the case was had or made than as above stated; (4) that the defendant had no actual notice of the pendency of this suit until after the decree was rendered."

And upon these facts the court made an order opening the decree, and letting the defendant in to defend the action.

Was there error in this order? Section 72 enumerates the cases in which service by publication may be had, and among them expressly enumerates actions for divorce. No question, therefore, can be made as to the legality of the decree of September, 1873. Section 77, upon which this application was based, provides that "a party against whom a judgment or order has been rendered without other service than by publication in a newspaper, may, at any time within three years after the date of the judgment or order, have the same opened, and be let in to defend. Before the judgment or order shall be opened the applicant shall give notice, * * * and make it appear to the satisfaction of the court, by affidavit, that during the pendency of the action he had no actual notice thereof in time to appear in court and make his defense; but the title to any property, the subject of the judgment or order sought to be opened, which, by it, or in consequence of it, shall have passed to a purchaser in good faith, shall not be affected by any proceedings under this section, nor shall they affect the title of any property sold before judgment under an attachment." The question of the permanence of a decree of divorce, when attacked either by proceedings in error, by motion to set aside, or by direct proceeding on account of fraud and imposition, has frequently been before the courts, and the decisions are far from uniform.

In McJunkin v. McJunkin, 3 Ind. 30, a decree of divorce was rendered upon constructive service. The court held that a section of the statute similar to our section 77, above quoted, was inapplicable, and partly because no provision was made for a case like the one before us,—a marriage intermediate the decree and the application.

In Bascom v. Bascom, 7 Ohio, 125, the court decided that a decree of divorce was not the subject of review in the supreme court. It was conceded that the statute provided that divorce cases should be governed by the rules respecting proceedings in chancery, and that in chancery cases the right of review existed; but there was this difference: in divorce cases the testimony was oral, in chancery by deposition. Upon this difference the court concluded that there was no review of a decree of divorce. Manifestly, a controlling consideration was the danger of intermediate marriage. It used this language in the opinion: "When a divorce is granted, upon which one of the parties contracts new relations, and a third party acquires rights, it cannot be that a process could be had to reverse a decree, the consequences of which would be a severance of all those new relations. Such anomalous mischief cannot be ingrafted on the practice of our courts except by clear and explicit legislative enactment. That, we feel confident, can never take place. All the reasons that render a decision upon facts by a jury conclusive between the parties unite in requiring that the decision of a court upon facts, on the hearing of a petition for a divorce, should be final, and stand beyond reach of judicial revision." The same court subsequently, in Bingham v. Miller, 17 Ohio, 445, after deciding that the legislature had no power to grant divorces, yet in view of the fact that that power had been exercised without question for a series of years, and to hold the divorces void would bastardize many children, refused to disturb a divorce so granted. It also, in Parish v. Parish, 9 Ohio St. 534, decided that a decree of divorce obtained by fraud could not be set aside on an original bill filed at a subsequent term. The same doctrine was announced in Green v. Green, 2 Gray, 361, Chief Justice SHAW delivering the opinion. Yet in the same state, in Edson v.

Edson, 108 Mass. 590, the supreme court sustained an application made by the defendant, in the case itself, to open up the decree and be let in to defend, on the ground that the service, which was by publication, though regular on its face and apparently good, had been secured by false and fraudulent representations as to residence of plaintiff, ignorance of defendant's residence, etc., and that, therefore, no legal service had been made so as to give the court jurisdiction; and in the opinion it uses this language: "Reasons of public policy, or a regard to the consequences which might ensue to innocent parties from the exercise of a power to invalidate a decree of divorce after it had become res adjudicata, do not constitute sufficient reasons for a denial of the existence of the power."

In Dunn v. Dunn, 4 Paige, 425, service had been made of the subpoena outside of the state. On an application to set aside the decree, the chancellor held the service bad; but inasmuch as there had been a second marriage, while he permitted the question of the grounds for a divorce to be tried, refused to disturb the decree unless upon such trial it should appear that there was no sufficient evidence to sustain it. In other words, the case was to be tried after the decree. On the other hand, in Adams v. Adams, 51 N. H. 388, a decree was set aside which had been obtained upon constructive testimony.

In Weatherbee v. Weatherbee, 20 Wis. 499, service had been made by delivering a copy of the summons to the defendant outside of the state. A motion was made to set aside the decree on the ground of irregularity in the service, and it was sustained. Crouch v. Crouch, 30 Wis. 667, in some respects resembles the case at bar. On an affidavit by the plaintiff of ignorance of defendant's whereabouts, an order was made by a court commissioner for service by publication, publication made, and decree entered. There was a subsequent marriage, and after-begotten children. On motion to set aside the decree, the order for publication was held void because made by one who, though a court commissioner, was attorney of the plaintiff, and because the affidavit of plaintiff was clearly shown to have been false and perjured testimony.

In Allen v. Maclellan, 12 Pa. St. 328, Chief Justice Gibson *192 uses *the following strong language: "It may seem an arbitrary act to expunge a sentence of divorce with a stroke of the pen, bastardize after-begotten children, involve an innocent third person in legal guilt, and destroy rights acquired in reliance on a judicial act which was operative at the time." Yet the power of the court so to do was sustained.

It may be said in reference to the case before us, as distinguishing it from some that have been noticed, that it contains nothing, as shown by the findings of the court, to impeach the regularity and fairness of the proceedings. Whatever may be the merits of the dispute between the parties, and whatever upon a hearing of both sides might have been the judgment of the court, it is plain that the steps pointed out by the law were fairly and correctly taken. Service was legally, and without any trick, falsehood, or imposition, made, and the decree was, when entered, in all respects legal and valid. It must be apparent, too, from the cases noticed, that oftentimes the hardship of an adverse ruling, if it has not directly led to the decision made, has induced the court to magnify matters of minor importance into circumstances of controlling weight. At the risk of being subjected to a like criticism, we are constrained to hold that section 77 does not apply to proceedings for divorce. "Without other service than by publication in a newspaper" is, by its terms, the test of a right to its provisions. It is true that in section 72 it is said that "service may be made by publication * * * in actions to obtain a divorce, when the defendant resides out of this state," and, if this were the only provision, it would be difficult to deny the applicability of section 77. But in the article concerning divorce and alimony (article 28, Code; Gen. St. p. 757, § 641) it is provided that, "when service by publication is proper, a copy of the petition, with a copy of the publication notice attached thereto, shall, within three days after the first publication is made, be inclosed in an envelope, addressed to the defendant at his or her place of residence, postage paid, and deposited in the nearest post-office, unless the plaintiff shall make and file an affidavit that such residence is unknown to *193 the plaintiff, and cannot be *ascertained by any means within the control of the plaintiff." Now, this is a part of the service.

Without it no decree can properly be entered. It is a precaution ordered by the legislature to guard against the danger of decreeing a divorce without the knowledge and presence of both parties. It may be very inadequate, but it is worth something. It is a step in the right direction. But, whether adequate or not, it is the legislative direction, and as such may not be disregarded.

It may be said that, as in this case, the copy of the petition may fail to reach the defendant in time for the trial, and that then there is no other notice than by the publication, and section 77 should be held applicable. True, the mailed petition and notice may give no actual notice; neither may the publication. But each is an effort towards actual notice, and the two combined are requisite for legal service. Service by copy at the usual place of residence is actual service. The copy may fail to reach the defendant; actual notice may not be received by him. But the service is complete, and a judgment rendered cannot be opened because rendered without notice. Service is not always equivalent to actual notice, and does not always result in actual knowledge. It is not the actual result of any particular step which determines whether it is or is not a part of the service. It is enough that the legislature has constituted it a part. And where the legislature has not in terms declared it a part, if the obvious scope and purpose of the step required is to secure notice of the pendency of the suit, it may fairly be considered a part of the service. Again, it may be said that if an affidavit of ignorance is filed, as provided, no copy is mailed, and then the only notice would be by publication. If the affidavit was false, it would make a case much resembling those cited from 30 Wis. and 108 Mass. But it will be time enough to decide that question when it arises. The conclusion, then, to which we have come, though, as we freely admit, with grave doubts, is that the mailing of the copy of the petition and notice, as required by said section 641, is a part of the service, and that, therefore, in a case where such mailing has been duly *194 made in addition to *the publication of notice in the paper, section 77 does not apply, and that a decree legally entered under those circumstances cannot be set aside upon the mere showing of actual ignorance of the pendency of the suit.

As the decree barring the defendant of any interest in the plaintiff's property follows from the divorce, we cannot open the decree as to the one, while sustaining it as to the other.

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to overrule the application to set aside the decree, and let the defendant in to defend.

July Term, 1875.

1. Legislature: Records: Journals and Enrolled Bills. The legislative journals and the enrolled bills are the only records required by the constitution and laws to be kept for the purpose of showing any of the legislative proceedings; and hence they must import absolute verity, and be conclusive proof as to whether any particular bill has passed the legislature, when it passed, how it passed, and whether it is valid or not. The engrossed bills of the two houses are not required to be made records, nor portions of any record. Therefore, where the legislative journals, and the enrolled bill of a particular act of the legislature, apparently show that the bill was regularly passed by the legislature, signed by the proper officers of each house, signed and approved by the governor, and filed in the office of the secretary of state as an enrolled law, it will be held that such enrolled bill is valid and conclusive evidence of the law as contained in said bill, notwithstanding it may appear from an engrossed bill of the house, (not contained in the journal of either house,) and other extrinsic evidence, that a mistake was made in enrolling said bill, and that the enrolled bill omitted one important section which was contained in the bill as it passed the two houses.
2. Evidence: Judicial Notice: Published Laws: Enrolled Bills: Journals. The courts will take judicial notice, without proof, of all the laws of the state; and, in doing so, will take judicial notice of what the books of published laws contain, of what the enrolled bills contain, of what *195 *the legislative journals contain, and, indeed, of everything that is allowed to affect the validity or meaning of any law in any respect whatever. [Topeka v. Gillett, 32 Kan. 437; S. C. 4 Pac. Rep. 800.]

3. Legislature: Passing Bills: Procedure. A bill was properly passed by the house. It was then properly passed by the senate, with sundry amendments. The house refused to concur. The senate then, by a vote by yeas and nays properly entered on the journal, receded from its amendments, and the bill was not passed in any other manner. Held, that as this manner of passing bills has always been considered sufficient in Kansas, and has always been acted upon, it will be considered that the constitutional provision requiring that "the yeas and nays shall be taken and entered immediately on the journal upon the final passage of every bill or joint resolution," was sufficiently complied with.
4. Constitutional Law: "Subject" and "Title" of Act. The "subject" to be contained in a bill, under section 16, art. 2, of the constitution, which provides that "no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title," may be as broad and comprehensive as the legislature may choose to make it. It may include innumerable minor subjects, provided all these minor subjects are capable of being so combined as to form only one grand and comprehensive subject; and, if the title to the bill containing this grand and comprehensive subject is also comprehensive enough to include all these minor subjects, as one subject, the bill, and all parts thereof, will be valid. [Woodruff v. Baldwin, 23 Kan. 494.]<sup>1</sup>
5. Counties and County Organizations: May be Abolished. The legislature has the power to abolish counties and county organizations whenever it becomes necessary for them to do so in changing county lines, or in creating new counties.<sup>2</sup>
6. County-Seats. Whenever a county is destroyed, the county-seat must go with it.

Original proceedings in mandamus.

The passage and approval of the act dividing Howard county, and creating the counties of Chautauqua and Elk, (chapter 106, Laws 1875,) gave rise to three separate actions of mandamus, each being commenced originally in this court. Said act contains, among many others, the following provisions:

"Section 1. All that portion of the county of Howard lying south of the township line separating township thirty-one and township thirty-two south shall constitute the territory of a new county *196 hereby created, to be known as the county *of Chautauqua; and all that territory lying north of said township line is hereby created into a new county by the name of Elk.

"Sec. 2. The county-seat of said county of Chautauqua is hereby located at the village of Sedan, in township thirty-four south, of range eleven east; and the county-seat of said county of Elk is hereby located at the village of Howard City, in township thirty south, of range ten east. * * *

<sup>2</sup> As to change of school-district boundaries, see School-district v. Board Ed., etc., 16 Kan. 540. The legislature has the power to abolish or destroy a municipal township; and, when the township is abolished or destroyed, the township officers must go with it. In re Hinkle, 31 Kan. 712; S. C. 3 Pac. Rep. 531.

"Sec. 3. * * * The county commissioners of said new counties shall meet together at some suitable place, on the third Monday in July, 1875, and proceed to divide the aforesaid property, or the value thereof, as hereinbefore provided. * * * The original records of the county of Howard shall be retained by, and shall remain records of and for, the county of Chautauqua."

"Sec. 10. Chautauqua and Elk counties are hereby attached to the Twenty-fifth senatorial district; and until otherwise provided by law the county of Chautauqua shall constitute the Sixty-sixth representative district.

"Sec. 11. This act * * * shall take effect and be in force from and after the first day of June, 1875."

Said bill, as it finally passed both houses, contained the following section, which in some manner was omitted in the enrollment, to-wit:

"Sec. 3. The county officers in and for Howard county in office at the taking effect of this act shall be and remain such officers respectively for and during the term for which they were respectively elected. Such of them as shall then be legal electors of the county of Elk shall be officers of Elk county; and such of them as shall then be electors of the county of Chautauqua shall be officers of the county of Chautauqua. County offices in the aforesaid new counties, made vacant by the taking effect of this act, shall, within twenty days after the taking effect of this act, be filled as provided by law for filling vacancies in other organized counties."<sup>1</sup>

An act supplementary to said chapter 106 was passed and approved March 5, 1875, (Laws 1875, p. 115,) under which the governor appointed a county clerk and two county commissioners for the county of Elk, and one county commissioner for the county of Chautauqua. These officers, with the clerk and commissioners of Howard county, then in office, filled both boards for the two

An examination of the senate journal shows that house bill 54, in the senate, was reported from the committee of the whole, February 26th; said committee "recommending its passage, subject to amendment." Sen. Jour. 481, 482. The bill then went to its third reading, and was taken up and considered Saturday, February 27th. It was amended by adding two new sections, to stand as sections 12 and 13, providing that the question of dividing Howard, and creating the two new counties of Chautauqua and Elk, should be submitted to the people of said Howard county at an election to be held in April, 1875, and that if, upon a canvass of the votes cast at such election, a majority were in favor of such division, the act should thereupon go into effect. With these two amendments the bill passed. Sen. Jour. 489-494. No other amendments are shown by the senate journal. The action of the senate was messaged to the house; the message showing that "the senate has passed house bill No. 54, * * * with amendments thereon noted." (This message seems to have been misplaced by the clerk of the house, as it appears under date of "March 2d." House Jour. 787.) The bill being in the house, with the senate amendments, it was, on Monday, March 1st, made new counties; and immediately after the first of June they undertook to carry into effect the provisions of said chapter 106. The three actions mentioned were thereupon instituted: First, "The State of Kansas, on the relation of S. B. Oberlander, County Attorney of Elk County, v. Thomas Wright" and others, county officers of Elk county, to compel the defendants to remove their respective offices, etc., from Elk Falls (the old county-seat of Howard county) to Howard City; second, "The State of Kansas, on the relation of J. D. McBrian, County Attorney of Chautauqua County, v. Eli Titus, Sheriff," and others, county officers of Chautauqua county, to compel the defendants to remove their offices, etc., from Elk Falls to Sedan; and, third, "The State of Kansas, on the relation of Isaac A. Powell and Noyes Barber, v. Miles B. Light, County Clerk of Howard *County," to compel said defendant to remove his office, etc., from Sedan back to Elk Falls; Light having removed said office from Elk Falls to Sedan, on the first of June, pursuant to the provisions of said chapter 106. In each of said cases an alternative writ of mandamus was issued, and in each the defendants appeared and answered. The cases came on to be heard together, and were so heard on the tenth of August. A. L. Williams and Wilson Shannon appeared for defendants Wright and Titus and for relators Powell and Barber. W. C. Webb appeared for relators Oberlander and McBrian, and for defendant Light.

A. L. Williams contended: The question, "Shall this bill pass?" was never taken on house bill 54, in the senate. The journal, and the agreed facts, show that the bill was first amended, then passed as so amended, and afterwards that the senate receded from its amendments. That left the bill pending, as it came originally from the house. No further action was taken in the senate. Suppose the house should pass an appropriation bill, say $50,000, for some purpose. The senate amends by reducing the amount to $25,000, and passes the bill for such smaller sum. The house non-concurs, and the senate recedes. Has the senate agreed to and passed the bill for $50,000? Clearly not. And yet that is this case, so far as the con-

the special order for 7:30 that evening. House Jour. 771, 772. At the hour named it was taken up, and all the "senate amendments were non-concurred in." House Jour. 779, 780. It would seem from the house proceedings that there were other amendments, but it nowhere appears what they were, if any. The bill was returned to the senate, with the action of the house, where (on the second of March) "the senate receded from its amendments" to said bill. Sen. Jour. 544. An inspection of the "engrossed bill" (assuming, what is nowhere shown, that one of the amendments made by the senate when the bill was first passed by that body was the striking out of this "section 3") shows that the secretary of the senate, instead of attaching a "fly" to the margin of said section, noting thereon, "Sec. 3 struck out by the senate," drew his pen around and through the section itself, actually erasing it from the "engrossed bill,"—a proceeding which ought not to have been done at all until the house "concurred" in such amendment. But the house did not concur, and the senate receded, thus leaving said section in the bill. But it was in fact erased from the face of the bill, and the enrolling clerk most naturally (but erroneously) omitted it in the enrollment, and the committee most naturally (but erroneously) reported the bill "correctly enrolled."

stitutional question goes. Section 13 of article 2 of the constitution requires that "a majority of all the members elected to each house, voting in the affirmative, shall be necessary to pass any bill." This has not been done in this case. See Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, and Austin v. Grant, 1 Mich. 492.

The bill approved by the governor and printed as chapter 106 is not the bill actually passed, (if it passed the senate at all.) The bill passed has 12 sections. Chapter 106 has but 11 sections. Section 3 of the bill passed was omitted in the enrollment, and without any authority therefor. What is the legal effect of this omission? Clearly, it renders the whole act or bill, or both, void.

The act upon the statute book as chapter 106 legislates out *199 *of office persons holding county offices by election for a constitutional term; and this cannot be done.

The bill contains more than one subject. It changes county-seats without submitting the question to a vote of the people. By the tenth section it changes the apportionment of members of the legislature, in violation of section 2 of article 10 of the constitution. And the act, by its very terms, "wipes out" an entire county, and then proceeds to create two new counties out of the material of the old.

W. C. Webb, maintaining the validity of said chapter 106, contended:

The bill was legally and constitutionally passed. The proceedings thereon in the senate in all respects conformed to the requirements of the constitution. True, the senate passed the bill with amendments, and not otherwise. But it passed the bill,—house bill No. 54. It was the same bill, and not another bill. The minds of the two houses met and concurred. Each had passed house bill No. 54. But the senate, at the passing of such bill, submitted certain other or further propositions, upon which it asked the concurrence of the house. The action of the senate, in legal effect, is the same as if it had in words said to the house, "We agree to your bill No. 54, and concur in its passage; but we ask you, not as the condition of our assent, but as a favor, to agree to these propositions, and ingraft them on the bill as amendments thereto. If you so agree, the bill will better express our wishes; but, if you decline to concur, we will withdraw our propositions by receding, and let the bill stand passed as you submitted it to us." The history of legislation everywhere is in accordance with this view, and of the action of the senate in this case. To hold otherwise now would be not only to establish a procedure alike cumbersome and unnecessary, but to nullify a large number of the enactments of every session. In the case of the appropriation bill suggested by counsel on the other side, the real question in that case, and in all cases is, shall an appropriation be made? The questions *200 of right, policy, propriety, and power, are all *determined by the answer to that question. The house says, "Yes," and suggests the sum of $50,000. The senate also says, "Yes," thus con-curring in the passage of the bill making an appropriation, and for the objects and purposes indicated by the house. But it suggests that half the sum named will be adequate to the ends in view, and proposes to the house to reconsider the question of amount. The house considers the proposition and non-concurs. The senate recedes from its proposed reduction, thus leaving the amount originally named in the bill, which it has already passed.

The omission of the third section of the bill as passed cannot in anywise affect the validity of the provisions of the bill as approved and published, unless such remaining provisions are, by reason of the omission, incongruous and uncertain; in which case the act might be held void for uncertainty, not by reason of the omission. But such omitted section in nowise affects or impairs any of the remaining sections. But we contend that the enrolled bill, authenticated by the officers of both houses and approved by the governor, is conclusive as a record, and the court cannot go behind it to inquire as to the facts. We agreed that the facts were as claimed by the other side, but not that they were competent evidence to impeach the record, nor that this court had power to receive such evidence for that purpose.

As to the question of power,—the power of the legislature to “wipe out” the county of Howard. It would seem that this question was settled in the case of State v. Meadows, 1 Kan. *90, where an act which abolished the county of Madison was held valid, and in which the present chief justice of this court wrote the opinion. [Chief Justice KINGMAN: “An examination of that case, as I recollect it, will show that the question of the power of the legislature to abolish an organized county was not submitted to or considered by the court.”] True, the precise question raised in this case was not raised or decided in that. But the case is wonderfully suggestive, and most pertinent here. While the question actually decided was whether *201 the act of *the territorial legislature approved January 31, 1861, two days after the passage of the act of congress admitting the state of Kansas, was valid, yet the case has an important bearing here, as it discloses the exercise by the legislature, under the state constitution, of the same power exercised by the legislature in abolishing Howard county, and that the existence of that power, as a proper legislative power, was not questioned. Madison county was created in 1855. Laws 1855, c. 80, § 18. On the north (section 17 of same act) was Breckenridge (now Lyon) county; on the south (section 19) was Greenwood. Each of these counties was 24 miles square. Madison was fully organized at once. By section 35, same act, and by chapter 34, p. 215, same volume, the town of Columbia was made the county-seat; and chapter 41, same volume, provided for the holding of courts in Madison county. From 1855 to 1861 said county was in full operation as an organized county, with its officers, its courts, and its records. The legislature, on the thirty-first of January, 1861, passed an act abolishing said Madison county, and annexing one-half the territory thereof to Breckenridge, and the other half to Greenwood. Terr. Laws 1861, p. 17, c. 13.

This court held (State v. Meadows, supra, 94) that the legislature which passed that act was a valid legislature, legally in session, and, under section 3 of the schedule to the constitution, became and was invested with the lawful powers of a legislature under the constitution, (which had then just gone into effect by the admission of the state into the Union,) and that said act abolishing Madison county was valid. The report of that case shows that one of the able counsel on the other side of this case (Gov. Shannon) was of counsel there; and in his brief, speaking of the powers of the legislature which passed the act then in question, (if a legal legislature at all after January 29, 1861,) he says, (State v. Meadows, supra:) "The powers of the legislature would be those given by the organic act, limited by the restrictions of the constitution." When learned counsel and learned courts, gravely trying and judicially determining an action between parties litigant, are silent upon a question so important there *202 *(as it is so important here) as whether the legislature has the constitutional power to wholly abolish an organized county, possessing and employing all the offices, officers, records, and courts enjoyed by other organized counties, that silence ought to be taken as a concession of the existence of the power. The legislative exercise of the power there went a step further than it did in the case here. Madison county was in fact abolished; while Howard county is converted into two distinct counties, with its records preserved to one of them.

The act purports to create two new counties. If it does this, there can be no doubt but the legislature had power to locate the county-seat of each where it pleased. Section 1 of article 9 of the constitution, so far as it relates to county-seats, applies only to those which have been first located, and it is only such that can be "changed." But if the act in question merely divides Howard county, setting off and creating one new county by the name of Elk, and changes the name of Howard to Chautauqua, (as may well be claimed from section 3 of the act as published,) then, as to Elk, the power to locate the first county-seat must be conceded; and as, by the division, the old county-seat of Howard is in the detached territory, there was no county-seat in Chautauqua to "change," and it was competent for the legislature to establish one. See Attorney General v. Fitzpatrick, 2 Wis. 542, 548.

The bill has but "one subject," the county of Howard, which it proposes to divide and dispose of in such manner as shall conduce to the public weal, (State v. Merrill, 1 Chand. 258;) and, as the bill has but "one subject," the "title" is most ample, clearly expressing that subject, and the general purpose of the bill in disposing of its subject.

Wilson Shannon, contending that said chapter 106, Laws 1875, was unconstitutional and void, submitted:

Howard county was a regularly organized county, and had a county-seat established by law at Elk Falls. The county of Howard is attempted to be divided by said chapter 106. This act divides the *208 county of Howard into two parts,—calls one part the *county of Chautauqua, the other part the county of Elk. Elk Falls, the county-seat of Howard county, is contained in the division called Elk. The act fixes the county-seat for the so-called Elk county at Howard City, and is silent as to Elk Falls. The other division is called Chautauqua county, and the act fixes the county-seat of the so-called county at a place called Sedan. We claim that this law violates several provisions of the constitution, and is void, and that in a legal point of view Howard county remains as though this law had never been passed.

But, first, we contend that this act was not passed according to the provisions of the constitution. "The yeas and nays shall be taken on the final passage of every bill." Article 2, § 10. "A majority of all the members elected to each house, voting in the affirmative, shall be necessary to pass any bill." Article 2, § 13. "Every bill passed by the house and senate shall be signed by the presiding officers, and presented to the governor," etc. Article 2, § 14. "The reading of the bill by sections on its final passage shall in no case be dispensed with." Article 2, § 15. We claim that the act dividing Howard county was not passed in accordance with the above provisions of the constitution. The senate amended the bill as the house passed it. It was then read and passed. Afterwards the senate receded from its amendments, but it was not again read, nor again passed; and this is shown by the senate journal. The senate never passed the bill which the house had passed, and the house never concurred in the bill which the senate had passed. Upon this point I specially invite the attention of the court to the case of Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 298, which seems directly in point, and which sustains our view of this question.

We claim that the following constitutional provisions have been violated by the act known as chapter 106, Laws 1875, to-wit:

- (1) Article 2, § 16. "No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in this title."
- *204 (2) Art. 9, § 1. "The legislature shall provide for organizing new counties, locating county-seats, and changing county lines; and no county-seat shall be changed without the consent of a majority of the electors of the county," etc.
- (3) Art. 9, § 3. "All county officers shall hold their offices for the term of two years, and until their successor shall be qualified."
- (4) Art. 10, § 1. "In the future apportionment of the state, each organized county shall have at least one representative." And the amendment to the constitution adopted in 1873 (Laws 1875, p. xl.) provides that each organized county shall have at least one representative.

The above provision, that a bill shall contain but one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in the title, is violated by the act in question. It is not sufficient that a subject be expressed in the title of the act. The true and actual subject must be thus expressed. People v. Hills, 35 N. Y. 453. This bill, instead of containing but one subject, contains many. Among other things, it purports to divide Howard county into two counties. That is one subject. It changes the county-seat of Howard county from Elk Falls to Howard City. This is the practical result. This is another subject, distinct from the division of the county. And this change of the county-seat of Howard county is without the vote of the people, which is in violation of section 1 of article 9, above quoted. But this subject of changing the county-seat is not expressed in the title, and no one would suspect that the bill changed the county-seat of Howard county from reading the title. This alone makes the act void. It comes within the letter and spirit of the constitution, and is one of the very evils the framers of the constitution attempted to guard against. It cannot be claimed that the location of the county-seat at Howard City was one of the necessary details by which the object of the act is to be accomplished; granting, for the sake of the argument, that the legislature could divide Howard county, and make two counties out of one. That territory which included the county-seat of Howard county had a right, under the constitution, to retain the county-seat until it was *205 changed by the vote of the people, as the constitution *provides; and the location at Howard City was not necessary to accomplish the object of the law; that is, a division of Howard county. And it is only in those cases where the act is necessary and proper to accomplish the object of the bill, as expressed in the title, that the courts will sustain the bill as constitutional. This question is illustrated in People v. Commissioners of Taxes, 47 N. Y. 504, and in Litchfield v. Vernon, 41 N. Y. 139, where the court lay down the true rule, and say that it is only necessary that the title express the subject of the act, and not the provisions of the act, or the details by which the object of the act is to be accomplished. The object of the act (the division of Howard county) is in no way promoted by changing the county-seat. The county would have been divided if the county-seat had been left at Elk Falls, just as effectually as it is with the county-seat removed to Howard City. The removal of the county-seat does not affect the division one way or the other. But the main object of this act, and the division of the county, was in fact to secure for two places, Sedan and Howard City, county-seats. This was the bone of contention among the people, or rather the little cliques that had an interest in towns that they desired to give value and importance to, by making them county-seats. They therefore combine together and divide the county into two parts, and select their own villages and enact them into county-seats. Now, it is this very corrupt combination and system of log-rolling that the framers of the constitution carefully guarded against. But dividing the territory of the county of Howard, and making two new counties out of its territory, and making county-seats in each, neither of which is or ever was the county-seat of Howard county, and requiring the records, etc., to be removed to these new county-seats, is changing the county-seat of Howard county without a vote of the people. If this could not be done directly, it cannot be done indirectly.

But this law contains more than one subject, and in this violates the constitution. It changes the county-seat of Howard county *206 from Elk Falls to Howard City, which object is *not expressed in the title. It creates the county of Chautauqua out of the territory of Howard county, and locates the county-seat at Sedan. This is one distinct subject, and the creation of Chautauqua county has no necessary connection with the creation of Elk county. Chautauqua county did not interfere with the county-seat of Howard county, and was the proper subject of a distinct bill. It should have been a bill entitled "A bill to create the county of Chautauqua out of part of the territory of Howard county." Such a bill would have stood on its own merits. But no such bill could have passed; hence the combination, and putting the two new counties in the same bill, and fixing new county seats for both counties. By this combination those interested in Sedan and Howard City were able to pass the bill, (that is, if it was legally passed;) and this is the very evil the constitution intended to prevent. The bill abolishes the county of Howard practically, and without saying so. It does not change the name of Howard, but absorbs all its territory by making two new counties, with new names, and new county-seats. This act is unconstitutional because it contains more than one subject, some of which are not expressed in the title: (1) A division of Howard county. (2) The creation of the county of Elk. (3) The creation of the county of Chautauqua. (4) The location of the county-seat for Chautauqua county. (5) The location of county-seat of Elk county, when there was within the territory of that county a county seat already legally located. (6) For division of property and indebtedness. (7) For the taxes and records of the same. The records are given to Chautauqua county, the new county, and not left with the old one, which retains the county-seat. (8) The act, as published, impliedly provides that the officers of Howard county may become officers of whichever county they are electors in at the time the act takes effect, and makes no provision for the old officers giving bonds for the new counties. (9) The supplemental act (Laws 1875, p. 115) provides for filling vacancies in office.

*207 *Can the legislature create a new county out of territory belonging to an old county, and continue the old officers who may reside in the territory of the new county in the same offices? When a new county is created, new officers must be elected or appointed, who must give bonds as required by law. The act in question attempts to do what cannot be done under the constitution. The act creates Elk county without representation in the legislature. This cannot be done. Chautauqua county is to be the Sixty-sixth representative district. But Elk county is attached to no district. This is an apportionment of the territory of Howard county, and which was once apportioned as the Sixty-sixth district, which new apportionment is made a year in advance of the time provided by law for making apportionments. The act establishes a district court in and for Elk and Chautauqua counties, and attaches said counties to the Thirteenth judicial district, and provides for holding courts therein. It will thus be seen that the act in question contains more than one subject, and some of which are not expressed in the title. It is therefore unconstitutional and wholly void. Cooley, Const. Lim. 148. I will call the attention of the court to the following cases and authorities, all of which throw more or less light on the question now before the court: Cooley, Const. Lim. 144, 147, 149; State v. Adamson, 14 Ind. 296; Thomasson v. State, 15 Ind. 449; Brandon v. State, 16 Ind. 197; Mewherter v. Price, 11 Ind. 199; Pigg v. State, 9 Ind. 363, 380; Indiana Cent. Ry. Co. v. Potts, 7 Ind. 681; Kuhns v. Krammis, 20 Ind. 490; People v. Mahaney, 18 Mich. 492, 494; Ryerson v. Utley, 16 Mich. 269, 277; Fishkill v. Fishkill, 22 Barb. 642; Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 299; Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 453; People v. O'Brien, 38 N. Y. 195; Norton v. Rooker, 1 Wis. 204; Attorney General v. Fitzpatrick, 2 Wis. 548.

The bill as approved and published is not the bill passed, (if it was passed at all by both houses.) But it is objected that we cannot go behind the records of the house and senate, and inquire as to the contents of the bill which in fact was passed. This would destroy the legislature as a law-making body, and enable the officers of the two houses to make or alter any bill, or substitute one for another; and, if the governor should affix his approval to the false or fraudulent bill, it would become the law, although not assented to or voted for by a single member of the legislature. This doctrine is too dangerous to meet with the unqualified sanction of the court.

VALENTINE, J. The only question involved in these three cases is whether a certain act of the legislature entitled "An act to divide the county of Howard, and to erect the territory thereof into the counties of Chautauqua and Elk, to provide for the due organization of said counties, the filling of vacancies in offices, for the proper division of the property and indebtedness of Howard county, and in regard to the taxes and records thereof," approved March 5, 1875, (Laws 1875, p. 148,) is sufficiently valid to accomplish its object, that is, to create the two new counties of Chautauqua and Elk out of the old county of Howard; or whether said act is wholly and absolutely void. Said act was house bill No. 54. Said bill was passed by the house in a legal and proper manner. It was then taken to the senate, where it was amended in several particulars, and, as amended, was then passed in a legal and proper manner. It was then returned to the house, but the house refused to concur in any of the several amendments. It was then returned to the senate, and the senate, by a vote by yeas and nays properly entered on the journal, receded from all its amendments. The bill was not passed by the legislature in any other manner than as above specified. The bill was then enrolled; but, by a mistake of the enrolling clerk and the enrolling committee, section 3 of the original bill was left out, and the numbers of sections 4 to 12, inclusive, of the original bill, were changed, and in the enrolled bill numbered respectively from 3 to 11. The bill as enrolled was properly signed by the chief clerk of the house, the secretary of the senate, the presiding officers of the two houses, and was then presented to the governor, who approved and signed the same, and *209 it was then filed with the secretary of state, where it is *now preserved. The published act is an exact copy of the enrolled bill, except that the signatures to the enrolled bill are omitted in the published copy. After the enrolled bill was presented to the governor, the committee on enrolled bills reported to the house that the bill was "correctly enrolled," and that they had presented the same to the governor for his approval. The engrossed bill, as it passed the house, is also on file in the office of the secretary of state, but it is not signed by any person, and there is no record evidence of any kind whatever tending to show that it is in fact such engrossed bill. The only record evidence of any kind whatever showing what said bill No. 54 contained, in any of its stages from the time it was first introduced in the house until it was finally filed as an enrolled bill in the office of the secretary of state, is the enrolled bill itself. The journals of the two houses are entirely silent upon the matter, and the said engrossed bill, as we shall presently see, is not a record, nor a part of any record. An engrossed bill, in this state, is the bill as copied for final passage in either house. It is the bill, as copied before its passage, with the amendments made up to that time, and there may be one or more engrossed bills of each bill introduced; and each of these engrossed bills may be different from any of the others, for each engrossed bill simply represents the bill as the bill is when it is engrossed. The enrolled bill is the bill as copied after its final passage through both houses, and as it has passed both houses, and as presented to the governor for his signature and approval. There can be only one enrolled bill. Our laws with regard to preserving records of the proceedings of the legislature are as follows. The constitution, art. 2, provides:

"Sec. 10. Each house shall keep and publish a journal of its proceedings. The yeas and nays shall be taken, and entered immediately on the journal, upon the final passage of every bill or joint resolution.

"Sec. 11. Any member of either house shall have the right to protest against any bill or resolution; and such protest shall, without delay or alteration, be entered on the journal."

*210 *"Sec. 14. Every bill and joint resolution passed by the house of representatives and senate shall, within two days thereafter, be signed by the presiding officers, and presented to the governor. If he approve it, he shall sign it; but, if not, he shall return it to the house of representatives, which shall enter the objections at large upon its journal, and proceed to reconsider the same. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the members elected shall agree to pass the bill or resolution, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the senate, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and, if approved by two-thirds of all the members elected, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays, and entered upon the journal of each house."

The statutes provide, (Gen. St. 975, § 15, subd. 6:)

"He [the secretary of state] shall be charged with the safe-keeping of all enrolled laws and resolutions, and he shall not permit the same, or any of them, to be taken out of his office or inspected, unless by order of the governor, or by resolution of one or both houses of the legislature, under a penalty of one hundred dollars."

"Sec. 19. It shall be the duty of the secretary of state to cause the original enrolled laws and joint resolutions passed at each session of the legislature, together with an index containing the titles of the same, to be bound in a volume in a substantial manner, and in the order in which they are approved; and no other or further record of the official acts of the legislature, so far as relates to acts and joint resolutions, shall be required of said secretary; and he shall also cause the title thereof, with the session at which the same shall have been passed, to be written or printed on the back of such volume."

The statutes require that the secretary of state shall publish the laws from these enrolled laws filed in his office. Gen. St. 544, § 2. The secretary of state is also required to publish the legislative journals. Gen. St. 544, § 5. It will be noticed that the legislative journals and the enrolled bills are the only records required by law to be kept for the purpose of showing any of the legislative proceedings. There is no provision for preserving the engrossed bills as a record of the legislative proceedings; and, as the legislative jour-

*211 *nals and the enrolled bills are, by law, records, and the only records, of legislative proceedings, they must of course import absolute verity, and be conclusive proof as to whether any particular bill has passed the legislature, when it passed, how it passed, and whether it is valid or not. In many of the states, the enrolled bills alone are conclusive evidence upon this subject. Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253; Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514; Pangborn v. Young, 32 N. J. Law, 29; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650; Swan v. Buck, 40 Miss. 268; Pacific R. Co. v. Governor, 23 Mo. 352; Eld v. Gorham, 20

Conn. 8; Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 2; Broadnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244, 247; Fouke v. Flemming, 13 Md. 392; Mayor v. Harwood, 32 Md. 471. See, also, in this connection, Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475, 479; People v. Supervisors, etc., 8 N. Y. 317; People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 269; Supervisors, etc., v. People, 25 Ill. 181, 183; People v. Starne, 35 Ill. 121. In nearly every state from which the foregoing decisions are taken, and perhaps in every one of them, they have constitutional provisions requiring that each branch of the legislature shall keep a journal of its proceedings. This is particularly true in California, Indiana, New Jersey, and Connecticut. And in every one of these states, except Connecticut, Ohio, New York, and Illinois, it is held that the final bill signed by the presiding officers of the two houses, and approved by the governor, usually called the "enrolled bill," is conclusive evidence of the proper passage of such bill, and of its validity. In Connecticut, in accordance with certain statutes in force there, the published laws on file in the office of the secretary of state, properly certified, are conclusive evidence of the passage and validity of such laws, notwithstanding that the constitution requires that legislative journals shall be kept and preserved. Since the decision made in New York, reported in People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 269, 279-283, we suppose it will hardly be claimed that the state of New York furnishes any authority for going behind the enrolled bills for the purpose of impeaching the law. In Illinois *212 it is held that, except for certain constitutional provisions in that state, "a bill signed by the speaker of the two houses and approved by the governor would be conclusive of its validity, and binding force as a law." People v. Starne, 35 Ill. 121, 135. The principal constitutional provision referred to is as follows: "On the final passage of all bills, the votes shall be by ayes and nays, and shall be entered on the journal; and no bill shall become a law without the consent of a majority of all the members-elect in each house." Const. Ill. 1848, art 3, § 21. But the supreme court of Illinois has never held that the enrolled bills may be impeached by anything except by the legislative journals; and the legislative journals, even where they apparently contradict the enrolled bills, are not always sufficient to invalidate such enrolled bills. In the case of Supervisors, etc., v. People, 25 Ill. 183, the supreme court of that state say: "The constitution does require that every bill shall be read three times in each branch of the general assembly before it shall be passed into a law, but the constitution does not say that these several readings shall be entered on the journals." And therefore said court held in that case that an act of the legislature was valid, although the senate journal did not show that the bill had been read three times.

Now, let us apply the doctrine of the supreme court of Illinois to the case at the bar, and the able and venerable counsel representing the parties claiming that said Howard county division law is void, relied, in his argument upon the question, almost wholly upon an earlier decision of the supreme court of Illinois, to-wit, Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297. We have no constitutional provision requiring that a bill introduced into either house of the legislature shall in any of its stages be spread upon the journal of either house. We have no constitutional provision requiring that any record of any such bill shall be kept or preserved except as it is kept and preserved in what we call the "enrolled bill." The bill in this particular case (and this is true of all other bills) was not in any of its stages entered

*213 upon the journal of *either house of the legislature. The journals in this case do not contradict the enrolled bill; they do not in any manner conflict with any presumption in favor of the validity of the enrolled bill; nor do they furnish the slightest evidence that the bill was not legally passed by both branches of the legislature, or that it was not properly enrolled, or properly signed by the presiding officers of the two houses, or that it was not properly approved and signed by the governor, and properly filed away in the office of the secretary of state. Indeed, the report of the enrolling committee entered in the journal of the house does furnish some evidence that the bill was "correctly enrolled." We do not think that we can resort to evidence outside of the enrolled bill, and outside of the journals of the legislature, for the purpose of impeaching the enrolled bill as a valid law. Of course, we take judicial notice, without proof, of all the laws of our own state. All the courts of the state are required to do this. And, in doing this, we take judicial notice of what our books of published laws contain, of what the enrolled bills contain, of what the journals of the legislature contain, and indeed of everything that is allowed to affect the validity of any law, or that is allowed to affect or modify its meaning in any respect whatever. But in doing this, if it be merely for the purpose of taking judicial notice of our laws, we cannot take judicial notice of a fact which is not allowed to affect the validity or meaning of a law in any respect whatever; and such fact cannot even be proved to us for any such purpose. For instance, if the mistake in enrolling said bill No. 54 were allowed in any manner to affect the validity or meaning of the law as enrolled and filed in the secretary's office, we would take judicial notice of such mistake; but as such mistake (not being shown by any record) is not allowed to have any such effect upon the validity or meaning of said law, we can neither take judicial notice of the mistake, nor can it be proved to us. Now, as we have before intimated, the enrolled bills and the legislative journals being records provided for by the constitution importing abso-

*214 lute verity, we *cannot take judicial notice that they are untrue, nor can we even allow evidence to be introduced for the purpose of proving that they are not true. Therefore, as the enrolled bill of the law dividing Howard county, and the journals of the legislature, would seem to prove that said bill had been legally passed by the legislature, and had been legally approved by the governor in the form as it now appears enrolled in the secretary's office; we cannot take judicial notice that said bill was not properly so passed and so approved, and we cannot even allow evidence to be introduced showing that it was not so passed and so approved. We must therefore determine that the bill was legally passed and approved, and that it is now a valid law as it appears in the secretary's office.

There were several other objections urged against the validity of said law; but, as we think, none of them are tenable, and all of them must therefore be overruled.

We think that the provision of the constitution requiring that "the yeas and nays shall be taken, and entered immediately on the journal, upon the final passage of every bill or joint resolution," (article 2, § 10,) was sufficiently complied with. It would, of course, have been more formal if the senate, after receding from its own amendments, had again put the bill upon its final passage, and passed the bill without the amendments, as it had done with the amendments. But the manner in which this bill was passed has always been acted upon; and, if we should now hold it insufficient, we should probably invalidate a very large proportion of all the laws that have ever been enacted in Kansas. Upon this question see the case of People v. Chango, 8 N. Y. 318, 327, et seq.

The "subject" to be contained in a bill under section 16, art. 2, of the constitution, which provides that "no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title," may be as broad and comprehensive as the legislature may choose to make it. It may include innumerable minor subjects, provided all these minor subjects are capable of being so combined as to form only one *215 grand and comprehensive subject; and, if the title to the bill containing this grand and comprehensive subject is also comprehensive enough to include all these minor subjects as one subject, the bill, and all parts thereof, will be valid. Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. *334, *335; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, (2d Ed.) 517 et seq. The title to the bill now under consideration is, as we think, sufficient for the purpose of creating, upon equitable principles as to indebtedness, property, and taxation, two fully-organized new counties, to be named Elk and Chautauqua, out of the old county of Howard; and this is really but one subject, which is the substance of the bill. We would also refer to the following authorities upon this question: Blood v. Mercelliott, 58 Pa. St. 391; Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 1; Brandon v. State, 16 Ind. 197; Humboldt Co. v. County of Churchill, 6 Nev. 30. Even if section 10 of the act (Laws 1875, p. 152) should be void, the rest of the act may be valid.

We think the legislature has the power to abolish counties and county organizations whenever it becomes necessary for them to do so in changing county lines, or in creating new counties. Whether they could do so in any other case, it is not necessary for us now to determine. In the case of Hunt v. Meadows, 1 Kan. *90, it was held that an act of the territorial legislature (Terr. Laws 1861, p. 17) passed after the state was admitted into the Union, destroying the county of Madison, was valid. In Iowa, in the case of Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 1, it was held that an act destroying the county of Humboldt was valid. And we think such acts are valid. Of course, when a county is destroyed, the county-seat must go with it. The county-seat of an old county need not be made the county-seat of any new county, or, indeed of any county, new or old, into which such county-seat may be placed by a change of county lines, or by the creation of a new county; for, if such county-seat must continue to be the county-seat of the county into which it may be placed by change of county lines, a county might some time, by such change of *216 county lines, have two or three *county-seats. In this connection, see Blood v. Mercelliott, supra; Attorney General v. Fitzpatrick, 2 Wis. 542.

In two of the three cases at bar—that brought by Oberlander, as relator, against Wright and others, and that brought by McBrian, as relator, against Titus and others—judgment will be rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and peremptory writs of mandamus will be issued as prayed for. In the third case, brought by Powell and Barber, as relators, against Light, judgment will be rendered in favor of the defendant, and the peremptory writ of mandamus prayed for will be refused.

CYNTHIA JACKSON and others v. GEORGE F. LATTA.

July Term, 1875.

1. Sheriff's Deed: Void Deed. A sheriff's deed will be held to be void if it be shown that such deed is not founded upon or sustained by any judgment entered of record.
2. Judgment: Entered Nunc pro Tunc. Where, in an action, a trial was duly had, verdict returned and recorded, judgment actually rendered, but by some oversight or omission such judgment was not entered of record, it would seem that the trial court, at any time afterwards, upon notice to all the parties interested, may direct that such judgment be entered nunc pro tunc.

Error from Linn district court.

Ejectment brought by Cynthia Jackson and her three sons, James, John W., and Thomas, the widow and children of Thomas Jackson, deceased. The petition alleged that said deceased died on the twenty-ninth of December, 1861, seized in fee of the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , and lots Nos. 5 and 6, of section 10, township 21, of range 25 east, in Linn county, and containing together 149.51 acres; that the plaintiffs are the only heirs at law of said deceased; that plaintiffs James, John W., and Thomas are minors, for whom plaintiff Cynthia has been duly appointed guardian, etc.; that, as such heirs, plaintiffs are the lawful owners of said land, having a legal estate therein, and that they are entitled to the possession thereof; and that defendant, Latta, keeps them out of possession, etc. Latta appeared and answered, admitting his possession, and alleging—First, that he is the owner in fee of said lands; and, second, that he claims title to said lands under a sheriff's deed, duly executed, etc., on the thirteenth day of June, 1859, "and that more than five years have elapsed since the recording of said sheriff's deed." Reply, general denial. Second trial, at the April term, 1872, of the district court, (at which term the judge of the Tenth judicial district presided for and in the absence of the judge of the Sixth district.) The plaintiffs gave in evidence a patent for said land from the government to said Thomas Jackson, deceased, dated August 15, 1862, followed by proof showing that plaintiffs were the widow and children of said deceased, and that said Cynthia had been appointed guardian of the other plaintiffs by the county court of Monroe county, Missouri; and thereupon Latta offered in evidence the sheriff's deed under which he claimed, and being a deed for "the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 10, township 21 south, of range 25 east, Linn county, Kansas territory, containing 135 acres more or less," executed by the sheriff of Linn county to Asa Hairgrove, dated June 13, 1859, and purporting to be issued upon a sale made by said sheriff, by virtue of a writ of execution issued to him upon a judgment rendered by the United States district court sitting in Linn county, at the October term, 1858, "in an action wherein Asa Hairgrove was plaintiff, and Charles Hamilton, Algernon Hamilton, Michael Hubbard, Thomas Jackson, Stephen Hightower, James Tate, Frank Powell, Joseph Powell, Levi Henderson, A. Henderson, William Yewlock, G. P. Hamilton, A. B. Brocett, Jasper Brumfield, and N. B. Matlock, were defendants."

This deed was objected to on the ground that no judgment, execution, and sale had been shown, but the court admitted the deed. Latta then showed regular conveyances from said Hairgrove to himself. The plaintiffs, in rebuttal, gave in evidence, to impeach said deed, the record and papers in the action mentioned in the deed. The record shows a petition filed August 13, 1858, in which Hairgrove alleges that the defendants, Hamilton, Jackson, and others, "on the nineteenth of May, 1858, with force and arms, and against the will of plaintiff, did capture and take him from and near his residence, in the county of Linn and territory of Kansas, and afterwards, on the afternoon of the same day, wickedly, maliciously, and without just cause or provocation, with fire-arms, did shoot said plaintiff, thereby greatly injuring and wounding his face, and breaking the bones of plaintiff's hands," and claiming $5,000 damages; a summons and service on Matlock; affidavit for publication as to the other defendants; affidavit and undertaking for and order of attachment, with sheriff's return on the attachment, showing a levy on the lands described in the deed, and described as the property of Thomas Jackson; a notice, published in a newspaper, requiring defendants to answer said petition on or before September 11, 1858. A "motion to quash order of attachment," "because an attachment is not proper remedy in this form of action," was found among the papers, and is copied in the transcript. It is signed, "MORRHOUSE, Atty. for Defts." This motion does not seem to have been heard or disposed of. The case was tried October 29, 1858, at said October term, 1858, of said district court of the United States; Hon. JOSEPH WILLIAMS, United States district judge, presiding. The journal entry of such trial, as given in the transcript, is as follows:

"The case of Asa Hairgrove, plaintiff, against Charles A. Hamilton et al., defendants, was called for trial, and thereupon the defendants in the above cause was called three times, and they came not, neither by themselves nor attorneys; whereupon judgment was rendered by default against defendants, Charles A. Hamilton et al. A jury being desired to assess the damages in the above case, the following persons were impaneled and sworn to try the case according to law *219 *and evidence, to-wit, [giving names of jurors.] The evidence being heard in the above case, and jury charged, the case was submitted to them for their consideration. After being absent about twenty minutes, the jury returned a verdict as follows:

"We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, and assess his damages at $5,000. THOS. H. BUTLER, Foreman."

The transcript also shows that, afterwards, on the ninth of November, 1858, said clerk of said court issued an order to sell the lands and tenements, goods and chattels, of said defendants, attached in said action, which said order is in the words and figures, to-wit:

"And now comes Asa Hairgrove, plaintiff, by his attorneys, Mitchell & Ayers, and makes proof that he caused a notice containing a summary statement of the object and prayer of said petition, and notified said defendants, Charles A. Hamilton et al., that they were required to answer the said petition on the eleventh day of September, 1858, to be published six consecutive weeks in the Fort Scott Democrat, a newspaper published in the town of Fort Scott, Bourbon county, Kansas territory, and of general circulation in Linn county, (there being no newspaper published in this county,) the last publication being on the eleventh of August, 1858; and now the said defendants, having failed to appear, and answer or demur to said petition, being three times solemnly called, came not, but made default, and thereupon, by default, judgment is entered against said defendants. On motion of plaintiff's counsel it is therefore ordered that a jury be impaneled to assess the damages. Thereupon came a jury, to-wit, [giving the names of the jury,] who, being duly impaneled, and sworn the truth to speak, upon the inquiry aforesaid, do on their oaths say and assess the plaintiff's damages at the sum of $5,000. It is therefore ordered by the court that the plaintiff recover from said defendants the said sum of $5,000, and his costs herein expended, taxed at $47.20; and it is further ordered by the court that the said sheriff proceed as upon execution to advertise and sell so much of the personal and real property heretofore attached in this action, now in his hands, as will satisfy the said plaintiff's judgment aforesaid, and all costs herein, taxed at $47.20. J. WILLIAMS, Judge."

The transcript also shows that said "order of sale" was afterwards returned by the sheriff, showing that he had duly \*ad-\*220 vertised said attached property, and that on the twenty-fifth of December, 1858, by virtue of said "order of sale," he sold said N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of sec. 10, T. 21, R. 25, containing 135 acres, to Asa Hairgrove for \$6.70 per acre." Then follows this entry:

"On motion of said plaintiff, by Mitchell & Ayers, his attorneys, and on producing the return of the sheriff of this county of Linn of a sale of real estate made by him on the twenty-fifth day of December to Asa Hairgrove, * * * on an attachment issued in this case, and dated the eighteenth of August, 1858, and in an order of sale made by the district court of Linn county, Kansas territory, at the October term of said court, on the twenty-ninth of October, 1858, and the court, on the examination of said proceedings, being satisfied that said sale had been made in all respects in conformity to law, it is ordered that the said sale and proceedings be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, and the said sheriff is ordered to make to said purchaser a deed for the lands and tenements so sold.

"Made and done this seventeenth day of May, 1859.

"J. WILLIAMS, Judge."

The plaintiffs, Cynthia Jackson and others, having offered said transcript and record in evidence, and the same being received and read, thereupon moved to exclude said sheriff's deed so as aforesaid offered by defendant, Latta. This motion was overruled, and excepted to. The plaintiffs asked the following instruction, which was refused: "That the sheriff's deed read in evidence in this case is void, and that Asa Hairgrove took no title to the land in dispute under and by virtue of the said deed." The defendant asked an instruction that the plaintiffs' action, not being brought within five years from the recording of said sheriff's deed, was barred by statute of limitations, which was refused. But the court gave the following instruction: "The judgment recovered against Thomas Jackson, in the case of Asa Hairgrove v. Thomas Jackson et al., and pursuant to which the sale of said lands in controversy was had, was and is a good and valid judgment, and in full force and effect in law, so far as it affects the land in controversy, sold in pursuance to said judgment."

*221 *The jury found in favor of Latta, defendant. New trial refused, and judgment on the verdict.

McComas & McKeighan and E. M. Hulett, for plaintiffs.

If there was a judgment in form upon or under which the sale was made, such judgment was void for want of jurisdiction. The summons, as to all the defendants except Matlock, is returned "not found." The affidavit for publication is in these words: "Plaintiff, being duly sworn, says that service in the above case cannot be had upon the defendants, except by publication." Upon a publication under this affidavit, the defendants were called three times, and came not, whereupon "judgment was rendered by default." This was not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render any judgment. Shields v. Miller, 9 Kan. *390. But there is no judgment. A jury was called and assessed the damages against the defendants; but it nowhere appears in the record that any judgment was rendered upon the verdict, or entered upon the default. Immediately following the verdict, the transcript reads: "Afterwards, on the ninth of November, 1858, (the case having been heard on the twenty-ninth day of October, 1858,) said clerk of said court issued an order to sell the lands and tenements, goods and chattels, attached in said action, which said order is in words and figures as follows, to-wit." The "order" is then given, and is signed by the judge, instead of the clerk, and is in form of a judgment upon the verdict of the jury. Such order is not a judgment. It recites no judgment, as none was ever entered. It is only the statement of what the clerk supposed the unwritten judgment was; and being signed by the judge, or his name being affixed by the clerk, does not convert said "order of sale" into a judgment, even in form. No legal sale could be made under the attachment until a judgment was rendered upon a sufficient publication; and the record shows there was no legal publication against the defendants. Repine v.

McPherson, 2 Kan. *340.

*222 *Among the files was found a paper purporting to be a motion to discharge the attachment. It was claimed by defendant below that this paper showed an "appearance" by Jackson and the other defendants in the original action. Upon this point, we submit the following observations: This paper was never marked "Filed" by the clerk. It was never called to the attention of the court, nor acted upon. There is nothing to show it was not stuck into the files long after the lands in controversy were sold under such pretended judgment. It is signed, "MOREHOUSE, Atty. for Defts.;" but whether the defendant who was served, or some of the other defendants, it does not say. There is nothing in the proceedings of the court, as shown by the journal entries, to show this man "Morehouse" ever acted, or assumed to act, in the case as attorney for any defendant. On the contrary, the records show the judgment was rendered by "default," and not upon appearance. We contend that the pretended motion to quash cannot be regarded as an appearance of Thomas Jackson, and this leaves the case, as to him, without service, either personal or by publication, and of course without jurisdiction to render the pretended judgment under which Latta claims title.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action in the nature of an action of ejectment, brought by Cynthia Jackson and others against George F. Latta. The plaintiffs claim as heirs of the original patentee, Thomas Jackson. The defendant claims under a sheriff's deed executed June 13, 1859, to Asa Hairgrove, on a supposed judgment rendered in favor of said Hairgrove, and against said Thomas Jackson and others. On the trial in the court below, after the plaintiffs had introduced their evidence, and rested their case, the defendant introduced said sheriff's deed in evidence, showing a regular chain of title from Hairgrove to himself. The sheriff's deed was of course sufficient evidence, prima facie, to show that the title to the property in controversy had passed from Jackson to Hairgrove. Ogden *v. Walters, 12 Kan. *292, and cases there cited. The plaintiffs then introduced the record of the proceedings upon which said sheriff's deed is founded. No objection was made to the introduction of this record. No claim was made that it was not the whole of the record, and a true record of each and all of the proceedings had in the case of "Hairgrove against Thomas Jackson and others," which constitutes the foundation for the defendant's sheriff's deed. Hence, if this record should be defective in any essential and material particular, the sheriff's deed founded thereon must be void. Now, said record seems to show that no judgment was ever entered of record in said case of "Hairgrove against Jackson and others;" and, as judgments can be proved only by a record, it would seem to show that no such judgment was ever rendered. There is no record of any such judgment, and hence, for the purpose of the case, we are bound to say that no such judgment was ever rendered. And, there being no judgment, said sheriff's deed of course is void. It cannot exist without having a judgment as a foundation. It is also claimed by the plaintiffs that said sheriff's deed is void for other reasons, but we do not think that the claim is tenable. What answer the defendant would make to the different claims of the plaintiffs we are at a loss to know, for the defendant has filed no brief, nor made any oral argument in this court.

We should think from the record brought to this court that a judgment had in fact been rendered in the said case of "Hairgrove against Jackson and others," but that it had never been entered of record on the journals of the court. We think the evidence furnished by the record itself strongly proves this to be true. And, if we are correct in all this, it would be an easy matter, in a proper proceeding, and with proper notice to all parties interested, to have the judgment that was actually rendered entered of record nunc pro tunc. The verdict of the jury, and the paper signed by the judge, show what the judgment actually rendered, but not entered, was; and, if such *224 judgment was entered nunc pro tunc, it would probably uphold said sheriff's deed, not only as against these plaintiffs, who merely claim as heirs of said Thomas Jackson, but as against others also, for the defendant and his grantors have been continuously in possession of the property for many years, their possession commencing before the death of said Thomas Jackson.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

JAMES R. CARTRIGHT v. ARTHUR SMITH.

July Term, 1875.

Supreme Court: Error not Affirmatively Shown: Affirmance of Judgment. In an action of replevin, tried by a justice of the peace, where it is difficult to determine from the record in whose favor the justice found, or intended to find, and where the justice rendered judgment in favor of the defendant for three dollars damages, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for costs, and did not render any judgment concerning the property in controversy, whereupon the defendant took the case to the district court on petition in error, and the district court reversed the judgment of the justice of the peace, and then rendered judgment in favor of said defendant for his costs both in the district court and the justice's court, held, that the judgment of the district court will not be disturbed on the application of said plaintiff.

Error from Miami district court.

Replevin, brought by Cartright as plaintiff, and tried before T. J. T., a justice of the peace. The transcript contains the following, made, given, submitted, and pronounced on the thirty-first of May, 1873, to-wit: "On hearing the evidence, and carefully weighing it, together with the pleadings of their attorneys, the court is in doubt that *225 the inclosure around the field where the wheat was growing was not a legal fence. Such was the testimony of Mr. Barr. But where he supposed the hog got in, it was according to his measurement. Taking the testimony as a whole, the finding of the court is that the plaintiff pay the defendant the three dollars tendered him; and that the defendant, who, according to the evidence before the court, refused to take a fair compensation for damages, when tendered, and when asked what amount of damages he claimed, refused to fix any amount thus amicably sought, (saying 'they would come to town to learn,') pay the costs of suit, taxed at the sum of $24.15."

The district court, at the September term, 1873, on petition in error, reversed said judgment.

J. H. C. Royce, for plaintiff.

Roberts & Kingsley, for defendant.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action of replevin, brought by Cartright against Smith, in a justice's court, for the recovery of a certain hog which belonged to Cartright. The hog trespassed upon Smith's premises. Smith took it up. Cartright demanded the hog, and tendered Smith three dollars for damages, cost, and expense. Smith refused to receive the tender, or to give up the hog. Cartright then replevied the hog from Smith, and still has possession of the same. The action was tried by the justice without a jury. It is difficult to determine from the record in whose favor the justice found, or intended to find. But the justice rendered judgment in favor of the defendant for three dollars damages, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for costs, and did not render any judgment concerning the property in controversy. The defendant then took the case to the district court on petition in error. The district court reversed the judgment of the justice of the peace, and then rendered judgment in favor of said defendant, Smith, for his costs, both in the district court and in the justice's court. Now, whether *226 *the said Smith wrongfully detained said hog or not we cannot tell from the record. Whether the justice intended to find that Smith wrongfully or rightfully detained said hog we cannot tell from the record. Whether the judgment in the justice's court should have been for the plaintiff, or for the defendant, we cannot tell from the record. And therefore, whether the district court erred in its judgment or not, we cannot tell from the record. Perhaps it is fair, where a plaintiff institutes proceedings, and causes costs to be made, that he should pay such costs, unless he make the record show affirmatively that he should not pay them. The apparent reason given by the justice for imposing the costs upon the defendant is certainly not sufficient.

As it is not shown affirmatively that the court below erred, the judgment must be affirmed.

v.15k—12

F. T. NASH v. W. J. CAMPBELL, Treasurer, etc.

July Term, 1875.

Supreme Court: Review: Order of Probate Judge. A petition in error will not lie to the supreme court to review an order made by the judge of the probate court, refusing a temporary injunction in a case pending in the district court.

Error from Cloud district court.

Action by Nash against Campbell, as county treasurer, to enjoin the collection of a tax. The case is stated in the opinion.

L. J. Crans, for plaintiff, filed an elaborate brief, arguing that *227 plaintiff was, under the law, entitled to an injunction. *He does not discuss the question whether an appeal would lie from the order of a probate judge in refusing to grant an injunction in an action pending in the district court.

H. A. Hunter, for defendant.

First, the probate judge had no jurisdiction, his powers being limited by section 8 of article 3 of the constitution; second, the case could not be removed to the supreme court until heard before the district court, or a judge thereof. Const. art. 3, § 10; Civil Code, §§ 541, 542. The probate judge is not a judge of the district court.

VALENTINE, J. This action was commenced in the district court of Cloud county, for the purpose of perpetually enjoining the collection of a certain tax. The plaintiff then applied to the judge of the probate court, the judge of the district court being absent from the county, for a temporary injunction to restrain the collection of said tax until the case could finally be heard in the district court. The judge of the probate court refused to grant said temporary injunction, and of that refusal the plaintiff now complains. No application was made to the district court, or to the judge thereof, for a temporary injunction in this case, and no attempt has been made to have the district court, or the judge thereof, review the order of the probate judge refusing said temporary injunction.

The first question to be considered in this case, and the only one, if we answer this in the negative, is whether a petition in error will lie to this court from an order of the probate judge refusing a temporary injunction. There is no law that authorizes any such thing. There is a statute that provides that "the supreme court may also reverse, vacate, or modify any of the following orders of the district court, or a judge thereof: First, a final order; second, an order that grants or refuses a continuance, discharges, vacates, or modifies a provisional remedy, or grants, refuses, vacates, or modifies an *228 *injunction," etc. Civil Code, § 542. This statute provides for and authorizes the supreme court to review an order made by the judge of the district court refusing an injunction. But there is no statute that provides for or authorizes the supreme court to review any order made by the probate judge. This petition in error must therefore be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in the supreme court to adjudicate upon matters involved therein.

STATE OF KANSAS v. A. L. McLAUGHLIN, Co. Treas., and another.

July Term, 1875.

1. Taxation: State cannot Enjoin, when. Where a school-district had issued bonds in excess of its powers, and which were void in the hands of the holders, and thereafter, on the maturity of the bonds, a tax had been levied to pay them off, and proceedings had advanced so far that the tax-roll was in the hands of the county treasurer, and where the tax-payers, without multiplicity of suits, and by a single action, had adequate and complete protection against this illegal tax, held, that the state could not maintain an action of injunction to restrain the treasurer from proceeding to collect said tax.<sup>1</sup>
- [2. Effect of Decision. The decision in this case will not prevent the attorney general from prosecuting an action in the name of the state to prevent a public injustice that could not otherwise be avoided. Per VALENTINE, J.]

Error from Brown district court.

Injunction, brought in the name of the state, upon the relation of A. L. Williams, attorney general, to restrain the collection of certain taxes. The district court, at the January term, 1874, refused a temporary injunction, holding that the state, as "plaintiff, is not a party in interest to the subject-matter in said action, and cannot, in any event, be entitled to any relief therein prayed for." The origi-

*229 nal petition *was verified by R. E. W., J. F., and J. M. Y., then the director, treasurer, and clerk of the school-district issuing the school-district bonds alleged to be void. The First Congregational Church of Sabetha was joined with the county treasurer as a defendant, and the petition alleged that said church society claimed to own said bonds.

W. D. Webb for plaintiff.

Said Sabetha church society was a party to the issuing of said bonds, and knew all the facts and circumstances connected with the issuing thereof. The trustees of the church, and nearly all the members of the church, lived in the school-district at the time said bonds were issued, and the members of said church and the officers of the same were present at the school-district meetings, and voted in favor of the issuing of said bonds to their church. The petition and verification show that the persons who felt particularly interested in preventing the excess of power of the district, that is, the issuing and paying the bonds issued to the church society, were the officers of the school-district. But a newly-elected set of officers now come to this court with a motion to dismiss the action here. The complication arises from a desire of the church defendant, who now has control of the officers of the school-district, to assume control of the case, and to pay off the bonds to their church. This case is commenced on the relation of the attorney general; and the school-district, as a body politic or corporate, has no power in the matter to ask for the dismissal of the case on the ground that the district is willing to pay the bonds. When a school-district or a corporation seeks to pervert its powers, or to exceed them, the state is the proper party to prevent it. We claim that the newly-elected officers of the school-district have no power to assume control of the case. Whenever it comes to the knowledge of the attorney general that a school-district is usurping power, or is proposing to divert the funds of the district, the state has the right to restrain the district from the abuse *230 of powers granted, or from exercising those not *granted.

School-districts are a part of the governmental machinery of the state, subordinate departments of the state government, with their allotted functions to perform, possessing the power of controlling and expending large sums of public funds; and when they attempt to improperly dispose of the public moneys, or exercise powers not granted, the state may, through its proper officers, prevent it; and when the state makes the attempt to prevent an unlawful application of the funds of the district, to say that the officers of the district may come in and assume control of the suit, dismiss it, and go on and misapply the funds, we respectfully submit is a dangerous doctrine. State v. Saline County Court, 51 Mo. 350; Kirkpatrick v. State, 5 Kan. *687; Bridge Co. v. County of Wyandotte, 10 Kan. *326.

No school-district has the power to build a school-house to rent for a church, or for any other purpose. Much less have they the right to go to extra expense of putting in pews and pulpit "suitable for church purposes." There is no authority to allow a misapplication of the school-house, any more than there is of the school fund. The petition shows that it was the intention to devote the building to other purposes than school purposes, viz., "church purposes," and the bonds were voted and issued to enable the district to do so. We cite on this point Fractional School-district v. Mallary, 23 Mich. 111; People v. Hatch, 60 Barb. 228; Lilburn v. School-district, 26 Wis. 585; School-directors v. Sippy, 54 Ill. 287; St. Luke's Church v. Slack, 7 Cush. 226; Pickett v. School-district, 25 Wis. 551.

W. W. Guthrie, for defendants.

The defendants contend that the state, as plaintiff, cannot bring and maintain this action; that the state has no interest in the subject-matter of litigation, and is not entitled to relief; and that no case is made out by petition. If the plaintiff's petition is true, this is a case in which each individual tax-payer is individually interested to the extent of his taxable property in the district, and all who desire to sue may do so, separately or jointly, under section 253 of the Code. Atchison v. Barthalow, 4 Kan. *124. But plaintiff has no interest or right to prosecute this action, at least within section 26 of

and an adverse determination of this action would not bar the tax-payers of the district from litigating this matter. This action is but an experiment, without any person responsible for costs, and comes within no principle laid down in Craft v. Jackson Co., 5 Kan. *518.

BREWER, J. This was an action brought by the state, upon the relation of the attorney-general, to restrain the county treasurer of Brown county from further proceedings to collect certain taxes; and the principal question presented is as to the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action. The facts alleged are that a school-district, some years since, made an arrangement with a church society by which, upon condition that the latter advanced a thousand dollars, the former should, in building the public school-house, make arrangements for a room for the church services of the latter; that this arrangement was carried into effect, and to secure this advancement two bonds of the district were executed, delivered to the church, and still remain in its possession; that, the bonds maturing, a levy was duly made to pay them off, and that proceedings had advanced so far that the defendant the county treasurer had possession of the tax-roll, and was proceeding to collect, with other taxes, the tax for this purpose. The church and the county treasurer are the only parties made defendants. It is nowhere alleged that any tax-payer in the district questioned the legality of the tax, or had any objection to paying his proportion of the amount necessary to redeem these bonds. Nor does it appear that there was any want of good faith on the part of the district or the church, or that the contract was not satisfactory to both parties, and fully and fairly executed by both. The case is rested upon the naked proposition that the contract, being ultra vires of the district, the bonds are void, and that the tax-payers of the district, whether willing or not, must not be allowed to pay them. The *232 district judge decided that the action *would not lie in the name of the state on the relation of the attorney-general. The plaintiff brought this ruling here on error. Since it has been pending in this court, the officers of the district have filed a written request and order that the case be dismissed. It is obvious that this interference on the part of the state is unnecessary for the protection of any rights. It is not a case where, but for the intervention of the state, an irremediable wrong will be perpetrated. Conceding the bonds to be void, each and every tax-payer has ample protection by an action of injunction. Nor is a multiplicity of suits necessary. The tax, as a tax, being illegal, all the tax-payers may unite in a single action. Hudson v. County of Atchison, 12 Kan. *140. It is apparent, too, that no action of the corporation, the school-district, is sought to be prevented. It is not even a party to the suit. So far as the bonds are concerned, the school-district issued them long ago. So far as any levy of taxes is concerned, that has already been done. All that now remains is the action of the ministerial officer, the treasurer, in collecting the taxes, and the subsequent payment of the bonds. It is clear, too, that there is no express warrant in the constitution or the statutes for such an action on the part of the attorney general. The constitution is silent as to the powers and duties of that officer. Const. art. 1, §§ 1, 14. The statute defining his duties grants no such power,—imposes no such duty. Gen. St. 986, 987. If such power exists, it must be by virtue of the general power of the state to supervise and control the action of all corporations and officers, and the fact that the attorney general is the general law officer of the state. While, in a certain sense, it may be true that the state has a supervision and control over all its corporations and officers, yet to conclude therefrom that it is either the duty or the privilege of the attorney general to interfere in the case of every illegal act of a corporation or officer would be a deduction both novel and startling. Actions of quo warranto may be brought by the attorney general against both officers and corporations for ouster and forfeiture.

*233 Laws 1871, *p. 276, §§ 1, 2. In the fourth clause of this first section it is expressly provided that the action may be brought "when any corporation abuses its power, or exercises powers not conferred by law." It may not, however, follow from this that quo warranto is the only remedy. It cannot be maintained by one who has no other interest than as a citizen and tax-payer. Miller v. Town of Palermo, 12 Kan. *14. If the wrong is of a public nature, affecting the community in general, the state, through its proper officers, can alone maintain the action. Mandamus will lie at the instance of the attorney general when the duty sought to be compelled is one of a purely public nature. Bobbett v. Dresher, 10 Kan. *9. It will not, under the same circumstances, lie at the instance of a mere citizen and tax-payer. So, too, we think the process of injunction may be invoked by the state in any proper case. Indeed, we know of no reason why the state may not avail itself of any of the writs and processes of the law available to individuals for the enforcement of rights and the redress of wrongs. So that the form of the action is no objection, if the right exists in the state to interfere.

It is obvious that the state, as a state, has no direct interest in this controversy, any more than in a controversy between individuals. The payment of these bonds may be illegal, but their payment works no greater wrong to the state than the payment by a single individual of an illegal debt. The single individual may, if he chooses, by appealing to the ordinary proceedings of the law, protect himself against such illegal payment. So may the many tax-payers.

The case of State v. County Court, 51 Mo. 350, is cited as authority. There, by a divided court, the right of the state was sustained to interfere by injunction to restrain the county court from issuing bonds in pursuance of an illegal subscription, and the officers and collector from levying, assessing, and collecting taxes to pay interest or principal of some of the bonds already issued. In reference to the levy it appeared that the county court had included the tax in the general county taxes, so that it could not be separated, and the tax-*234 *payer could not tell what part was legal and what illegal.

The general doctrine was laid down that "it is competent for the state, at common law, through its officers, to maintain proceedings by injunction to restrain public corporations from doing acts in violation of the constitution and laws of the state." It would seem from the opinion of the court, given by SHEPLEY, special judge, that the action would not have been sustained if the bonds had already been issued, the tax levied, and so levied that the tax-payers, by a single action, could have protected themselves. Two cases are referred to in the opinion as containing full discussions of the principles involved: one that of Davis v. City of New York, 2 Duer, 663, in which Judge DUER reached the conclusion that in an action brought by two tax-payers against the mayor and others to restrain the construction of a street railroad upon Broadway, for the doing and operating of which the municipal authorities of the city had given authority, the attorney general was a necessary party; and the other, that of Attorney General v. Miner, 2 Lans. 396, in which Judge MULLEN concludes that the only cases in which "the attorney general was authorized to interfere to restrain corporate action, or was a necessary party to an action for that purpose, were those in which the act complained of would produce a public nuisance, or tend to the breach of a trust for charitable uses." We have referred to these three cases, not as covering the exact question before us, but as containing full discussions of the general question of the right of the state to interfere by injunction to restrain apprehended wrong on the part of public corporations and officers; for in this case, as already noticed, corporate action has ceased, and the interference of the state is sought to restrain a ministerial officer, and that not an officer of the corporation, from discharging the ordinary duties of his office, although those duties are based partially upon the prior illegal corporate action, when the individuals affected thereby have complete and adequate remedy without multiplicity of suits, and by a single action. No authority to which we have been *referred has gone so far as to sustain such an action; and we think the same cannot be maintained. As private citizens, unless specially authorized, may not interfere to compel the performance of a mere public duty, or restrain the doing of a mere public wrong, so the state, having no direct interest, may not interfere to protect individuals from the illegal acts of a public officer, where such individuals have, in the ordinary course of the law, ample and adequate means of protection. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J. I concur, with some doubts, in the decision of this case; for while, under the circumstances of this case, eminent justice has been done by the decision, yet, at first view, I thought there might be cases where such a decision might allow manifest injustice to be done. Thousands of bonds for various purposes have been issued in different portions of this state within the last six or eight years, illegally, fraudulently, flagrantly, perfidiously, and in many cases where all the local officers who would have the power to commence an action to have such bonds declared void are interested in having them held valid, and where the individual tax-payers of the locality have no adequate remedy. But, after a careful consideration of the question, I have come to the conclusion that the decision in this case will not prevent the attorney general from prosecuting an action in the name of the state to prevent a public injustice that could not otherwise be avoided. Judgment affirmed.

*M. S. GRANT v. JOHN L. PENDERY.

July Term, 1875.

1. Pleading: Issue: Reply Filed after Jury Sworn. The district court may allow a plaintiff, who is in default for want of a reply, to file the same, even after the jury has been impaneled and sworn to try the cause; and the court may then proceed with the trial without further delay; and, unless it appear that the district court has abused its discretion in such a case, the supreme court will not reverse its rulings.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup>Courts may sometimes commit substantial error by refusing to permit amendments to be made to pleadings during the progress of the trial. Wright v. Bacheller, 16 Kan. 259; Rice v. Hodge, 26 Kan. 164.

6. Trial: Reading Depositions: Striking Out Testimony. The defendant offered in evidence the deposition of a certain witness. The plaintiff objected. The court overruled the objection. The defendant then read in evidence the examination in chief of said witness, and refused to read the cross-examination. The plaintiff then moved the court to strike out that portion of the deposition which had been read, unless the defendant would offer and read in evidence the balance of the deposition. The defendant still refusing to read the balance of said deposition, the court struck out what had been read, and instructed the jury not to consider the same. Held, no error.

Error from Leavenworth district court.

Clough & Wheat, for plaintiff in error.

Under section 128 of the Code, the new matter in the answer stood for true until leave was given to reply, and we claim that could not lawfully be done after the jury was impaneled. The case should be considered as though no reply had been filed. As the second, if not the third, defense was sufficient, and as Grant would have been entitled to judgment but for such improper filing of the reply, and as the filing of it at the time was a wrong procured by Pendery, he should not now be permitted to have advantage thereof; and Grant's motion for judgment should have been sustained, and should now be sustained by this court. See Irwin v. Paulett, 1 Kan. *418.

Injustice, without notice or warning, has been perpetrated on Grant, by the rendition of a judgment on supposed facts not alleged against him. It is not pretended by the verdict that the mills were delivered to him, or that he made any promise for the consideration alleged in employed by a contractor, that if he did not quit work he would see him paid, provided the contractor did not pay him, is void, Morrissey v. Kinsey, 19 N. W. Rep. 455; guaranty of payment, verbally made, for anything a third party should want in equipping a mill, at which he was to make shingles for the promisor, is within the statute, Studley v. Barth, 19 N. W. Rep. 568; entry in books of party who sold goods is admissible upon the question as to whom credit was given, Winslow v. Dakota L. Co., 20 N. W. Rep. 145; a promise by a party to pay a debt due from another, made to a creditor, who neither gives up his claim against the original debtor, nor any lien upon his property that he may have, must be in writing to satisfy the statute of frauds. Vaughn v. Smith, 23 N. W. Rep. 684.

Pendery's petition; but, if the judgment can be sustained, it is only on a very different state of facts than those in that petition alleged. To defeat the case made by the petition, it was only necessary for Grant to show either non-delivery to him of the mills, or that they were taken away, and that is fully shown in the case; yet the jury find what Pendery now pretends was an executory contract, not performed, because of the declination of Grant to accept the mills,—a matter not in issue; and, further, that the verdict does not show *238 either a consent on the part of Cooper that Grant should pay Pendery for the mills, or that Grant for a consideration promised to pay him therefor; that it was necessary that the jury should have found such consent, and have stated that Grant, for a consideration named in the verdict, as such, promised Pendery to pay him, etc. 1 Chit. Pl. 293, 297. The verdict, if it showed any liability as against Grant whatever, only shows him prima facie liable to Cooper. To make him liable to Pendery the verdict should have shown that Cooper consented that Grant should pay Pendery for the mills, and that in consideration thereof Grant promised so to do. For the want of such showing, Grant was entitled to a judgment on his motion. The petition and verdict both show that if Grant made any promise it was to pay a part of the debt of another person. St. Frauds, § 6.

The court erred in striking out the part of the deposition read by Grant. The evidence stricken out was material and competent, and Grant was no more required to read the cross-examination contained in that deposition than he would have been to have cross-examined the witness for the benefit of Pendery, if the witness had been personally present at the trial.

The court erred in refusing to give the seventeenth instruction. Oral evidence, without a notice to produce, was not competent to prove such a lost paper. A pretended copy retained, does not show what the original was. It is not the case of original duplicates of contracts, signed by the parties to the original, or of a notice, as the paper was not a mere notice. The court should have given the seventh, eighth, and tenth instructions. It was not for either Cooper or Pendery to change the place of delivery, or to recover as for mills delivered under a contract, without a delivery, as thereby required; and we think Grant had a right to have the jury, in substance, told that neither Cooper nor Pendery could himself change the place of delivery.

The filing of reply or answer is a matter in the discretion of the court, (Code, § 106;) for the law gives the court authority to extend the time for filing either. The error claimed, that the contract set out in the petition and proved in evidence is within the statute of frauds, is so untenable that it is needless to hunt authorities to refute it. Under our statutes the real party in interest is authorized to institute suit, and it is a new idea that an arrangement such as is exhibited in the petition in this case, and shown by the testimony and special verdict, can be termed an agreement to pay the debts of another. Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268.

The consent of Cooper to the payment by Grant to Pendery for the mills is explicitly shown by the verdict. The sixth finding establishes a tender of part and refusal to accept, and offer to deliver the remainder, and refusal to accept. This makes the tender complete. Loomis v. Tillinghast, 3 Johns. Cas. 477; Sheldon v. Skinner, 4 Wend. 525.

The court rightly excluded the deposition offered by plaintiff in error, because he refused to read the whole of said deposition. A party offering a deposition offers it all; and if he refuses to read it all, he should be allowed to read none of it. The cross-examination is as much a part of the deposition as the direct examination.

The instructions refused contain abstract propositions of law not applicable to the case, and for these reasons were properly refused. The seventeenth instruction refused, is in regard to a copy of notice which was in evidence. Two were made out, one given to Grant, the other retained. Grant testified that he could not find his copy, and Pendery produced his. It was a notice, and an original. Even as a copy, under the evidence, it was clearly admissible, the original being lost.

VALENTINE, J. The petition in the court below alleged, in substance, that one W. A. Cooper owed the plaintiff below, *John *240 L. Pendery, on a promissory note, the sum of $1,140.40; that said Cooper sold and agreed to deliver to the defendant below, M. S. Grant, fifty fanning-mills, for which Grant was to pay said plaintiff the sum of $750, of which $400 was to be paid in farming implements, and the other $350 in cash; that the plaintiff then gave to Cooper a credit of $750 on said note; that said mills were tendered and delivered to said defendant, and still remain subject to his control; that the defendant has failed and refuses to pay said $750, or any part thereof, either in farming implements or in cash, and plaintiff demanded judgment for that amount. The defendant filed answer to said petition, which is in substance—First, a general denial; second, the plaintiff and Cooper "retook, carried away, and themselves disposed of all said mills;" third, the defendant "never promised, in writing," to pay the plaintiff anything. Afterwards the case was called for trial; a jury was impaneled and sworn; and the plaintiff then, and for the first time, asked leave of the court to file a reply to the defendant's answer. The court granted such leave. The reply, which was a general denial, was filed. The trial then proceeded, the jury not being resworn. And all this was done over the objections and exceptions of the defendant. When said reply was filed, the "defendant moved the court to postpone the trial of said action, because, he said, he was not ready to proceed then to the trial of the issues made by said reply; but said court then overruled said motion, to which ruling and decision of said court said defendant excepted. And then said defendant moved said court to continue said action to the next term of said court because of said filing of such reply, but said court then overruled said motion, to which ruling and decision of said court said defendant then excepted." No reason was given for objecting to the filing of said reply, and no other or different reason than those above mentioned was given for asking for a postponement of the trial, or for asking for a continuance. And the motions made for such postponement and continuance were not supported by any oath or *241 affidavit. *It will be noticed that the reply could apply to the second defense stated in defendant's answer only, as the other two defenses did not need a reply. During the trial there were several exceptions taken by the defendant to certain rulings of the court with regard to the introduction of evidence, and with regard to giving or refusing instructions to the jury. The jury found a special verdict, which, as we think, is a substantial finding upon all the issues in the case in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, and the jury assessed the plaintiff's damages at $700. Motions were made by the defendant for a new trial, and for judgment in his favor upon the verdict, both of which motions the court overruled, and then rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $700 and costs. And to reverse this judgment the defendant now prosecutes this petition in error.

Probably the most difficult question in the case is whether the court below abused its discretion by allowing said reply to be filed as it did, and then immediately proceeding with the trial of the cause. The plaintiff was apparently guilty of gross laches in not filing his reply sooner. He had then been for more than four months in default for want of a reply; and he did not even then ask to file his reply until after the jury had been impaneled and sworn to try the cause. And the court then allowed him to file the reply without the slightest showing of diligence, without the slightest showing that his reply was true, or that the defense which the reply put in issue was not true, and without the slightest terms of any kind whatever being imposed upon him. Some terms ought evidently to have been imposed upon him as a condition upon which he might file the reply,—a verification by affidavit of the truth of the reply, a postponement of the trial, a continuance of the case, or a payment of the costs of the term, or some portion thereof. But still we cannot say that the court below so abused its discretion that we must reverse the judgment on that account. It is true, the defendant said (not under oath, *242 not by affidavit) that "he was not ready to proceed then to *the trial of the issues made by said reply." But he did not even intimate that he ever would be ready to try such issues. He did not claim that he had the slightest hope of ever being better prepared to try such issues than he was at that very time. Hence it does not seem that delay would have been of any benefit to him. That the court, exercising a sound judicial discretion, had a right to allow said reply to be filed, and to proceed immediately with the trial, we suppose will not be denied. Civil Code, § 106; Taylor v. Hosick, 13 Kan. *518, *526. It was not necessary that the jury should be resworn. They had already been "sworn to well and truly try the matters submitted to them in the case in hearing, and a true verdict give according to the law and the evidence," (Code, § 274,) and that was sufficient. They were not sworn to try the matters that had already been submitted to them, but to try the matters that should afterwards be submitted to them. And the matters to be submitted to them may be changed during the trial.

It seems hardly necessary for us to say that the contract between Grant, Cooper, and Pendery is not void as coming within the statute of frauds. Gen. St. 505, c. 43, § 6. Grant did not merely agree to pay the debt of Cooper, but he agreed to pay his own debt to Pendery. But it is claimed that the verdict of the jury does not show any consent on the part of Cooper to the payment by Grant to Pendery. Now, the fifth finding of the jury states, among other things, that "the said defendant, Grant, agreed with said Cooper to take fifty of said mills," etc., "and agreed to pay the proceeds, amounting to the sum of $750, to the plaintiff Pendery," etc. How could there be an agreement between Grant and Cooper that Grant should pay Pendery $750 without Cooper consenting to it? The contract was in fact made between Grant, Cooper, and Pendery. All participated in it, and all agreed to it. And Pendery, on the very day that the contract was made, gave Cooper the credit on the note. Grant not only agreed with and promised Cooper to pay Pendery, but he also agreed *243 with *and promised Pendery himself to do so. The arrangement was mutual and reciprocal between the three parties. But in any case Pendery has obtained all of Cooper's interest in said $750. He is the real party in interest with regard thereto, and therefore he undoubtedly has the right to sue for it. (As to a contract made between two persons for the benefit of a third, see Anthony v. Herman, 14 Kan. *494.)

It is claimed that the tender of said mills was not sufficient. A portion of them were duly tendered, and Grant, without any sufficient reason, refused to accept or receive them, or any of the mills sold to him, and then they were all stored in a safe and convenient place for the benefit of Grant, and subject to his order, and he was duly notified thereof. This was sufficient. The refusal of Grant to accept said mills excused the formal tender and delivery of those not formally tendered.

The defendant offered in evidence the deposition of a certain witness. The plaintiff objected. The court overruled the objection. The defendant then read in evidence the examination in chief of said witness, and refused to read the cross-examination. The plaintiff then moved the court to strike out that portion of the deposition that had been read, unless the defendant would offer and read in evidence the balance of the deposition. The defendant still refusing to read the balance of said deposition, the court struck out what had been read, and instructed the jury not to consider the same. We see no error in this.

The seventh, eighth, and tenth instructions which the defendant asked to have given to the jury, and which the court refused, are not applicable to the facts of this case. *Jaedicke v. Scrafford, ante, *120.*

The seventeenth instruction which the defendant asked to have given to the jury, and which the court refused, was properly refused. It was with regard to a notice served by Cooper upon Grant. The notice was made out in duplicate, and one copy was served on Grant, and the other was retained by Pendery. Pendery's copy was introduced in evidence upon the preliminary (but mistaken) evidence that it was the copy served on Grant. Afterwards it was shown that Grant was served, prior to a former trial of the case, with a notice to produce his copy on that trial. And it was also shown that Grant, on that trial, testified that he could not find his copy of the notice. Grant also testified on the present and last trial of this case, and testified subsequently to the introduction of Pendery's copy of said notice in evidence, and he did not say a word about it. The instruction asked was, in substance, that the jury should not consider said Pendery's copy of the notice at all, even if they should consider it a true copy of the notice served on Grant. We think the instruction was properly refused. Besides, the notice had but very little materiality in the case, and the jury would probably and rightfully have found just as they did if the notice had been stricken out of the evidence.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring. BREWER, J., not sitting in the case.

FORT SCOTT COAL & MIN. Co. v. JOHN SWEENEY.

July Term, 1875.

1. Pleading: Answer cannot Vary Terms of Written Agreement. Allegations in an answer, so far as they attempt to vary or contradict the terms or import of an admitted written contract between the parties, set forth in the petition, are mere nullities; and it is not error for the court to exclude evidence, offered by the defendant, in support of them.
2. Trial: Instructions to Find for Plaintiff. Where neither the answer, nor the evidence offered by the defendant, nor both together, make out a sufficient defense to the plaintiff's cause of action, it is not error for the court to instruct the jury to find for the plaintiff.

*245 *Error from Bourbon district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

McComas & McKeighan, for plaintiff in error.

Harris & Spencer, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. On December 12, 1872, the Fort Scott Coal & Mining Company entered into a written contract with John Sweeney, whereby Sweeney leased unto said company, their successors and assigns, "for the full term of two years, (with the privilege of continuing said lease at its expiration,) the sole and exclusive right and privilege of boring, digging, and otherwise prospecting for coal, petroleum, lead, or other valuable substance on the following described tract of land, to-wit, the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  sec. 34, T. 26, R. 25, in Bourbon county, and of taking out and of working the same, together with the right of way and surface use of such land as may be necessary for the economical and efficient working of the same." The only consideration moving from the mining company to Sweeney for this lease, as the same is expressed in the written contract, is as follows: One dollar paid down, one cent royalty on each bushel of coal taken from the leased premises, except that "all coal from the shafts, entries, turn-outs, air-courses, and coal used at the works, is to be free from rental or royalty." "The Fort Scott Coal & Mining Company also agree to pay to said John Sweeney royalty to the amount of \$500 on or before the first day of May, 1873; said money to be considered as royalty in advance if said company have not at that time taken out 50,000 bushels of coal." Said \$500 was not paid when it be-\*246 came due, and on May 8, 1873, Sweeney commenced this action against said company to recover the same. The defendant answered, alleging as a defense to the plaintiff's cause of action "that the consideration moving the defendant to take and enter into said lease and agreement was that the defendant might have the right to go upon the land therein described, and dig and remove therefrom good, merchantable, and marketable coal, which it was be*lied and understood* at said time by the plaintiff and defendant was to be found therein. Defendant says that there was not, nor is there, any good, marketable, or merchantable coal upon or in said premises; nor was there, nor is there, any coal upon or in said premises, as was supposed at the time of making said lease and agreement; and that Sweeney agreed and promised, at the time of making the lease, that the coal to be found and taken from the leased premises was good and merchantable coal." The case was tried before the court and a jury. The defendant offered to introduce evidence showing that the coal taken from said premises was not good, merchantable, marketable coal, and that the defendant did not know, at the time when the defendant entered into said written contract, that said coal was not good merchantable coal. The court excluded the evidence, and afterwards instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff, which the jury did; and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff and against the defendant for said \$500, and interest and costs. The defendant now, as plaintiff in error, seeks to reverse that judgment.

There is no claim that there was no coal on or in said land. It would seem from the evidence offered and introduced that there was plenty of it. There may have been millions of bushels. Indeed, from anything appearing in the record, the defendant may have taken from said land hundreds of thousands of bushels of coal before this suit was commenced. Neither is there anything in the record showing how much "petroleum, lead, or other valuable substance" said land contained. The only claim of the defendant, as a defense, is that the coal found in said land is not "good, marketable, *247 merchantable coal." Now, *suppose it is not, may not the plaintiff still recover? The plaintiff did not agree or promise that it should be good, marketable, merchantable coal. He did not make any warranty of any kind whatever; and no fraud is imputed. Besides, there is no failure of consideration, as is claimed by the defendant. The lease of the land, with all its incidents, in the aggregate, was the consideration for the defendant's promises; and this consideration seems to be entire, and not divisible. At least, this would seem to be so where both the cause of action and the defense are purely of a legal character, as contradistinguished from an equitable character. With the lease, the defendant gets more than the mere right to take good, merchantable coal from the plaintiff's premises. The defendant actually gets "the sole and exclusive right and privilege of boring, digging, and otherwise prospecting for coal, petroleum, lead, or other valuable substance on" said premises, with the right "of taking out and of working the same,"—that is, of taking out and working the coal, petroleum, lead, etc., whether the same be marketable or not,—"together with the right of way and surface use of such land as may be necessary for the economical and efficient working of the same," and the free use of much of the coal taken out; and all this the defendant gets for at least two years, and longer if the defendant chooses. Now, if the plaintiff is to get pay only for the good, merchantable coal taken from his premises, where will he get pay for the exclusive right of boring, digging, and prospecting on his land for two or more years for coal, petroleum, lead, etc., and for the coal not merchantable, and for the petroleum, lead, etc., taken from the land? And where will he get pay for the right of way and surface use of his land, etc.? It is evident from the contract that it was the intention of the parties that this $500 should be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, whatever might be the result of the boring and digging for coal, petroleum, lead, etc. Both the terms of the contract and the reason of the transaction show this to be true. It will be noticed that the defendant does *248 not ask to have the contract *canceled. The defendant does not choose to relinquish any right which it has obtained by virtue of the contract. It still clings to the right to bore and dig on the plaintiff's land for the full two years, or longer. Indeed, the defendant does not wish to dispense with any portion of the contract, except that portion which imposes duties and obligations upon itself, and confers benefits on the plaintiff. But a contract cannot be considered good as to one party, and bad as to the other; and as the defendant does not even ask to have the contract canceled or rescinded, it must be enforced as to both parties, and there can be no question that by its terms the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

So far as the answer of the defendant attempts to vary or modify the terms of the written contract, or to allege that the contract was different from what the written contract itself shows it to be, the answer itself is a nullity. And this is about all the answer contains. The answer in fact states no defense, and the evidence offered and introduced by the defendant was even more defective than the answer. The purport of both was to vary and contradict the terms and import of the written contract entered into between the parties. Taking both together, and they did not make out any sufficient defense to the plaintiff's action. The court, therefore, did not err in excluding said evidence, and in instructing the jury to find for the plaintiff.

*JOEL BREWSTER v. CATHARINE C. MADDEN.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Pre-emption: Mortgage, Void. A mortgage given by a pre-emptor upon the land pre-empted, before the entry, is void, as forbidden by the thirteenth section of the act of congress of September 4, 1841.
2. Estoppel: Absence of Fraud, Etc. Where there is no fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment, neither the mortgagor nor his heirs are estopped from setting up the invalidity of the mortgage in an action of foreclosure brought by the mortgagee.

Error from Cherokee district court.

Foreclosure, brought by Brewster against the heirs of Leonard C. Madden, deceased. The mortgage was given by said Leonard C. and Catharine C., his wife, February 17, 1871, and was upon four lots in the city of Baxter Springs, and eighty acres of land then held by said Madden under the pre-emption act. The district court, at the June term, 1873, held said mortgage invalid as to the eighty acres, and gave judgment accordingly.

J. R. Hallowell, for plaintiff.

Judgment for the amount of said note was rendered by the court, and the mortgage foreclosed as to said lots, but the court held the mortgage to be void as to the said land. The execution of said mortgage by Madden and his wife (one of the defendants) being admitted, the only questions are, is the mortgage void as to said eighty acres of land? and, can the defendants in this action raise that question? The land was settled upon by Madden, April 1, 1866, who filed his declaratory statement on the thirteenth of October, 1869. The entry was completed by the said Catharine, as administratrix, for the benefit of the heirs of deceased. A mortgage under the laws of *250 Kansas is not such a "transfer," "assignment," "grant," or "conveyance" as is contemplated or specially mentioned in the pre-emption law. Sections 12, 13, Pre-emption Act 1841; section 1, c. 68, Gen. St.; Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. *391; Watterson v. Kirkwood, 8 Kan. *465; McKean v. Crawford, 6 Kan. *112. The defendants are not in a condition to raise the question of the validity of said mortgage. Bigelow, Estop. 369, c. 8; Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 410; Maduska v. Thomas, 6 Kan. *153.

Ritter & Anderson, for defendants.

BREWER, J. Is a mortgage given by a pre-emptor, prior to the entry of the lands, void? and, if so, are his heirs estopped from setting up its invalidity in an action to foreclose the mortgage? These are the only questions presented in this case. The mortgage was on the lands entered, and on four town lots. It was given long before the entry, and to secure simply the purchase price of the four lots. Intermediate the mortgage and the entry, the mortgagor died, and the entry was made by the widow, in the name and for the benefit of the minor heirs. Section 13 of the act of congress of September 4, 1841, (U. S. St. at Large, 456,) provides that, before an entry shall be allowed, the claimant shall make oath that "he has not directly or indirectly made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the government of the United States should inure in whole or in part to the benefit of any person except himself;" and it also provides that "any grant or conveyance which he may have made, except in the hands of bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, shall be null and void." The question is not free from difficulty. On the one hand it may be said that, as viewed in this state, a mortgage is neither a grant nor a conveyance, and therefore not within the letter of the statute; that a statute like this ought not to be extended by any construction beyond its plain letter, nor held to invalidate transactions not specifically and directly forbidden; *251 that often a pre-emptor needs assistance to complete his payment, which assistance he can only obtain by giving the land itself as the security, and that to deny him the use of the land for this purpose is against the spirit of the law. Watterson v. Kirkwood, 8 Kan. *465. On the other hand, it may be urged that the terms "grant" and "conveyance" are broad enough to include a mortgage, as much so as the term "alienation," in the constitutional and statutory homestead sections; and that it is so used in this section is evident from the terms of the affidavit required; that a mortgage is certainly an "agreement or contract" by which the title "would inure in part to the benefit" of the mortgagee, and that as the pre-emptor must swear that he has made no such agreement, so the agreement, when made, must be held null and void. McCue v. Smith, 9 Minn. 252, (Gil. 237;) Warren v. Van Brunt, 19 Wall. 646. We are inclined to favor the latter construction, and to hold that congress intended by this section that, when the title passed by the entry to the pre-emptor, it should pass perfect and unincumbered. This act was passed in 1841. Mortgages, always in form conveyances, were then regarded by the profession generally more as conveyances, and subject to the laws and conditions of conveyances, than at present, perhaps anywhere, and certainly in Kansas; and in the light of the general understanding, then, must this section be considered. It seems more reasonable that by these terms, "grant and conveyance," was intended all forms of conveyance, whether absolute, as a warranty deed, or upon condition, as a trust deed or mortgage. We see no ground for the application of estoppel. The mortgagee was not ignorant of the facts. No fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment is shown. The mortgagee sold four lots, and, as additional security, took the land.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Error from Brown district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

W. D. Webb, for plaintiff in error.

Babbitt, defendant below, claimed title to the land under a tax deed executed and recorded in June, 1864, and claimed that the plaintiff's right of action was barred by the statute. We claim that this action cannot be maintained, as no tender of the amount of the taxes, costs, etc., was made to Babbitt, as provided by section 11 of the tax law of March 6, 1862, and section 90 of the tax law of 1866. Wakeley v. Nicholas, 16 Wis. 588; Smith v. Smith, 19 Wis. 615, 620; Sapp v. Morrill, 8 Kan. *685, *686. The court erred in admitting the deed from Hall to Stewart, dated June 18, 1859, because the same was not acknowledged before any official authorized to take acknowledgments. The court also erred in admitting in evidence the *258 deed from *Stewart to Brown, because the same was not acknowledged before any official authorized to take such acknowledgments, and because the same was insufficient as an acknowledgment. The court erred in admitting in evidence the deed from Brown to Johnson, the plaintiff. This deed, executed in Alabama, and acknowledged there, was improperly admitted. The acknowledgment was made after the suit was commenced. Porter v. Wells, 6 Kan. *448. The tax deed offered in evidence by Babbitt was not void on its face, but was a valid deed, and conveyed to the defendant the absolute title to the land in suit, and the statute had barred this action before suit was commenced. Comp. Laws 1862, c. 197, § 57; Id. c. 98, § 11; Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. *311.

C. W. Johnson, for defendant in error.

No tender of taxes, etc., was necessary. Sapp v. Morrill, 8 Kan. *685. There was no error in admitting the deed from Hall to Stewart. By section 28, c. 22, Gen. St. 189, the record of this deed (and it was the record that was offered) was rendered admissible when the original was shown to be lost, notwithstanding any defective acknowledgment. Either the original or copy was admissible, if the original had been recorded. Section 14, c. 30, p. 240, Laws 1859, will show that this acknowledgment is good, if the probate court had a seal and a clerk; and sections 34, 38, c. 13, Laws 1858, are sufficient answer to that proposition. Again, the case of Porter v. Wells, cited by plaintiff in error, says a deed executed after suit is inadmissible. In this case the deed was executed before the suit, to-wit, September 6, 1869. The suit was not commenced till 1870. Porter v. Wells does not decide that a deed acknowledged after suit brought may not be read in evidence. See Riggs v. Henneberry, 58 Ill. 135. The tax deed was void on its face. It recites a sale to the county as a competitive bidder. Norton v. Friend, 13 Kan. *582.

*254 *BREWER, J. This was an action of ejectment. Defendant in error (plaintiff below) relied on a chain of title from government; plaintiff in error, (defendant below,) upon a tax deed. Four questions are presented.

It is objected that the acknowledgment to a deed in June, 1859, was insufficient, because taken before an officer not authorized to take acknowledgments. The officer was the deputy of the clerk of the probate court. This must be held good. An acknowledgment before the clerk of a court having a seal was sufficient. Comp. Laws, p. 355, § 14. The probate court was such a court, and had a clerk. See Gen. Laws 1858, p. 202, §§ 34-37; Laws 1859, p. 332, § 2; Laws 1859, p. 341, §§ 40-43. Such clerk might lawfully appoint a deputy, and such deputy could lawfully perform any ministerial office, unless specially enjoined upon the clerk. Laws 1859, p. 341, § 41; Whitford v. Lynch, 10 Kan. *180.

Again, it is objected that an acknowledgment to a deed was taken after the suit commenced. The deed was dated, and irregularly acknowledged, before the commencement of the action, and on the first trial ruled out on account of this defect in the acknowledgment. Intermediate the two trials it had been correctly acknowledged, and now the objection was that this last acknowledgment was subsequent to the commencement of the action. The objection is not good. The acknowledgment is mere matter of proof. The deed is valid without it. It takes effect from the time of its delivery; and this, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, is presumed to have been on the day of its date. Riggs v. Henneberry, 58 Ill. 135.

Again, it is insisted that the tax deed was good upon its face. The deed recites that the land was struck off to the county as a competitive bidder, and is similar to the deeds held void in the recent cases of Norton v. Friend, 13 Kan. *532; Magill v. Martin, 14 Kan. *67.

Finally, it is insisted that this action could not be maintained because no tender of the amount of taxes, costs, etc., had been made to Babbitt as provided by section 11 of the tax law of 1862, (Comp. Laws, p. 880,) and section 90 of the tax law of 1866. These sections had been repealed prior to the commencement of this action, and in lieu thereof was enacted section 117 of the tax law of 1868, (Gen. St. p. 1057,) by which, before the holder of the tax deed is ousted of possession, the successful claimant is required to pay the taxes, etc. This order was made, and it is all the plaintiff in error was entitled to. Sapp v. Morrill, 8 Kan. *685, *686.

The judgment will be affirmed.

HENRY CHURCHILL v. W. W. MOORE.

July Term, 1875.

Trespass: Liability of Judgment Creditor and Officer. Where a constable, at the instance of the judgment creditor, but without any express contract of indemnity therefor, levied an execution upon certain property believed to belong to the judgment debtor, but which in fact did not belong to the judgment debtor, but belonged to a third person, and this third person immediately replevied the property, but the constable gave a redelivery bond and retained the property, and afterwards sold the same on said execution to the judgment creditor for the amount of the judgment and costs, and judgment was afterwards rendered in the replevin action in favor of said third person, and against the constable, for a return of the property, or the value thereof in case a return could not be had, and for costs, held, that even if the acts of the judgment creditor were such that an implied contract of indemnity may be presumed, still, so long as the claim of said third person remains unsatisfied, the constable has no cause of action against said judgment creditor, and that in no case like this can the constable recover from the judgment creditor more than his actual loss already sustained.<sup>1</sup>

The case is stated in the opinion.

B. A. Seaver and D. M. Johnston, for plaintiff in error.

Price & Webb, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. The facts of this case are briefly as follows: Henry Churchill, who was the owner of a certain judgment rendered in a justice's court in favor of himself and against Gordon & Jones, caused an execution to be issued thereon and placed in the hands of W. W. Moore, a constable, for service. Moore, by virtue of said execution, levied upon a horse believed to belong to Gordon, but in fact belonging to Mrs. Mauritzius. Mrs. Mauritzius immediately replevied said horse. Moore then gave a redelivery bond, retained the horse, and afterwards sold him on execution to Churchill for the amount of Churchill's judgment, and costs. Churchill acknowledged satisfaction of the execution, and the execution was returned satisfied. All this was done in accordance with the instructions of Churchill, and of Churchill's attorney. Moore, at the instance of Churchill, defended said replevin action; Churchill himself employing the counsel, and through his counsel directing the management of the action. Judgment was finally rendered in the replevin action in favor of Mrs. Mauritzius, and against Moore, for a return of the horse, or, in case a return could not be had, for $100, the value of the horse, and for costs taxed, as Moore alleges, at $141.55. Further costs to the amount of $11, as Moore alleges, afterwards accrued, making a total, as Moore claims, of $252.55. The jury, however, in this case rendered a judgment in favor of Moore, and against Churchill, for $250.48, which sum we must presume was the correct amount. No portion of the judgment in favor of Mrs. Mauritzius, and against *257 Moore, *was paid or satisfied when this action was commenced.

Indeed, no portion of said judgment was paid or satisfied when this action was tried, or when the jury returned their verdict into court. The court in this case rendered judgment upon the verdict in favor of Moore, and against Churchill, for the said sum of $250.48. But in rendering the judgment the following proceedings (as shown by the bill of exceptions) were had and done: "Whereupon the court suggested that the execution in this case be stayed until the judgment in the case of Mauritzius v. Moore was [shall be] satisfied; whereupon it was shown that said judgment had been paid after the verdict in this case was rendered; whereupon the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, and against defendant, upon the verdict, and that execution be issued."

This is all there is in the record tending to show that Mrs. Mauritzius' claim, or any part thereof, has ever been satisfied. Churchill is the plaintiff in error in this court, and seeks to reverse the judgment of the court below. Now, when Moore and Churchill took said horse from Mrs. Mauritzius, they were both trespassers, and Mrs. Mauritzius could have sued either of them, and recovered the value of the horse; and, if they had been ordinary trespassers, the one against whom she recovered would have had no action against the other for contribution. But in cases of this kind, where one of the trespassers is an officer, and the property is taken under legal process for the benefit of the other trespasser, who is not an officer, the officer may have an action against the other for his loss actually sustained. Mere liability, however, on the part of the officer, is not sufficient to enable him to maintain the action. He must actually have lost something, and he can recover only to the extent of his actual loss. Both parties become liable to the party injured as soon as they commit the trespass, and that liability continues as against both until the party injured is entirely satisfied for his or her loss. When Moore and Churchill took said horse from Mrs. Mauritzius, (supposing Churchill participated,) both became liable to Mrs. Mauritzius, and both *258 continued to be liable to her until her claim *was fully satisfied, notwithstanding said judgment rendered in favor of Mrs. Mauritzius against Moore. That judgment did not by any means release Churchill from liability to Mrs. Mauritzius. Nothing but a satisfaction of her claim would release any one of the trespassers; and, if her claim were in any manner released as against any one of the joint trespassers, it would release all. Moore was just as liable to Mrs. Mauritzius on the day that he took the horse as he was after the judgment was rendered against him in her favor, and Churchill was no less liable to her after said judgment was rendered than he was on the day he participated in taking said horse. And yet we suppose no one will claim that Moore had any action against Churchill on the day that they took said horse from Mrs. Mauritzius. After said judgment was rendered against Moore, it was the right and duty of Churchill to satisfy the same; but, if he did not satisfy it, then Moore might have done so if he had so chosen, and after doing so he would then have an action against Churchill for just the amount he necessarily paid in doing so.

The theory upon which a sheriff or constable may recover against a co-trespasser, in a case like the one at bar, is not upon the principle that one trespasser may have an action for contribution against another trespasser, but it is upon the principle of an express or implied contract that the party for whose benefit the trespass is committed will indemnify the officer for all loss that the officer may afterwards sus-tain by reason of the trespass. And, when the officer sues for indemnity, his action is in the nature of an action on contract, and not in the nature of an action for a tort. Where the contract is not express, there must be sufficient circumstances from which a contract can be implied. The parties must, then, not know that they are making a contract to do an illegal act, but they must suppose that the facts are such that their acts about which they are contracting will be legal. In the present case, no express contract was proved, though the circumstances were such that an implied contract may be presumed. But it cannot be presumed or supposed that Churchill would agree *259 to pay *Moore the amount of their liability to Mrs. Mauritzius, while Churchill himself was still liable to Mrs. Mauritzius, and while such a payment to Moore would not extinguish such liability. The finding of the court below, while rendering judgment in this case, that the judgment in the case of Mauritzius against Moore was paid after the verdict was rendered in this case, is a nullity for various reasons. There was no such question ever presented to the court in any proper manner by the parties. There is nothing to show that the question was ever tried upon any pleadings, motion, or otherwise; and it is not shown who paid said judgment.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

JOHN G. SPENCER v. JOINT SCHOOL-DIST. No. 6, ETC.

July Term, 1875.

1. Injunction: Parties: Interest of Plaintiff. A party seeking to restrain an alleged misuse of the school-house belonging to a school-district, who alleges that he is a tax-payer and resident of the district; that the school-house has been built partially out of the taxes that he has paid; that he has children attending school in said school-house; and that, by the misuse complained of, the books of his children are "torn, soiled, carried away, lost, and misplaced, their copy-books written on, or thrown to the floor, their slates and pens broken, their inkstands upset, and their paper wasted and destroyed,"—shows such a personal and private interest as entitles him to prosecute the action.
2. Schools: Misuse of School-House may be Restrained. The use of a public school-house for any private purpose, such as the holding of religious or political meetings, social gatherings, and the like, is unauthorized by law, and may be restrained at the instance of any party injured thereby; and this, though a majority of the electors and tax-payers of the district assent to such use, and an adequate rent is paid therefor.

*260 *Error from Nemaha district court.

Injunction, brought by Spencer, as plaintiff, against joint school-district No. 6 of Nemaha and Brown counties, as defendant, to restrain the use of the district school-house for other than school purposes. The defendant demurred, "for the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The district court, at the April term, 1874, sustained said demurrer, dismissed the petition, and gave judgment in favor of the defendant for costs.

Johnson & Fulloon, for plaintiff.

N. Price and J. E. Taylor, for defendant.

BREWER, J. This was an action brought to restrain the defendant from leasing its school-building for other than school purposes. Two questions are raised: First, does the plaintiff show such a peculiar and personal interest as will enable him to maintain the action? and, second, do the facts alleged disclose grounds for the relief sought?

The plaintiff alleges that "he is a resident of the school-district, and tax-payer therein, and, as such tax-payer, has contributed his proportion of taxes for the building of the said school-house; that his children attend school therein; and that, by the improper uses of the building complained of, the books of his children are torn, soiled, carried away, lost, and misplaced, their copy-books written on, or thrown to the floor, their slates and pens broken, their ink-stands upset, and their paper wasted and destroyed." We think this shows such an interest as entitles him to a hearing upon the question of the alleged misuser of the school-house. When he pays his taxes, he passes over so much money into the public fund, and the disposition of it is a public duty intrusted to certain public agents; and the fact that he has contributed by the payment of taxes to the *261 creation of this *public fund does not give him a right to challenge the manner of its use. Craft v. Jackson Co., 5 Kan.

*518. He is but one of many contributors to the same fund. He has no personal interest in it. But here he shows that his own private property suffers from the alleged wrong-doings. The school books, etc., which he purchases for his children's use are his individual property. They belong in no sense to the public; and, though they may be but a few dollars in value, he is entitled to have those few dollars protected as fully as though thousands of dollars were in danger.

As misuser, he alleges that the "school-house is, by the order of the directors, leased and let to divers societies, meeting, and gatherings," and that thereby large assemblages of persons, both children and adults, gather there, crowding the seats and desks; that these assemblages consume the fuel purchased with the public funds, tear the desks from their fastenings, and cut, scratch, and deface them; that some of these meetings are in the night-time, and that, at such meetings, kerosene or coal-oil is used, which is in violation of the terms of the insurance policy on the building, the premium of which has been paid out of the public funds; and that to accommodate one of these societies the building has been altered by erecting platforms, rostrums, closets, boxes, etc. In short, he alleges that this building, erected by public funds for the purpose of a school-house, is, by the order of the directors, used for a variety of purposes and gatherings wholly alien to schools and educational matters. It does not appear that this is done against the wishes or without the consent of a majority of the tax-payers and electors of the district, nor that the building is leased without receiving adequate rent. Indeed, the question as it comes before us may fairly be thus stated: May the majority of the tax-payers and electors in a school-district, for other than school purposes, use or permit the use of the school-house built with funds raised by taxation? The question is one which in view of the times, and the attacks made in so many places, and from so many directions, upon our *public-school system, justifies, as it has received at our hands, most serious consideration. We are fully aware of the fact that all over the state the school-house is, by general consent, or at least without active opposition, used for a variety of purposes other than the holding of public schools. Sabbath schools of separate religious denominations, church assemblies, sometimes political meetings, social gatherings, etc., are held there. Now, none of these can be strictly considered among the purposes for which a public building can be erected, or taxation employed. But it often happens, particularly in our newer settlements, that there is no other public building than the school-house,—no place so convenient as that. The use for these purposes works little damage. It is used by the inhabitants of the district whose money has built it, and used for their profit or pleasure. Shall it be said that this is illegal? Doubtless, if all in the district are content, no question will ever be raised; and, on the other hand, if a majority object, the use for such purposes will cease. It is only when the majority favor, and a minority object, that the courts are appealed to. That minority may be but a single individual,—may be influenced by spite or revenge, or any other unworthy motive; but, whatever the motives which prompt the litigation, the decision must be in harmony with the absolute right of all. It seems to us that upon well-settled principles the question must be answered in the negative. The public school-house cannot be used for any private purposes. The argument is a short one. Taxation is invoked to raise funds to erect the building; but taxation is illegitimate to provide for any private purpose. Taxation will not lie to raise funds to build a place for a religious society, a political society, or a social club. What cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. As you may not levy taxes to build a church, no more may you levy taxes to build a school-house and then lease it for a church. Nor is it an answer to say that its use for school purposes is not interfered with, and that the use for the other purposes works little, perhaps no immediately perceptible, injury to the building, and results in the receipt *of immediate pecuniary benefit. The extent of the injury or benefit is something into which courts will not inquire. The character of the use is the only legitimate question. A municipal bond of five cents in aid of a purely private purpose is as void as one of a thousand dollars; and that, too, though the actual benefit to the municipality far exceeds the amount of the bond. The use of a public school-house for a single religious or political gathering is legally as unauthorized as its constant use therefor. True, a court of equity would not interfere by injunction after a single use, and where there was no likelihood of a repetition of the wrong, for it is only apprehended wrongs that equity will enjoin. Here the unauthorized use is charged as a frequent fact, and one likely to occur hereafter. It is unnecessary to pursue this discussion further, for it would be simply traveling over a road already well worn and dusty. Besides the authorities with which every lawyer is familiar, upon the power to use public funds or property for private purposes, we refer to the following as bearing upon the special phase of the question before us: Scofield v. Eighth School-dist., 27 Conn. 499; School-district No. 8 v. Arnold, 21 Wis. 657.

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

ELAM RICE and others v. SAMUEL POYNTER.

July Term, 1875.

1. Reforming Deeds: Sheriff's Deed Executed upon an Illegal Sale cannot be Reformed. In an action to reform a sheriff's deed so as to make it read "section 8" instead of "section 28," where the latter occurs, it was shown as follows: The judgment under which the sheriff's deed was executed, ordered that certain lands in section 8 should be sold; but the recitals in the deed itself show that the order of sale, issued by the clerk in pursuance of said judgment, directed that land in section 28, and not in section 8, should be sold; and *said recitals also show that the sheriff had said land in section 28 appraised, and that he advertised the same for sale, and sold the same, and did not have anything to do with said land in section 8; and it was also shown by other evidence that the notice of the sale, as published in the newspaper, was a notice that land in section 28, and not in section 8, would be sold; and there was no evidence introduced tending to contradict the recitals in the sheriff's deed; and the said sheriff's sale, after it was made, and prior to the execution of said deed, was confirmed by the court upon an ex parte motion of the plaintiff in that action. Held that, under the circumstances of this case, said sheriff's deed cannot be reformed.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup>To justify the reformation of a contract or deed the facts of a mutual mistake must be shown, as well as that the party seeking the reformation would be prejudiced by a failure to reform; but it is not necessary to show the existence

2. Evidence, Secondary: Lost Records: Competency of Testimony.

Where all the files of the papers in a case have been destroyed by fire, it is not error for the court to permit a party to introduce in evidence the testimony of the publisher of a newspaper, and the paper in which the notice of a sheriff's sale of real estate was published, for the purpose of showing the contents of such notice, and especially so when such evidence does not tend to contradict, but to corroborate, the recitals in the sheriff's deed executed in pursuance of such sale.

3. Judicial Sales: Confirmation, not Conclusive of Regularity. An ex parte confirmation of a sheriff's sale, is not conclusive evidence, binding upon all parties that may possibly be affected by it, that the land ordered to be sold by the judgment was sold, and that it was regularly and legally sold.

Error from Doniphan district court.

Action by Poynter to quiet his title to the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 8, township 3 S., range 20 E., in Doniphan county. Poynter's petition alleges that at the December term, 1862, of the district court, he recovered a judgment against one Alfred L. Rice and Ladorska, his wife, for \$511.25, in an action wherein said Poynter was plaintiff, and said Rice and his wife were defendants; that at the commencement of said action he sued out an order of attachment, which was duly and legally executed by the seizure and appraisement of the eighty acres of land in controversy then and theretofore belonging to said Rice; that, on rendering final judgment in said action, the court made an order continuing the lien of said attachment, and directing that an order of sale issue to sell said "N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of sec. 8,"

\*265 to satisfy said judgment and costs; that such order of sale was duly issued, and said \*land duly sold, and bid in by Poynter, and the sale thereof, in March, 1863, duly confirmed; but alleging that the sheriff, in executing the deed, "by mistake described said land as the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 28, township 3 south, range 20 east." He also alleges that upon receiving said sheriff's deed he took possession of the land described in the judgment, and has occupied it ever since. Said Alfred L. Rice has since deceased, and this action is now brought against Ladorska Rice as the widow, and against Elam Rice and seven others, children and heirs at law of said Alfred L. Poynter prays that said sheriff's deed may be reformed and corrected so as to describe and designate the land mentioned and described in said judgment. The defendants answered, making a special denial of the facts alleged by plaintiff. This action was tried at the March term, 1874, of the district court. The district court gave judgment in favor of Poynter, reforming and correcting the sheriff's deed, and decreeing that "the defendants, and all persons claiming under them, be forever barred and enjoined from setting up any claim to said" N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 8, township of a prior parol contract, and such part preformance as would, in the absence of a written contract, take the case out of the statute of frauds. Conaway v. Gore 24 Kan. 389. See Miller v. Davis, 10 Kan. 407, and note; also, Roberts v. Chamberlain, 30 Kan. 677; S. O. 2 Pac. Rep. 838.

3 S., range 20 E., "and that plaintiff have and recover of the defendants his costs herein."

Albert Perry, for plaintiffs in error.

Nathan Price, for defendant in error.

The testimony showed that the land originally attached and described in the judgment had been duly sold. By section 449, Code 1859, (Comp. Laws 1862,) it became the duty of the court, when the execution or order of sale was returned, to examine the return and proceedings of the officer, and, if they were found in all respects in strict conformity with law, to order the clerk to make an entry on the journal of that fact, and direct the sheriff to make the purchaser a deed. This was done. Now, this entry is a judgment. It is *266 a final adjudication between the parties, and all *persons claiming under them, that the right land was appraised, advertised, and sold, in strict conformity with law, or, as this court has said, that its process had not been abused.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action to reform a sheriff's deed, so as to make it read "section 8," instead of "section 28," where the latter occurs. Without stopping to consider whether this may be done in any case, we shall immediately pass to the question whether it can be done under the circumstances of this particular case. On the trial of the case in the district court, the plaintiff below, Samuel Poynter, introduced in evidence the sheriff's deed; the judgment upon which the deed was founded, including proceedings had previous to the rendering of the judgment; the confirmation of the sheriff's sale; the testimony of the clerk of the district court that many of the files of his office had been burned, and that the files in this particular case had not been seen since the fire; and the testimony of the plaintiff showing that he had resided on the land in said section 8 ever since the sheriff's sale, and that no one had claimed any adverse title thereto until recently. The defendants below (who are now plaintiffs in error) introduced in evidence the newspaper in which the notice of the sheriff's sale was published, and also the testimony of the publisher of that paper, showing that this was the only notice of such sale published in his paper. No other evidence was introduced for either party. It will be noticed that not one of the following papers was introduced in evidence, to-wit: The execution or order of sale upon which the land was sold; the return by the appraisers of the appraisement of the land; the copy of the notice of the sale of the land published in the newspaper, and filed in the court; the written return of the sheriff, showing his proceedings under the execution. But in lieu thereof we have the sheriff's deed, (which is certainly good evidence, in the absence of better evidence to show the substance of said papers, and of *267 other papers recited therein,) *reciting the substance of the execution, the oath administered to the appraisers, the return by the appraisers of the appraisement, the notice of the sale published in the newspaper, the sale itself, and the return of the sheriff of his proceedings under the execution; and these papers, and proceedings as recited in the deed, show unequivocally that the sheriff was ordered by the execution to sell "the north half of the north-west quarter of section 28," etc.; that he did appraise, advertise, and sell such land; and not one of these papers or proceedings tends to show that the sheriff ever had anything to do with any land in section 8. Besides, the evidence introduced by the defendants shows beyond all doubt that the sheriff advertised the land in section 28 for sale, and did not advertise the land in section 8 for sale. The sheriff's deed showing that the notice of sale was published in the "White Cloud Kansas Chief," and the publisher of that paper produced on the witness stand a copy of said paper, with a copy of said notice published therein, and testified that no other notice of said sale was ever published in said paper; and that notice shows that the sheriff advertised land in section 28, and not in section 8, for sale. This was certainly competent evidence, for it had already been shown that the original files in the case had been destroyed by fire. Probably no better evidence could have been found, or was then in existence. It corroborated the recitals in the sheriff's deed, and did not contradict them. But it is claimed that it tends to contradict the confirmation of the sheriff's sale, and is therefore incompetent. The confirmation of the sheriff's sale reads as follows:

"On motion of said plaintiff, by Messrs. T. & C., his attorneys, and on producing the return of the sheriff of this county of a sale of real estate made by him on the ninth day of March, 1863, on an order of sale issued in this case, and dated the eighth day of January, 1863, and the court, on an examination of said proceedings, being satisfied that said sale has been made in all respects in conformity to law, it is ordered by the court that said sale and proceeding be, and the same is hereby, confirmed, and the said sheriff is ordered to *268 *make to the purchaser a deed for the land and tenements so sold."

Now, a confirmation of a sheriff's sale is ordinarily, as in this case, a purely ex parte proceeding, and it may always be so. The sale may be confirmed on the motion of the plaintiff, the defendant, the sheriff, or any other person interested therein, or on the court's own motion, and may be done without notice to any person, and in the absence of every person except the officers of the court. And no particular time is required for the confirmation of the sale. It may be done at any time after the sale has been made, when the court is in session, and for an indefinite period of time; and it is usually done merely upon an examination of the return of the officer, (White Crow v. White Wing, 8 Kan. *276,) although it would probably be prudent in some cases for the court to look behind the return of the officer, and see whether the writ itself, the execution, or order of sale followed the judgment. The whole difficulty in the present case has probably arisen from the fact that the order of sale does not follow the judgment. It does not seem, however, to be the special duty of the court, on the confirmation of a sale, to determine whether the clerk has done his duty in issuing the writ, but only whether the sheriff has done his duty in executing the writ. In the present case we think the sheriff undoubtedly followed the writ scrupulously, and did his exact duty under the writ. He undoubtedly advertised and sold land in section 28, and not in section 8, just as the writ directed him to do. The confirmation of the sale in this case does not pretend to show otherwise, but really tends to show that the sheriff did his duty; that is, that he sold the land which he was ordered to sell by the writ, which was land in section 28, and not land in section 8. We suppose that, when counsel for plaintiff below (defendant in error) comes to consider the nature and character of an ex parte confirmation of a sheriff's sale made long after judgment, he will no longer consider *269 that such a confirmation is an adjudication conclusively binding upon all parties that may possibly be affected by it, and conclusively proving that the land ordered to be sold by the judgment was sold, and that it was regularly and legally sold; for such is not the case. Benz v. Hines, 3 Kan. *390, *397, et seq. The sheriff's deed in the present case cannot be reformed; for the sheriff had no legal power, upon the sale made by him, and recited in the deed, to execute this or any other deed. Under the judgment, no land could be sold except land in section 8. Under the order of sale issued by the clerk, no land could be sold except land in section 28. Hence, as the order of sale in an essential particular did not follow the judgment, the whole of the proceedings had and done after the judgment was rendered, are mere nullities. Therefore, under such circumstances, no court can give the sheriff power to make a good and valid deed, and no court can reform a defective deed already executed by the sheriff so as to make it good and valid.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

W. B. DICKENSON & BRO. v. CHARLES COWLEY, Jr.

July Term, 1875.

1. Attachment: Third Party Claiming Property. One who comes in under chapter 164 of the Laws of 1872, and claims property attached or levied on, does not thereby concede the regularity of the proceedings; nor may he, like the defendant, avail himself of errors which are simply sufficient for reversal in direct proceedings therefor. He claims adversely to the proceedings, and can only make such objections as he could if attacking them in an independent collateral action.

- 2. Attachment: Affidavit: Fatal Defect. Where the only grounds for the issue of an attachment in a case before a justice of the peace are thus stated, "that the defendant is a foreign corporation, or a non-resident *270 of the county," held, that the affidavit was fatally defective, and furnished no warrant for the issue of the attachment, and that the defect was one which might be taken advantage of by one claiming the property attached.<sup>1</sup>
- 3. Debtor and Creditor: Evidence of. The mere bringing of an action is no evidence, as against a third party, that the plaintiff is a creditor of the defendant.

Error from Brown district court.

In an action in a justice's court, wherein Cowley was plaintiff and one George Parker was defendant, a constable, upon an order of attachment, seized and held 1,000 bushels of corn, and a lot of other property. Dickenson & Bro. served a written notice on Cowley, as authorized by section 1 of chapter 164, Laws 1872, claiming said corn, and that the trial of the right of property would be had before the justice on a certain day. Such trial was had. Parker made no appearance to the action, nor to the attachment proceedings, at any time. As to him the justice continued the action, and Cowley caused notice to be published as provided by section 35 of the justices' act; and upon such notice, at the time therein fixed, the justice rendered judgment in favor of Cowley and against Parker. On the trial of the right of property in said corn, the justice found in favor of Dickenson & Bro., who claimed under an unrecorded chattel mortgage executed to them by Parker. Cowley removed the proceedings to the district court by appeal, where a retrial was had at the April term, 1874. On this trial, Dickenson & Bro. offered in evidence their chattel mortgage, (which had then been recorded,) and proved its execution, and rested. Cowley offered in evidence the attachment and other proceedings, and judgment in his action against Parker before the justice. The bill of exceptions shows that the district court found and held "that the 1,000 bushels of corn in controversy belonged to said Charles Cowley, Jr., and gave judgment accordingly." Dickenson & Bro. bring the case here on error.

James Falloon, for plaintiffs in error.

If Cowley acquired any right by virtue of said proceedings, by *271 our laches we have lost our right to the property in controversy. Did they acquire any right? To the introduction of the transcript and papers in case of Cowley v. Parker in evidence we raised an objection that the justice had no jurisdiction of the person of Parker, nor of the proceedings in rem. Before Cowley could acquire any right to the property in controversy, the court must have jurisdiction of the person, or of the proceedings in rem. Without this it could not render a valid judgment. North v. Moore, 8 Kan. *143. Did the justice have jurisdiction? Our statute provides that actions must be commenced in justices' courts by filing a bill of particulars. None was filed in the case. The foundation of the suit was neglected.

Before any court can acquire jurisdiction of property in any proceeding in rem, it must have the statutory proof before it, otherwise its act and process would be null and void, the same as if it was not a legally constituted court. Paine v. Mooreland, 15 Ohio, 440; Collins v. Ferris, 14 Johns. 246; Bigelow v. Stearns, 19 Johns. 89; Ardens v. Brewer, 3 Cow. 206. See Repine v. McPherson, 2 Kan. *340; Shields v. Miller, 9 Kan. *390; Hargis v. Morse, 7 Kan. *415. The affidavit for attachment in the case of Cowley v. Parker stated that the defendant was "a non-resident of Brown County, or a foreign corporation." The laws of 1870 require that the affidavit allege that the defendant is a non-resident of the state. If a man's property may be attached under such an affidavit, a person living just over the line in another county may be divested of his rights to property when the statute does not contemplate it; else why change the law in 1870 from a non-residence of the county to a non-residence of the state? Drake, Attachm. § 84. The affidavit must also be in the positive, and not in the disjunctive. Drake, Attachm. § 101. The return of the order of attachment must show whose property is attached, and that it is attached in the jurisdiction of the court. Repine v. McPherson, 2 Kan. *340. In this case the return of the order of attachment does not show whose property was attached. There was no legal service on

Parker; no appearance by him; no statutory proof for order of attachment; no return of order of attachment showing whose *272 property was attached; no bill of particulars filed. Chapter 164, Laws 1872, was not intended as a pit-fall, to debar parties of their rights to property, because they go into court and claim the property in controversy to belong to them. Their appearance in court in no manner gives the court jurisdiction in the original suit if it had none.

C. E. Berry and W. D. Webb, for defendant in error.

Plaintiffs in error gave notice to Cowley to appear before the justice to contest the right of property. They could not contest the regularity of the attachment proceedings. The property was in the possession of the officer, and Dickenson & Bro. could not question his right to hold it, except by a superior title in themselves. They could not champion Parker's rights, nor find any fault with the attachment proceedings, unless their title was good as to Parker's creditors. By section 3 of chapter 43, and section 9 of chapter 68, Gen. St., Dickenson & Bro.'s title was void until taken out of the statute, by evidence. They must recover on the validity of their own title; and, unless it was good as to attaching creditors, they must fail. No evidence was offered to make it good. They could not, on a void title at least, question the affidavit. They could not go back of the attachment, and they cannot require a judgment to be entered. Parker is the only person who could question the regularity of the attachment proceedings. Dickenson & Bro. came into court to show their title as against Parker's creditors, or our attachment; and if their title was good, and prior to our levy, they would hold the property; but, if it was void as to Parker's creditors, it gave them no right to object to the attachment.

BREWER, J. The facts in this case are briefly as follows: Defendant in error commenced a suit before a justice of the peace against one George Parker, and caused an attachment to be issued and levied on a certain lot of corn. Plaintiffs in error came in *278 under chapter 164 of the Laws of 1872, and *claimed the property. They claimed under a chattel mortgage given by Parker. The proceedings before the justice were commenced before the filing of this mortgage, and it is conceded by counsel for plaintiffs in error that, if Cowley "acquired any right by virtue of said proceedings," the plaintiffs by their laches had lost their right to the property. Could they, coming in as they did, question the regularity of the proceedings? and, if so, were these proceedings so far void as to give no lien to Cowley in the corn? The first question, it seems to us, must be answered in the affirmative, to this extent, and no further: they could question them just as though they were attacking them in an independent collateral action. They did not, by coming in, waive all objections to the proceedings, and concede their regularity; nor did they place themselves in the shoes of the defendant in the action, and acquire his right to object to errors in the proceedings. They could not avail themselves of such irregularities as were simply errors sufficient for reversal, but only of such as were fatal to the process and the jurisdiction. Though coming into the action, they claimed adversely to it. There was a fatal defect in the attachment proceedings. The grounds for the attachment alleged in the affidavit were "that the defendant is a foreign corporation, or a non-resident of Brown county." There are two objections to this: one, that it is in the disjunctive, (Drake, Attachm. § 101;) the other, that non-residence in the county does not warrant an attachment, but only non-residence in the state. Laws 1870, p. 182, § 3. There was therefore no warrant for the issue of the attachment, and the plaintiff in the suit obtained no lien on the goods by the service of the writ. The facts of the case also bring it exactly within the decision in Repine v. McPherson, 2 Kan. *340. There was no personal service; the defendant did not appear; nor does it appear from any of the papers that he had any property within the jurisdiction of the court, nor that the property attached was his property.

But it is insisted by defendant in error that the mortgage of *274 plaintiffs in error is void, as against the creditors *of the mortgagor, under section 9 of the mortgage statute. Gen. St. 584. It is sufficient reply to this that, as the record stands, there is no evidence, as against plaintiff in error, that defendant in error was a creditor. The mere bringing of a suit is not evidence of that fact against a third party; and, as there was no valid service or appearance, there has as yet been no valid judgment. Further than this we do not care to go. We see that many questions may be raised beyond this, such as these: Was not the mortgage filed within such reasonable time as to bring it within the statute? Will the mere fact that it is shown by parol evidence that the defendant in error was, at the time of the commencement of his action, a creditor of the mortgagor, avoid the mortgage? It will be time enough to dispose of them, if they ever arise, when the facts are fully known.

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

JOHN T. STARKWEATHER and Wife v. EBENEZER MORGAN.

July Term, 1875.

Service: Impeaching Sheriff's Return: Evidence. On a motion by one defendant to set aside a return of service of summons upon her, (the return of the sheriff showing personal service on each of the defendants, they being husband and wife,) the wife, who made the motion, testified that no copy of the summons was ever given to her, and that she had no knowledge of the pendency of the action till the time of filing the motion; the husband, that the sheriff gave him two copies of the summons, one directed to him and one to his wife, and requested him to give the latter to her, but that he did not give it to her as requested. The district court overruled the motion, and sustained the service. Held, that the return of the officer being of the highest order of evidence, and of matters *275 within his *personal knowledge, was not so overborne by the testimony of the defendants as to justify this court in reversing the ruling of the district court.<sup>1</sup>

BREWER, J. On the nineteenth of March, 1874, defendant in error commenced an action in the district court of Clay county against the plaintiffs in error, who are husband and wife, to foreclose a mortgage. The petition set forth a note signed by the husband, and alleged the execution of a mortgage by both. On the twenty-first of March a summons was duly issued, and returned on the 28th with an indorsement of personal service by the sheriff upon each of the defendants. Afterwards, and at the May term of court, the husband making no appearance or defense, the wife makes a motion to set aside the return of service upon her, and files in support thereof two affidavits, her own and her husband's. In her affidavit she swears that no copy of the summons was ever served upon her, and that she had no knowledge of the pendency of the action until the time of filing the motion. He swears that the sheriff gave him two copies of the summons, one directed to himself, and one directed to his wife, and requested him to deliver the latter to his wife; but that he did not deliver it. This statement is repeated twice in the affidavit, and with only this difference: The first time he swears that on "the _____ day of March, 1874," the sheriff delivered to him "two copies of a summons in the above action;" the second, that "on the twenty-seventh day of March, 1874," the sheriff delivered to him "two copies of a summons *276 in the *above-entitled action which are copies of the summons upon which the sheriff has returned that he did, on the twenty-seventh of March," etc. The return of the sheriff shows service on the twenty-eighth of March. The district court overruled the motion, and this is the error complained of.

Counsel for plaintiffs in error rely upon the case of Bond v. Wilson, 8 Kan. *228, as authority for reversing the ruling of the district court. But we must differ with them for two reasons: In that the matter thrown open to inquiry was one not within the personal knowledge of the sheriff, but depending upon the information he might receive. Here the matter was within his personal knowledge. He either did or did not give a copy of the summons to Mrs. Starkweather, and which he did he knew. In that case, Chief Justice KINGMAN, in the opinion, uses this language: "We know of no statute that makes a sheriff a final and exclusive judge of where a man's residence is, or what is the age of a minor, or who are the officers of a corporation. * * * Of his own acts, his knowledge ought to be absolute, and himself officially responsible. Of such facts as are not in his special knowledge, he must act from information, which will often come from interested parties, and his return, therefore, ought not to be held conclusive." We have made this reference to that case, not for the purpose of deciding that the return of the sheriff is not open to question in matters of his personal knowledge, but to prevent any misunderstanding as to the extent of that decision. A second reason why we think that case not authority for reversing, but rather for affirming, the ruling, is that the question, in whatever cases it may arise, is one of evidence. There the district court found from the evidence against the return, and set it aside. We affirmed its findings upon the evidence. Here it finds in favor of the return, and upon that question of fact we must sustain its findings. Looking at it in the light of the evidence, and the ruling of the court cannot be disturbed. On the one hand it is the return of the sheriff, a disinterested party and a sworn officer, which, if not conclusive, is *277 the strongest kind of evidence; on the other, the *denial of one witness, Mrs. Starkweather, corroborated to some extent by the testimony of her husband, both interested witnesses. The sheriff might, on the 27th, have given the two copies to Mr. Starkweather, and then, on the 28th, given one to Mrs. S., so that Mr. S.'s testimony only partially corroborates. At any rate, there is not enough testimony adverse to the return of the officer to warrant us in reversing the ruling of the district court, and it must be affirmed. (All the justices concurring.)

July Term, 1875.

1. Evidence: Judicial Notice: Constitutions of Other States. This court will take judicial knowledge of the constitution of a sister state, so far as the jurisdiction of its courts is shown. VALENTINE, J., dissenting.
2. Courts: Jurisdiction: Presumption. It will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, in favor of courts of general jurisdiction of sister states, that they have the authority they assume to exercise, and that the modes of procedure pursued by them, though different from that established by the laws of this state, are authorized by the laws of the state in which they act. [Ward v. Baker, 16 Kan. 32; Comstock v. Adams, 23 Kan. 525.]
3. Judgments, Foreign: In Vacation. Thus, though in this state judgments in courts of record can be entered only in term-time, yet, where the duly-authenticated record of a court of general jurisdiction of a sister state shows a judgment entered in vacation, it will be presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that such a judgment was authorized by the laws of that state.
4. Constitutional Law: Limitations: Judgments, Foreign. So much of section 1 of chapter 87, Laws 1870, as reads, "And no action shall be maintained in this state on any judgment or decree rendered in another state or country against a resident of this state, where the cause of action upon which such judgment or decree was rendered could not have been maintained in this state, at the time the action thereon was commenced in such other state or country, by reason of lapse of time," is unconstitutional and void, as conflicting *278 with section 1 of article 4 of the United States constitution, which ordains that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state."

Error from Riley district court.

Action by Coffin, as plaintiff, whose petition alleged "that the said plaintiff, on the twenty-ninth of April, 1872, by the consideration and judgment of the circuit court of the state of Illinois, begun and held at the court-house in Geneva, in the county of Kane, on said twenty-ninth of April, recovered against the said Orlando Dodge the sum of $511.90, his debt, and his costs in and about his suit expended, taxed at $280, which said judgment, a copy of which is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' still remains in said court in full force and effect, in nowise reversed or annulled," etc. The judgment itself, said Exhibit A, shows that it was entered on a warrant of attorney, "in vacation, after a regular term of the circuit court of said Kane county, begun and held on Monday, the fifth of February, 1872." Dodge answered, setting up two defenses: First, nul tiel record; second, the statute of limitations. Trial at the September term, 1874, of the district court. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $600.20.

H. G. Barner & Son, for plaintiff in error.

The court erred in permitting Coffin to introduce the record from the circuit court of Kane county, Illinois. That record was defective for the reason that it was taken in vacation, and not in accordance with the common law, and does not come within the provisions of the United States constitution, art. 4, § 1, or the laws of congress passed in pursuance thereof. Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350. Neither does it come within the provisions of our Code. Gen. St. p. 700, § 371. At common law a judgment rendered by the clerk in vacation is a nullity, and such has been the ruling of this court. Miffin v. Stalker, 4 Kan. *283. The judgment roll from Kane county, Illinois, being the roll of a judgment taken in vacation, and entered *279 *without the order of a judge or justice of said court, whether good in Illinois or not, was a nullity here. A judgment by confession should be made in open court, and have all the qualities, incidents, and attributes of other judgments, (Nichols v. Hewit, 4 Johns. 423; Freem. Judgm. 456, § 547;) and to entitle its record to be read in other states it must be taken according to the established rules of the common law, (Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350.)

Again, in the cognovit or power of attorney by which this judgment was confessed in Illinois, it is provided that Charles Wheaton, or any other attorney of any court of record, may confess judgment; and the judgment was confessed by one W. J. Brown, who was not only not proved to be an attorney of any court of record, but does not even sign his name as such, but signs himself as attorney in fact for Orlando Dodge. We submit that, where a party is not named in such a power, he must affirmatively show such a character as brings him within its purview.

Again, this Illinois judgment was rendered on two notes, both due December 22, 1859, and the judgment was taken there on the twenty-ninth of April, 1872, more than twelve years after their maturity, and no payment or other renewal was made, or pretended to have been made, on them during this time. Our act of 1870, c. 87, § 1, effectually disposes of this case. We are aware that it has been and will again be contended that this statute is unconstitutional. . That a state, by its limitation laws, may bar a right of action upon a judgment from another state, where the limitation laws of the state to which the judgment is brought are shorter than those of the state from which it came, is too well settled to admit of controversy. Walker v. Parker, 13 Pet. 172; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350; Thompson v. Whitman, Id. 457. We suppose the only real question about the constitutionality of this statute is whether, having cut off all time for commencement, and barred any action, it has violated the provision of the United States constitution giving full faith, credit, etc. We desire to call attention to the language of the statute of 1870. It protects only persons *280 who were residents of this state at the time judgment was rendered in such other state or country. It does not prevent judgments from other states or countries, where the parties are both residents, and both alike subject to the laws of such state or country, from being enforced here. Neither does it deprive a party of his judgment, but leaves him with it in full force in the state where he chose to take it. This is not a retrospective statute. It is prospective, and was approved March 3, 1870, while this judgment was taken April 29, 1872, more than two years afterwards.

Green & Hessen, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. This was an action on a judgment rendered in the circuit court of Kane county, Illinois. Said judgment was rendered in the spring of 1872, upon two notes executed in March, 1859. Attached to each note was a warrant of attorney authorizing "Charles Wheaton, Esq., or any other attorney of any court of record," to enter appearance, waive process, and confess judgment. Upon these warrants, and without any service of process or other appearance, judgment was entered in vacation. It is insisted that this judgment, having been entered in vacation, was a nullity, and Mifflin v. Stalker, 4 Kan. *283, is cited as authority therefor. But that case simply decides as to the practice in this state, and the authority to enter judgments in our courts at other than the regular terms. And the question here is not whether such judgment would be valid if entered in this state, but was it valid in Illinois, where it was entered? French v. Pease, 10 Kan. *54. Now, this court will take judicial knowledge of the constitution of the state of Illinois, so far as this question is involved, (Butcher v. Bank of Brownsville, 2 Kan. *70;) and by that constitution we find that the circuit court is one of general original jurisdiction. Being a court of general jurisdiction, the presumption is in favor of the authority which it assumed to exercise. *281 Though the mode of procedure be different from that established in this state, yet it will be presumed to be in accordance with that authorized by the statutes of the state in which it was rendered. In 2 Amer. Lead. Cas. (5th Ed.) 647, it is said that "it is obviously essential to the effectual operation of the design of the constitution that the records of the judgments of other states, duly authenticated under the act of congress, should not merely prove themselves, but give rise to a presumption that the court possessed the authority which it assumed to exercise;" and many authorities from different states are cited in support of the proposition. And, again, it adds: "The presumption, omnia rite acta, will accordingly hold good until repelled, and the burden of proof is on him by whom a record, duly authenticated, and which appears to be regular, is impugned." So that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the presumption would be that a judgment entered in vacation was valid, according to the laws of Illinois. But we are not left to a presumption. In Dunham v. Brown, 24 Ill. 93, we find such a mode of procedure upheld by the supreme court of that state.

Again, it is urged that the warrant of attorney authorizes "Charles Wheaton, or any other attorney of any court of record," to appear and confess. And the record shows that one W. J. Brown appeared and confessed, and that there is no evidence that he was an attorney of any court, and he signs himself "attorney in fact" for defendant. We suppose the designation was correct, for one authorized by such a warrant of attorney is an attorney in fact; and in the recital of the judgment it reads "that the plaintiff appeared by T. C. Moore, his attorney, and the defendant by W. J. Brown, his attorney." This recital is evidence, prima facie at least, that both Moore and Brown were attorneys of the court in which the judgment was entered. But, passing these considerations, it was for the defendant, upon the principles heretofore stated, to overthrow the presumption in favor of this judgment by showing, if he could, that W. J. Brown was not an attorney of a court of record. It is useless to inquire as to the cir-

*282 *cumstances under which the judgment of the court of a sister state can be impeached, for here there was no testimony tending to impeach it. The testimony of Dodge, that he never employed Brown, or authorized him to appear and confess judgment, that he was never served with process, etc., is wholly immaterial. He does not deny the execution of the warrant of attorney, or question its validity; and all further matters, except, perhaps, whether Brown was an attorney of a court of record, are questions of law.

One other question remains. Counsel contends that no action can be maintained on this judgment because of section 1 of chapter 87, Laws 1870, which, among other things, provides: "And no action shall be maintained in this state, or any judgment or decree rendered in another state or country against a resident of this state, where the cause of action upon which such judgment or decree was rendered could not have been maintained in this state, at the time the action thereon was commenced in such other state or country, by reason of lapse of time."

Of the applicability of this statute there can be no question. The notes were more than twelve years past due when the proceedings were commenced in the circuit court of Kane county; and the only testimony, that of Dodge himself, showed that he had been a resident of this state for the last thirteen years, and had not been back to Illinois since 1859. But a statute in all essential particulars exactly like this has been before the supreme court of the United States, and declared unconstitutional and void, as conflicting with section 1 of article 4 of the federal constitution, which ordains that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state." The statute which was before that court was a statute of Mississippi, and in these words: "No action shall be maintained on any judgment or decree rendered by any court without this state, against any person who, at the time of the commencement of the action in which such judgment or decree was or shall be rendered, was or shall be a resident of this state, in any case where the cause of action would have been barred *283 by any act of limitation of this state if such suit had been brought therein." Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290. The similarity of the statutes is obvious, and the decision of that court conclusive upon the question.

There being no other question in the case, the judgment will be affirmed.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J., (dissenting.) I cannot concur with my brethren in what they say in the first paragraph of the syllabus and the corresponding portion of the opinion. They hold that this court can take judicial notice of the contents of the constitutions of sister states, so far as such constitutions define the jurisdictions of the courts of such states. Now, if this court can do so, of course every other court in the state may do so, and not only may do so, but must do so, for a court that can take judicial notice of a thing is not at liberty to refuse when legally called upon to do so; and, if courts can take judicial notice of the constitutions of other states for the purpose of ascertaining the jurisdiction of their courts, I know of no good reason why they should not also take judicial notice of their statutes for the same purpose. The jurisdictions of many of the courts of other states are not in any manner defined by their constitutions, but are defined by their statutes, or by their statutes and usage; and, if we are to take judicial notice of the jurisdictions of the courts of other states, we must look into their statutes as well as into their constitutions. And, if we can take judicial notice of the constitutions and statutes of other states for one purpose, I know of no good reason why we should not take judicial notice of such constitutions and statutes for all purposes. But the jurisdictions of the courts of other states sometimes rest, partially at least, upon their common law, or upon immemorial usage, or upon judicial decisions. Now, must we also take judicial notice of the common law, the immemorial usage, and the judicial decisions of such other states? To take judicial notice of the laws of other states *is contrary to a well-settled principle of law. The rule is that courts of one state cannot take judicial notice of the laws of another state, but such laws must be pleaded and proved by the party who relies upon them the same as other facts. Hunter v. Ferguson, 13 Kan. *468, *475; Shed v. Augustine, 14 Kan. *282; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 363-365; 5 U. S. Dig. (1st Ser.) p. 487, par. 102; Id. pp. 745-750, pars. 5307-5432, and the numerous cases there cited. The cases are too numerous to cite in this opinion. In my opinion, this rule includes all laws of sister states, whether such laws are embodied in constitutions or statutes, or their common law, or in judicial decisions, or in immemorial usage.

In the case at bar the court has properly adopted the rule which it has adopted principally because of the great inconvenience of requiring, in every case, the party who attempts to introduce in evidence a judicial record of a court of another state to first prove that such court had, by the laws of its own state, the requisite jurisdiction. This inconvenience would undoubtedly be great, for the opposite party would probably in nearly every case require the evidence; and yet probably in not more than one case in a thousand would it be found that the court of said other state did not possess ample jurisdiction in the premises. But still, as I think, it would be much better, in order to avoid this inconvenience, to resort to natural and reasonable presumptions in favor of the jurisdiction of the courts than to violate a generally and universally recognized rule of law, or to unnecessarily introduce an exception into such general rule of law. In my opinion, the courts of this state may take judicial notice of the existence and political organization of all the states. They may take judicial notice that such states have written constitutions and written statutory laws; that their governments are republican in form, and similar to our own; that they each have an executive department, a legislative department, and a judicial department; and can take judicial notice of all the powers, privileges, and disabilities of such states as established and defined by the constitution and laws of the United States; and, besides this, we can take judicial notice of the kind of jurisdiction usually exercised by courts of record, by courts of general or superior jurisdiction, by probate courts, by justices of the peace, and by police magistrates. But this is about as far as we can go in taking judicial knowledge of the laws and institutions of other states, or of the jurisdiction that their courts may exercise. After this we must resort to presumptions; and one of the first of presumptions is the following: In the absence of anything showing the contrary, we presume that the laws of other states are substantially the same as our own,—Furrow v. Chapin, 13 Kan. *107, *113; Hickman v. Alpaugh, 21 Cal. 225; Hill v. Grigsby, 32 Cal.

55; Sharp v. Sharp, 35 Ala. 574, 580; Cox v. Morrow, 14 Ark. 603, 604, 609, et seq.; Atkinson v. Atkinson, 15 La. Ann. 491; Crane v. Hardy, 1 Mich. 56; Cooper v. Reaney, 4 Minn. 528, (Gil. 418;) Brimhall v. Van Campen, 8 Minn. 13, (Gil. 1;) Robinson v. Douchy, 3 Barb. 20; State v. Patterson, 2 Ired. 346; Green v. Rugeby, 23 Tex. 539, 544; Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 329; Walsh v. Dart, 12 Wis. 635; U. S. Dig. (1st Ser.) 500, 501, pars. 393-417;—and therefore, as a corollary from this presumption, we further presume, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that a judicial record from another state, properly authenticated, and in due form according to the laws of our own state, is valid in said other state, (French v. Pease, 10 Kan. *51.)

But the presumption in favor of the regularity and validity of judicial records is sometimes strong enough to make the record of judicial proceedings from another state valid, although, if its regularity and validity were to be determined by the laws of our own state, we would hold the record or some portion thereof void. Keely v. Garner, 13 Ind. 399. In such a case the presumption in favor of the regularity and validity of the record is stronger than the presumption that the laws of the other state are like ours; and in such a case it is presumed that the laws of the other state are such as to make the record valid. In Arkansas it has been decided that, “in the absence of the regularity of the official proceedings of a sister state; as, where the seal of a court is affixed by impression on paper, without wax, or any other tenacious substance, that the sealing was according to the laws of the state.” State v. Lawson, 14 Ark. 114. In Delaware it has been decided that a record of another state, properly certified to under the seal of a court, is evidence that the court was a court of record. Smith v. Redden, 5 Har. 321. In Wisconsin it has been presumed, from the name of the court, and held, that “the circuit court of Kent county, state of Michigan,” was a court of general jurisdiction. Jarvis v. Robinson, 21 Wis. 524. Also, in this connection, see Knapp v. Abell, 10 Allen, 488, 489, and cases there cited. In New York it has been held that “the record of a judgment in a neighboring state is prima facie evidence that the court by which it was rendered had jurisdiction.” Shumway v. Stillman, 4 Cow. 292, 296. In Pennsylvania, in the case of Wetherell v. Stillman, 65 Pa. St. 105, the court, speaking of the record of a judgment from New York, say that, “without it were shown that the court which rendered the judgment was a court of special or limited jurisdiction, no averment can be made against the conclusiveness of its record,” (page 114;) and “the record of the judgment from New York shows that the plaintiff’s costs were included in and formed parcel of the judgment. We are to presume that this is in conformity with the laws of that state,” (page 115.) See, also, Lapham v. Briggs, 27 Vt. 27, 35; Shumway v. Stillman, 6 Wend. 447.

After a careful examination of this subject I have come to the conclusion that, instead of saying that the courts of this state will take judicial knowledge of the laws of other states, so as to determine the jurisdiction of their various courts, we should say that, whenever a record from another state is brought to this state properly authenticated under the act of congress passed for that purpose, (1 U. S. St. at Large, 122,) the courts of this state will presume that such record is just what it purports to be. If it purports to be a record *287 of a court of record, we should *presume it to be such. If it purports to be the record of a court of general or superior jurisdiction, we should presume it to be such. And, as a general rule, where the record seems to be the record of a court, is attested by the clerk with the seal of the court, and the proper certificate of the judge is attached, we should presume that the record is that of a court of record; and, where the subject-matter of such record is also such as usually comes within the jurisdiction of courts of general or superior jurisdiction, we should presume, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that such court was a court of general or superior jurisdiction. Such presumptions would seldom, if ever, mislead a court. The record itself will generally show whether the court is one of general or superior jurisdiction, or one of limited, special, or inferior jurisdiction; and in those rare cases where the record does not show this, let the party who would be prejudiced thereby plead the laws of the sister state, and show by them the nature and character of the jurisdiction possessed by the court from which the record is obtained.

AUGUST JAEDICKE v. MARTIN PATRIE, Sheriff, etc.

July Term, 1875.

Injunction: Restraining Execution Sale. Where, upon one day, a petition in error and transcript are duly filed in this court to reverse a judgment of the district court, on the next a bond to stay proceedings duly filed in the district court clerk's office, and on the third an application made to the district judge for a temporary injunction restraining the sheriff from selling certain personal property, seized upon an execution legally issued and placed in the officer's hands before the filing of the petition in error, and where it does not appear that the sheriff had any actual knowledge, information, or notice of the proceedings in error, held, that a ruling of the district judge, refusing the injunction, will not be reversed.<sup>1</sup>

*288 *Error from Washington district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

T. J. Humes and J. W. Rector, for plaintiff.

Plaintiff, by due and regular proceedings, as provided by the Code, §§ 551, 554, 555, was entitled to a stay of proceedings upon the execution issued against him on the Scrafford judgment. As the sheriff had received the execution before the stay was effected, we were entitled, upon showing the facts by petition, to the order restraining further proceedings. It was not necessary to give him notice; and if the question of costs is regarded as in the way, the answer is that this is an equity proceeding, and it is in the power of a court of equity to grant us the injunction prayed for, and on final hearing impose the costs on us. Civil Code, § 591.

W. C. Webb and J. G. Lowe, for defendant in error.

The petition for the injunction is not sufficient. It does not show that the requisite steps were taken by plaintiff in error to stay or to supersede the execution issued on the judgment in favor of Scrafford v. Jaedicke. It does not allege that any præcipe or order was made or filed in this court, with the petition in error, or otherwise, at any time, for a summons in error, nor that a summons in error had been issued or served, nor that the sheriff (defendant in error in this case) was in anywise notified or informed that an appeal had been taken, and proceedings stayed on the judgment upon which the execution held by him was issued.

Plaintiff in error had and has an adequate remedy at law for the redress of his supposed injury. Upon giving due notice of his appeal, and of obtaining a legal stay of proceedings, he could bring *289 trespass against Scrafford and the *sheriff, or he could apply to this court, or to the court below, or district judge, for an order to stay proceedings.

To permit the action of injunction against the sheriff is to impose upon him the costs of an action in a case where he is not only not in fault, but is in the legitimate discharge of a positive duty. This is avoided, and the party complaining is fully protected, by applying to the district court or district judge, in the original case, for an order superseding the execution; and in such case the judgment plaintiff would be, as he ought to be, if he is unjustly pressing his execution, saddled with the costs himself.

BREWER, J. This was an action of injunction. The petition alleges that in August, 1874, one C. G. Scrafford obtained a judgment in the district court of Washington county against the plaintiff for $200; that on September 24th, then next, the plaintiff filed in the office of the clerk of the supreme court a petition in error, with a transcript of the record, for the purpose of obtaining a reversal of said judgment; that afterwards, and on September 25th, he filed his bond to stay proceedings, duly executed and approved, with the clerk of the district court of Washington county; that, prior to the commencement of the proceedings in error, an execution had been duly issued on the judgment to the defendant, sheriff of said county, who levied on certain goods and chattels of plaintiff, and, notwithstanding the proceedings in error and the stay, is about to sell them; that such sale will, if permitted, work great and irreparable injury. On the twenty-sixth of September an application was made for a preliminary injunction upon this petition. The application was overruled, and this is the error complained of. We think the ruling must be sustained. The petition was filed on the 24th, the bond on the 25th, and this application made on the 26th. It is nowhere alleged that the sheriff had any actual notice of the filing of either the petition or bond, or any knowledge or information concerning them.

*290 Now, it seems to us that *before the sheriff is subjected to an action, and mulcted in the costs therefor, for executing a process valid on its face, and lawfully issued to him, he should have some actual notice or information of proceedings staying the execution of such process. For all that the petition shows the first intimation the sheriff had that there was any thought of proceedings in error was the notice of this application for an injunction. Doubtless the statute is defective in not making any provision for notice, and unquestionably by the steps taken the execution was legally stayed. But common justice to the officer requires that he should be informed of what had been done before subjected to the vexation and costs of a suit, that he make suitable inquiry, and govern his actions accordingly. We do not mean to be understood as deciding that if, after being informed of the proceedings in error and the stay, the sheriff should still attempt to make a sale, he could not be restrained by injunction; though we think even in such cases the better practice would be to file a motion in the case in which the judgment was rendered for an order on the officer to return the execution.

The judgment will be affirmed.

VALENTINE, J. I concur in the decision of this case, but express no opinion upon the matter stated in the latter portion of the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice BREWER.

ALBERT G. SMITH and others v. JOHN T. SMITH and another.

July Term, 1875.

Occupying Claimant: Improvements Made and Taxes Paid. Where a person is in possession of certain real estate, holding the same under a tax deed executed in 1864, upon a tax-sale certificate issued in 1862 to a county, and assigned in 1864 to the holder of the tax deed by the county treasurer, who had no authority at that time to assign the same, and where such person has, while holding said real estate under said tax deed, made lasting *and valuable improvements on said real estate. *291 held that, although said tax deed is void upon its face, yet that the holder thereof, when an action is brought against him by the original owner of said real estate for the recovery of the same, is entitled to the benefit of both the occupying claimant act and section 117 of the tax law.<sup>1</sup>

Ejectment, brought by Albert G. Smith and two others as plaintiffs, against John T. Smith and another, as defendants, for a lot in the city of Atchison. Plaintiffs' petition alleged title in fee and right of possession in plaintiffs, and wrongful withholding by defendants. One defendant disclaimed, except as a tenant under defendant John T. Smith, who claimed title in himself under a tax deed issued to one "J. T. Morse, his heirs and assigns," June 1, 1864, on a tax sale made in May, 1862. Said tax deed, which was made a part of the answer, contains this recital: "And whereas, the county treasurer of said Atchison county did, on the sixteenth of May, 1864, duly assign the certificate of the sale of the property as aforesaid, and all the right, title, and interest of said Atchison county in and to said property, to J. T. Morse, of the county of Atchison and state of Kansas." Defendant also alleged due and proper conveyances from said Morse to himself, and, for a further defense, said defendant alleged the payment of taxes, etc., from the date of said tax sale, for which he claimed lien on the land, and also that he had made certain lasting and valuable improvements on said lot, for the value of which he claimed the benefit of the occupying claimant act. Plaintiffs demurred. The district court, at the June term, 1874, sustained said demurrer; "holding," says the transcript, "the law of the case to be that said tax-sale certificate and such tax deed were void, but that the defendant or holder thereof was entitled to the benefit of the provisions of section 117, chapter 107, of General Statutes, and that he had a lien thereunder for the amount specified in such tax deed, with costs of deed, and recording, and interest thereon at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum and for other amounts of taxes *292 paid, with interest at the rate of twenty-five per cent. per annum thereon, and that the defendant was entitled to benefit of the occupying claimant act for the lasting and valuable improvements made by him on said lot."

W. W. Guthrie, for plaintiffs in error.

The assignment of the tax certificate was to all intents and purposes no assignment at all. It was void. Shoat v. Walker, 6 Kan. *65, *73. Being void, it neither existed as a legal fact, nor as evidence of the existence of any fact in favor of its possessor. Hobson v. Dutton, 9 Kan. *477. To constitute a tax deed that could "be defeated in an action," it must be a deed attacked by evidence not illegal on face. Shoat v. Walker, 6 Kan. *74; Taylor v. Miles, 5 Kan. *498; Gordon v. State, 4 Kan. *500; Foreman v. Carter, 9 Kan. *677; Challiss v. Headley, Id. *685. The claim of defendants in error for taxes paid both before and after the date of the tax deed stands only as the claim of one who has paid taxes by mistake, viz., the legal taxes paid, and interest at seven per cent.; and the burden of proof is on claimant, as in other cases of money demands. The same principle applies as to the claim for benefit of occupying claimant act. Defendant does not "hold any land under any sale for taxes authorized by the laws of this state." Civil Code, § 601, cl. 4, Gen. St. 749. His claim is illegal, and he cannot complain of his own act. Lane v. National Bank, 6 Kan. *74; Beardsley v. Chapman, 1 Ohio St. 118-122; Harrison v. Castner, 11 Ohio St. 339-347. This is not like the case of Stebbins v. Guthrie, 4 Kan. *353.

<sup>1</sup>See, also, Cohen v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., 8 Pac. Rep. 188; Waterson v. Devoe, 18 Kan. 281; Millbank v. Ostertag, 24 Kan. 471; Wilder v. Cockshutt, 25 Kan. 510; Larkin v. Wilson, 28 Kan. 516. A party is not entitled to the benefit of the occupying claimant act, or to a recovery for the value of improvements made by him, unless, at the time of such improvements, he has the full and actual possession. Coonradt v. Myers, 81 Kan. 80; S. C. 2 Pac. Rep. 858. In all cases of void tax deeds, whatever may be the ground upon which the deeds are held void, the holder of the tax deed, when defeated in an action of ejectment, may recover the taxes which he has paid. Belz v. Bird, 81 Kan. 145; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 246. See, also, note to North v. Moore, 8 Kan. 108; Jay v. Granby Min. Co., ante, *171.

A. H. Horton and B. P. Waggener, for defendants.

The purpose and object of section 117 of the tax law of 1868 was to give the holder of a tax deed, or any one claiming under him by virtue of such tax deed, all the taxes and all the interest therein provided, in case the title under such deed should fail, as an inducement to bid in property sold for taxes. To render the investments in such deeds secure, this section provides that if "the holder of a tax deed be defeated," etc., he shall recover the said taxes, interest, and costs therein named. If the court now holds that said section 117 does not apply to defendant John T. Smith in this case, then said section is virtually declared nugatory, and without any effect, as "the experience of other states has shown that most titles held in that way would, upon proper proceedings had, be likewise declared void." Stebbins v. Guthrie, 4 Kan. *366. The experience of judicial proceedings in this state, before and since the rendition of the said decision above named, has fully confirmed the experience of other states as to the frequency with which tax deeds are held null and void. See Guittard Tp. v. Marshall, 4 Kan. *388; Brumbaugh v. Magill, Id. *415; Shoat v. Walker, 6 Kan. *65; Campbell v. Fisher, 8 Kan. *90; Sapp v. Morrill, Id. *677; Hobson v. Dutton, 9 Kan. *477; Park v. Tinkham, Id. *615; Hubbard v. Johnson, Id. *632; McQuesten v. Swope, 12 Kan. *82.

Again, the court below held that in the event of the failure of title, that defendant in possession of the premises, and claiming under a tax deed, was entitled to the benefit of the statute and provisions for the relief of occupying claimants of land. This ruling of the court should be sustained. Laws 1873, 203, 204; Gen. St. 750, § 602; Stebbins v. Guthrie, 4 Kan. *353. In the last-named case, the claimants, Stebbins and Porter, were in possession under a tax deed which the court held null and void, and yet this court held that this was sufficient to authorize the parties to claim the benefit of the occupying claimant law. See, also, Shaler v. Magin, 2 Ohio, 236; Davis v. Powell, 13 Ohio, 320; Bemis v. Becker, 1 Kan. *248.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action for the recovery of certain real property, to-wit, lot 2, in block 2, in the city of Atchison. In this opinion we shall speak of the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claim, as the "plaintiff;" and the defendants, and those under whom they claim, as the "defendant;" and shall not mention particularly each separate person. The plaintiff was the original owner of the lot in controversy. The defendant holds the same under a *294 tax deed. The court below held the tax deed void, but also held that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of the occupying claimant act, (Gen. St. 749, § 601 et seq.) and also of section 117 of the tax law, (Gen. St. 1057.) The plaintiff claims that the court below erred, and brings the case to this court for review. The facts of the case are substantially as follows: The plaintiff neglected and failed to pay the taxes on said lot from 1860 up to the commencement of this action. In May, 1862, the lot was sold to the county of Atchison for the taxes of 1861. The taxes for the years 1862 and 1863 were charged up against said lot. In May, 1864, the defendant paid into the county treasury the amount of the taxes, interest, and costs then due on said lot for the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, and obtained a tax-sale certificate for the lot, assigned to himself by the county treasurer of said county. In June, 1864, the defendant obtained a tax deed on this certificate, and had the same immediately recorded in the county register's office, and then took possession of the property, and has had possession of the same ever since. He has also made lasting and valuable improvements on said lot, and has paid all the taxes accruing thereon ever since his supposed purchase of the tax title.

Now, under these circumstances, what are the respective rights of the plaintiff and defendant? Now, while we think the tax deed is void upon its face, and confers no title upon the defendant, yet we think the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the occupying claimant act, and of the provisions of section 117 of the tax law. As to the defendant's right to the benefit of the occupying claimant act, we think the case of Stebbins v. Guthrie, 4 Kan. *353, is sufficient authority. Although said tax deed is void upon its face, yet it takes a process of reasoning to make it apparent, and hundreds and perhaps thousands of just such deeds have been executed in the various counties in this state; and until a judicial decision of this court was promulgated, announcing that such deeds were void upon their face, the whole question was considered both by bench and bar as en-*295 oped in considerable obscurity and uncertainty. *An occupant of land under such a deed is entitled to the benefit of the occupying claimant act; and for the same reason, and others, we think the occupant of land under such a deed is entitled to the benefits of section 117 of the tax law. Said section reads as follows:

"Sec. 117. If the holder of a tax deed, or any one claiming under him by virtue of such tax deed, be defeated in an action by or against him for the recovery of the land sold, the successful claimant shall be adjudged to pay to the holder of the tax deed, or the party claiming under him by virtue of such deed, before such claimant shall be let into possession, the full amount of taxes paid on such lands, with all interest and costs as allowed by law, up to the date of said tax deed, including the costs of such deed and the recording of the same, with interest on such amount at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum, and the further amount of taxes paid after the date of such deed, and interest thereon at the rate of twenty-five per cent. per annum."

This statute was enacted in the interest of equity and justice, and its provisions should be so construed as to promote justice. It is wholly unlike that class of statutes which attempts to give the land of one person to another for an inconsiderable sum. The former is liberally construed; the latter is strictly construed. The former was enacted for just such cases as the one at bar. It was enacted for void tax deeds, and not for valid tax deeds. A person holding under a valid tax deed has no need of such a statute. Only persons holding under void tax deeds need such a statute. The laws under whose provisions tax titles are created are usually construed strictly, and therefore we hold that the tax deed in this case is void. But laws enacted for the purpose of forcing, in a fair and reasonable manner, the delinquent members of society to discharge that moral obligation resting upon them, as well as upon others, to bear their proportionate share of the public burdens, are always construed liberally, so as to promote their object, and therefore we hold that, before the plaintiff can recover his property, he must pay to the defendant the taxes which he ought to have paid a long time ago to the public officers, *296 and which the defendant has *himself paid. As to the duty of a person to pay his taxes, see Gulf R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. *280 et seq. As to the equitable rule in granting relief to plaintiffs who seek to avoid the payment of their taxes, see Challiss v. Hekelnkaemper, 14 Kan. *475, *477, and cases there cited.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

ELISHA S. BABCOCK v. JOHN JONES.

July Term, 1875.

Judgment, Lien of: After-Acquired Property. A judgment in this state is a lien on the lands of the defendant in the county in which the judgment is rendered, acquired subsequently to the judgment, and before it has become dormant.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Cowley district court.

On the fourteenth of February, 1872, and for six months next preceding, and until the twentieth of April next following, one B. K. Davidson claimed eighty acres of land situate in Cowley county, and being a portion of the Osage reserve lands, having possession thereof as a pre-emptor under section 12 of the act of congress of July 15, 1870. On said fourteenth of February an abstract of a judgment from the docket of a justice of the peace, in favor of one Richard Cook, and against said Davidson, was filed in the office of the clerk of Cowley district court, and said judgment was duly entered and docketed in said district court. On said April 20, 1872, Davidson sold and conveyed said land, by warranty deed, to Elisha S. Babcock, for $500 cash in hand. Six days later, Davidson paid the entry money therefor, and acquired title to said land from the United States. On the third of April, 1873, Cook sued out an execution on his said judgment, directed to the sheriff of Cowley county, pursuant to which said *297 sheriff levied upon, *and duly advertised and sold, said land; John Jones becoming the purchaser thereof at such sale. Said sale was confirmed, and a sheriff's deed made to Jones, who thereupon brought ejectment against Babcock, to recover possession of the land. The question was whether the after-acquired title of Davidson was bound by the lien of the Cook judgment, or whether it inured to the benefit of his grantee, Babcock, freed from any lien of said prior judgment.<sup>2</sup> This question, upon an agreed case, was submitted to the <sup>1</sup>Priority of judgment and mortgage lien determined, see Plumb v. Bay, 18 Kan. 415; a judgment duly recovered and entered is a lien on all the right, title, interest, and equity of the judgment debtor in any lands claimed by him, (other than the homestead,) without regard to where or in whom is the legal title, Kirkwood v. Koester, 11 Kan. *471; the lien of a judgment or an execution levy is only upon the actual interest of the judgment debtor in real estate, and does not, except in cases where the doctrine of estoppel applies, extend to interests which by the record are apparently, but are not in fact, vested in him, Holden v. Garrett, 28 Kan. 98; when lien becomes subsequent to other judgment liens, Lamme v. Schilling, 25 Kan. 92; there is no foreclosure of a simple judgment lien, Howe M. Co. v. Miner, 28 Kan. 441.

<sup>2</sup>NOTE OF HON. W. O. WEBB, STATE REPORTER. The homestead-exemption question was not raised, nor even suggested, in this case. Whether Davidson was "married," or had a "family," nowhere appears in the record. Nor is the question whether, at the time of his conveyance to Babcock, he did or did not reside upon the land, anywhere suggested in the record. One of the agreed facts says that he "had possession" of said land "as a pre-emptor," for upwards of six months previous to said fourteenth of February, 1872, (the day Cook's judgment district court, at the September term, 1874. The district court held that the judgment lien attached to the land on the instant the title thereto was acquired by Davidson, and that the rights acquired under said judgment were paramount to rights acquired under a deed executed by the judgment debtor subsequently to the entering and docketing of the judgment, and gave judgment in favor of Jones.

The only question at issue here is the one of judgment liens on after-acquired lands in this state. This question is well settled in the negative in Pennsylvania, under laws relating to liens on real property very similar to our own. Rundle v. Ettwein, 2 Yeates, 23; Colboun v. Snider, 6 Bin. 135; Packer's Appeal, 6 Pa. St. 277; Moorehead v. McKinney, 9 Pa. St. 265; Waters' Appeal, 35 Pa. St. 523; Richter v. Selin, 8 Serg. & R. 425. The same question has been decided the same way in Iowa and Ohio. Harrington v. Sharp, 1 G. Greene, 131; Woods v. Mains, Id. 276; Roads v. Symmes, 1 Ohio, 281, 315; Stiles v. Murphy, 4 Ohio, 92. If our Code relating to judgment liens is the same as the Ohio Code, which we have generally adopted, the decisions of the supreme court of the latter state upon questions arising out of the Code will be considered good authority in Kan-

*298. sas. *We find, by comparing sections 419 and 444 of Kansas Code of 1868 with section 421 of chapter 87 of Revised Statutes of Ohio (Derby's Ed.) of 1854, that they are the same in meaning, though differently worded. In Indiana, where a different doctrine prevails, (Michaels v. Boyd, 1 Ind. 259,) the statute creates "a lien upon real estate and chattels real liable to execution in the county where the judgment is rendered." Of course, all real estate of the judgment debtor is liable to execution, whether acquired after or before judgment. So in Illinois. The decision in 38 Ill. 193, was made under section 1 of chapter 47, Rev. St. 1845, which provides: "All and singular the goods and chattels, lands, tenements, and real estate of every person against whom any judgment has been, or hereafter shall be obtained," etc., "shall be liable to be sold upon execution." The language of the statute, "has been obtained," would seem to be intended to cover lands purchased at any time. In New York it was held (Stow v. Tift, 15 Johns. 464) that judgments did not bind after-purchased lands where seizin was instantaneous. In the present case seizin was instantaneous, having been conveyed to plaintiff even before title acquired by the vendor.

Defendant's counsel seemed to rest their chief argument upon section 4 of chapter 68, Gen. St., relating to mortgages, as if that section was intended to extend judgment liens over after-acquired property. We fail to see any applicability of that section to the case at issue. In many states unpaid "purchase-money" consideration is was docketed, and two months before the deed to Babcock,) and that he "had improvements thereon; and that said Davidson had no other land in said county, at any time after the rendition of said judgment."

made a lien of itself upon the land purchased. And real estate is often purchased by articles of agreement, on time, and afterwards the vendor conveys and takes a mortgage to secure unpaid purchase money. In such a case, if a judgment had become a lien upon the vendee's equitable title held under the articles of agreement, a mortgage to secure unpaid purchase money, taken upon the land afterwards by the vendor, in the absence of the section referred to, would become subject to the existing judgment lien. This section, relied upon so strenuously by the defendant, was enacted in order to *299 give a purchase-money consideration preference over demands of a different nature. The defendant's argument seems based upon the supposition that a mortgage to secure purchase money is never given at any other time than at the time of the purchase; confounding always a simple purchase with the actual conveyance. We believe, in all cases where lands become subject to the lien of a judgment, under statutes creating such lien at the date of the judgment entry, or of the first day of a court term at which the judgment is entered, the correct doctrine to be that only the real estate held by the defendant at the time of such judgment entry, or first day of the court term, was intended by the legislature to be affected by the judgment lien. See Moody v. Harper, 25 Miss. 484. Why should the lien extend further, in the absence of express provision to that end? No one can be defrauded by it. The credit was not given upon speculation as to what the defendant might possess at some future time. Nor is it possible, in our view, that a judgment, in the absence of express statutory provision to that effect, can bind after-acquired lands of a defendant, without some additional action by the parties; as the levying upon it with execution issued under the judgment, as provided in section 444 of the Code.

Hackney & McDonald, for defendant in error.

The only question in this case is whether, under our laws, the lien of judgment attaches to the after-acquired real estate of the judgment debtor eo instanti acquisitis. The district court held in this case that it does; and we submit that there was no error in the finding and judgment of the trial court. The lien of judgment is a remedial provision of statutory law, which, in the absence of express statutory provisions relative thereto, is wholly dependent upon the rules of the common law and judicial interpretation for the determination of the scope and sphere of its application. The lien of judgment was created by statute for the purpose of giving to the judgment creditor a new remedy in aid of the writ of execution, which by its celerity of action renders it *300 impracticable for the judgment debtor to nullify the judgment by rapid, continuous, or fraudulent transfers of his real property; and, being so entirely remedial in its nature, the statute should receive the most liberal construction. Smith, Comm. 628, § 480; Broom, Leg. Max. 365. In the following well-considered cases it has been held that the judgment lien attaches to the after-acquired real estate of the judgment debtor, by virtue of its own inherent force, derived from the evident purpose of its creation, and without intervention by levy of execution: Ridge v. Prather, 1 Blackf. 401; Michaels v. Boyd, 1 Ind. 259; Wales v. Bogue, 31 Ill. 464; Steele v. Taylor, 1 Minn. 274, (Gil. 210;) Banning v. Edes, 6 Minn. 402, (Gil. 270;) Handly v. Sydenstricker, 4 W. Va. 605; Trustees R. E. Bank v. Watson, 13 Ark. 74. And this principle has been expressly recognized by the statutes of this state. Our statute relative to judgment liens (Gen. St. 1868, p. 708; Code, § 419) was approved February 28th, and three days after, on the second of March, the "act concerning mortgages" (Gen. St. p. 582) was approved, the fourth section of which is as follows: "A mortgage given by a purchaser to secure the payment of purchase money shall have preference over a prior judgment against such purchaser." Now, if the legislature did not, by this provision, recognize the rule that the judgment lien does attach to the after-acquired real estate of the judgment debtor, then we have presented the absurdity of providing a remedy against an evil which did not and could not have an existence.

BREWER, J. The only question in this case is, as stated by counsel in their briefs, and as appears from the record, whether a judgment in this state is a lien on after-acquired lands of the judgment debtor in the county, or binds only those belonging to him at the time the judgment takes effect; that is, either the first day of the term, or the day at which it is entered. The language of the statute is: "Judgments * * * shall be liens on the real estate of the debtor within the county in which the judgment is rendered, from the first day of the term at which the judgment is rendered; but judgments by confession, and judgments rendered at the same term during which the action was commenced, shall bind such lands only from the day on which such judgment was rendered." Civil Code, § 419.

This question has been before the courts of many states, and decided both ways. In Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, and Mississippi it has been decided that a judgment lien does not bind after-acquired lands. Rundle v. Ettwein, 2 Yeates, 23; Colhoun v. Snider, 6 Bin. 135; Packer's Appeal, 6 Pa. St. 277; Moorehead v. McKinney, 9 Pa. St. 265; Richter v. Selin, 8 Serg. & R. 425; Waters' Appeal, 35 Pa. St. 523; Roads v. Symmes, 1 Ohio, 281; Stiles v. Murphy, 4 Ohio, 92; Harrington v. Sharp, 1 G. Greene, 131; Woods v. Mains, 1 G. Greene, 276; Moody v. Harper, 25 Miss. 484. In the case of Colhoun v. Snider, supra, in which is the fullest and most exhaustive discussion of the question, Chief Justice TILGHMAN, while assenting to the judgment upon the strength of a prior adjudication, expressed a strong dissent to the soundness of the doctrine,—a dissent repeated by the court in the case of Richter v. Selin. On the other hand, the courts of New York, Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, Indiana, Illinois, Minnesota, and Arkansas hold that the judgment does bind after-acquired lands. Stow v. Tift, 15 Johns. 464; Jackson v. Bank of U. S., 5 Cranch, C. C. 1; Handly v. Sydenstricker, 4 W. Va. 605; Greenway v. Cannon, 3 Humph. 177; Chapron v. Cassady, Id. 663; Davis v. Benton, 2 Sneed, 665; Relfe v. McComb, 2 Head, 558; Ridge v. Prather, 1 Blackf. 401; Michaels v. Boyd, 1 Ind. 259; Wales v. Bogue, 31 Ill. 464; Root v. Curtis, 38 Ill. 192; Steele v. Taylor, 1 Minn. 274, (Gil. 210;) Banning v. Edes, 6 Minn. 402, (Gil. 270;) Trustees R. E. Bank v. Watson, 13 Ark. 74. See, also, Freem. Judgm. § 367. A decision either way, therefore, would be well supported by authority.

Counsel for plaintiff in error contend that our statute resembles the Ohio statute, and that, therefore, adopting it, we adopt the construction *302 *given there. Our statute is not a copy of the Ohio statute; and while it resembles it very closely, yet little, if any, more so than it does the statute of some of the other states, as, for instance, Tennessee. See 2 Sneed, supra. Nor do we understand the Ohio court, in the case in 1 Ohio, in which the question was first decided, as resting their decision upon the peculiar language of their statute. It should perhaps be stated that the statute now in force in Ohio, and from which it is claimed ours was taken, is not exactly like the one in force at the time of the decisions quoted. Chase, St. 129. That is even more unlike ours than the present. The language of the statute is not very clear or decisive upon the question. It would not be doing violence to its terms to construe it either way. We are inclined to favor the views of the last-named courts, and hold that the lien does bind after-acquired lands. A single fact favoring this view may be stated. The fourth section of the mortgage act, passed by the same legislature but a few days after the Code, provides that "a mortgage given by a purchaser to secure the payment of purchase money shall have preference over a prior judgment against such purchaser." This tends to sustain the view that but for this section the prior judgment would be a lien, and a lien preferred to the mortgage.

The judgment will be affirmed.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring.

STATE OF KANSAS v. GEORGE POTTER.

July Term, 1875.

1. Homicide: Information for: Certainty of Charge: Sufficiency. An information for murder in the second degree against three parties, which charges that the three, in pursuit of a common purpose, unlawfully, purposely, and maliciously made the assault; that each was armed with a separate weapon, describing it; that one with his weapon, in a cruel and unusual manner, wickedly, purposely, and maliciously inflicted several mortal wounds, describing them, of which the deceased died; *303 that the others, at the same time and place, with their weapons, *wickedly, purposely, and maliciously encouraged, abetted, assisted, and protected him in said acts; and closes with the charge that the three naming them, "in the manner and by the means aforesaid, unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, wickedly, purposely, and maliciously, and with malice aforethought, did kill and murder,"—charges upon all the intent to take life sufficiently for the crime of murder in the second degree.<sup>1</sup>
2. Instructions: Elements of Crime: Different Degrees. If the court, in its instructions, gives, in general terms, the elements of the crime charged, and it is not asked by defendant to enlarge upon and explain further any particular element or feature thereof, no error has been committed in failing to give fuller and more explicit instructions which will justify a reversal. Especially is this true when the testimony is not preserved, and there is nothing in the record from which it can be inferred that any particular matter called for especial notice and explanation.
3. ———. When the instructions complained of relate to a degree of crime inferior to the principal offense charged in the information, and inferior to that of which the defendant is convicted, they will be deemed not to have prejudiced the defendant, whether erroneous or not.
4. Verdict: Refusal to Receive: Province of Jury. Where the jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty, and adding a recommendation that he receive the lowest punishment allowed by law, and the court declined to receive it, and handed them a form of verdict answering to the same degree of the crime as the prior verdict, but without the recommendation, which was duly signed and returned, held, that no error has been committed affecting the substantial rights of the defendant.
5. Instructions: To be in Writing: Oral Remarks. The statute requiring a written charge to the jury in criminal offenses is imperative, and the failure to comply with it is an error compelling a reversal.<sup>2</sup>

6. ———. Where the bill of exceptions simply states that a part of the charge, or some of the instructions, were given orally, without stating the language used, the statute will be held to apply, and the judgment be reversed.
7. ———. It is immaterial whether the oral portion of the charge is given before the jury retire to consider of their verdict, or after they (having once retired) return to ask further instructions; and whether it is a separate instruction, or a mere explanation of a written instruction, it is an error in either case.
8. ———. The mere fact that an oral communication has passed from the court to the jury is not of itself proof that the statute has been *304 *disregarded. But the court may properly make oral statements to the jury in reference to the form of the verdict, the manner in which the trial has been conducted, the behavior of the jury or counsel or parties, or any other oral statement which is not fairly and strictly a direction or instruction upon some question or rule of law involved in or applicable to the trial, or a comment upon the evidence.
9. ———: Questions by Jurors, and Answers. Where a juror propounds a question to the court, it may make a direct answer, without reducing the same to writing, provided in so doing it does not make an independent statement of a rule of law. In other words, where the question of the juror is the full statement of the rule, and the answer is no more than an affirmation or denial, such affirmation or denial need not be reduced to writing before it is given.

Appeal from Atchison district court.

Information for murder in the second degree, filed in June, 1874, against defendant, George Potter, and two others. The case of one of his co-defendants, who was convicted on a separate trial, was brought to this court, and is reported in State v. Potter, 13 Kan. *414. The defendant here, George Potter, was tried at the November term, 1874, of the district court, and convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary of the state for the period of ten years.

C. F. Cochran and Horton & Waggener, for appellant.

The court should have sustained the motion to quash the information, and should have sustained the objection of the defendant to the introduction of testimony under said information. The information purports to have been drawn under section 7 of the crimes act, which provides that "every murder which shall be committed purposely and maliciously, but without deliberation and premeditation, shall be deemed murder in the second degree." The conviction and judgment were under this section. It contains the word "purposely," as qualifying and characterizing the offense of the murder of a human *305 being. We claim that the accused is not charged *in the information at all with having purposely murdered or killed Keeley, but only with having purposely aided and abetted Isaac Potter in the infliction of the wounds from which death ensued. It is nowhere charged, or pretended to be charged, in said information, that either of said defendants purposely killed or murdered said

Keeley, or that defendant herein aided, abetted, or counseled Isaac Potter in the murder of Keeley. This is fatal to the information, and the court erred in not sustaining this point when presented. Fouts v. State, 4 G. Greene, 500; State v. Thompson, 31 Iowa, 393; State v. McCormick, 27 Iowa, 402; Kain v. State, 8 Ohio St. 306, 321; Loeffner v. State, 10 Ohio St. 598; State v. Knouse, 29 Iowa, 118; State v. Jones, 20 Mo. 58; Bish. St. Crimes, §§ 471, 472.

The court erred in its instructions to the jury, inasmuch as it failed and neglected to state to them all matters of law which were necessary for their information in giving their verdict. Crim. Code, § 236. The offense of murder in the second degree was not in any manner explained to the jury, and they had no information from the instructions of the court from which they could form an intelligent idea of what constituted murder in the second degree. Whart. Amer. Crim. Law, (7th Ed.) § 3248; State v. Dunlop, 65 N. C. 288; State v. Wyatt, 50 Mo. 309. The court in its general charge attempts to tell the jury what constitutes manslaughter in the first degree, and undertook to copy the language of section 12 of crimes act; but, instead of giving the instruction in the words of the section, the court says to the jury, "and which killing would be murder at common law." The court undoubtedly misled the jury as to what constituted manslaughter in the first degree under said section, and certainly did not instruct them in what cases killing would be murder at the common law. Bonfanti v. State, 2 Minn. 130, (Gil. 99;) State v. Dunlop, 65 N. C. 288. The court should have explained to the jury the several definitions of manslaughter in the second degree, as provided in sections 16 and 17 of the crimes act, and it was error not to do so. Crim. Code, § 236. The same objection is applicable to the explanation given by the court of manslaughter in the third degree. The court in its general charge to the jury explains to *them what constitutes, in its judgment, manslaughter in the fourth degree, in the following words: "Manslaughter in the fourth degree consists of every other kind of killing of a human being, by the act, procurement, or culpable negligence, which would be manslaughter at the common law, and which is not justifiable or excusable, or would not be manslaughter in some other degree, which I have heretofore fully explained to you." Now, we submit that this instruction, standing alone, does not in any manner explain to the jury what constitutes manslaughter in the fourth degree. In order for the jury to have intelligently understood the same, it was necessary for the court to have fully explained to them what would be manslaughter at common law. As this was not done, the jury were left to conjecture in their minds what constituted manslaughter at the common law, which was the exclusive province of the court to explain to them fully and explicitly. Crim. Code, § 236; Reeves v. Wood Co. Treas., 8 Ohio St. 835.

After the jury had retired to consider their verdict, they returned into court, and asked of the court "whether a party could be an accessory, aider, or abettor of another who committed the crime of manslaughter in the second degree." The court thereupon, over the objection of defendant, gave the jury the following instructions: "A person who aids or assists another in the commission of any crime is equally guilty with the person who actually commits the crime, and may be charged, tried, and convicted, the same as the principal, and may be regarded by the jury in every respect as if he were the principal." As an abstract proposition of law, this is not correct. Crim. Code, § 228. But the instruction was not an answer in any manner to the question. It was an evasion in terms of the question of the juror, and the only effect it could have had would be to mislead the minds of the jury in arriving at a proper solution of the question. But, in addition to this written instruction, the court stated orally to the jury as follows: "I mean by that, that makes him principal and not accessory. There is no such thing, in my judgment, as *307 accessory, *in this case. Those acts make him principal, and should be regarded by you as principal, and not accessory. He is either principal or nothing." This verbal instruction to the jury assumes that the evidence in the case made defendant principal in the crime charged, and that the jury should regard him as principal. "Those acts." What acts? It was improper, and greatly prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, for the court to give any instructions verbally to the jury. The Criminal Code was undoubtedly enacted for the guidance of courts and juries in the trial of persons accused with the commission of crimes; and so particular was the legislature that the rights of the accused should not be frittered away by any improper act or instruction of the court it wisely provided, in section 236: "The judge must charge the jury in writing, and the charge shall be filed among the papers of the case." This was clearly an instruction or charge of the court, and it was not in writing, and in direct contravention of the provision as laid down in the Criminal Code, and was calculated to mislead the jury, and deprive the defendant of the rights that had been given him by the law. And the court clearly and manifestly deviated from the law, to the prejudice of defendant, in giving this oral instruction. State v. Huber, 8 Kan. *447; Mallison v. State, 7 Mo. 399; State v. Cooper, 45 Mo. 64; Gile v. People, 1 Colo. 18, 61; Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Cox, 37 Ind. 325; Dixon v. State, 13 Fla. 637; Meredith v. Crawford, 34 Ind. 399; Feriter v. State, 33 Ind. 288; Turnpike Co. v. Conway, 7 Ind. 187; Clark v. State, 31 Tex. 574. If this provision of the law requiring the charge of the court to be in writing and filed among the papers can be disregarded, as it was in this instance, it is useless for persons accused of crime to insist upon any provision of the law as enacted to protect them in their rights.

The court erred in not receiving the first verdict of the jury. It was clearly proper for the court to have granted the request of the defendant to receive the verdict as presented into court, and it was error for it to refuse such request. The defendant had a legal right to have said verdict read, or to know of its contents, and have the jury polled as the law requires. Maduska v. Thomas, 6 Kan. *153; 3 *308 Wat. New Trials, 1404. *After the jury had brought in their first verdict, and without the defendant being permitted to see the same, the court, of its own motion, wrote out and handed to the jury a verdict, which they signed and returned. We claim that this was an improper and unauthorized action of the court. He was simply saying to the jury: "In my judgment, the defendant is guilty of murder in the second degree, and that the jury should sign the verdict as presented to them and return it into court; but if, upon deliberation, they conclude otherwise, and find the defendant not guilty, they should fill up the blank left by the court before the word guilty with the word not, and through their foreman return the same into court." State v. Johnson, 8 Iowa, 525-531. This was drawing a distinction unfavorable to the rights and interests of the defendant. Horne v. State, 1 Kan. *74.

Aaron S. Everest, for the State.

There was no error in overruling the motion to quash the information. A similar motion to the same information was passed upon by this court in the appeal of Isaac Potter. State v. Potter, 13 Kan. *422.

There was no error in the charge. It stated to the jury all matters of law which were necessary for their information, and no substantial rights of the accused were affected, nor was he in any manner prejudiced thereby. It is not necessary nor essential that the court should have delivered a lecture upon criminal law, or to have made its charge a commentary upon the law of homicide. The exception to the charge is too general; being "to each and every part, line, and word thereof." Unless the whole charge is erroneous, or unless the charge in its general scope or meaning is erroneous, such an exception is not available. Sumner v. Blair, 9 Kan. *530; Atchison v. King, Id. *560; Eldred v. Oconto Co., 33 Wis. 137; Yates v. Bachley, Id. 185; Ferguson v. Graves, 12 Kan. *43; Somervail v. Gillies, 31 Wis. 152; Bigelow v. West Wis. R. Co., 27 Wis. 483.

If the instructions given did not possess sufficient clearness to satisfy the defendant, the attention of the court should have been called, and a more definite charge requested. Although that portion of the charge as to what would constitute manslaughter in the *309 first degree may be open to some *verbal criticism, when considered apart and by itself, still, when taken with the rest of the charge, it could not have misled a jury of ordinary intelligence, and did not prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant. And even if the court did not clearly charge what constituted murder at common law, or any other offense less than the one of which a conviction was had, such an omission is not to be presumed injurious to the defendant, who was convicted of murder in the second degree. State v. Dickson, 6 Kan. *221; Walker v. Walker, 26 Ga. 156.

There was no error in answering the question from the foreman of the jury. There is no doubt of the correctness of this proposition of law stated by the court. It has been frequently so held under statutes similar to that of our own. Crim. Code, § 115; State v. Cassady, 12 Kan. *550; Baxter v. People, 3 Gilman, 868; People v. Woody, 45 Cal. 290; Ingalls v. Cooke, 21 Iowa, 561.

The appellant claims that the court below gave an oral instruction to the jury, which we claim is not a fact; the difference being that what was said by the court was only in response to a question asked by the jury after they had been once regularly charged and properly instructed. This was no part of a charge, within the meaning of section 236 of the Criminal Code. And this statute was not intended to include any and every question and answer passing between the court and jury; neither does the statute contemplate any such thing. Sullivan v. Collins, 18 Iowa, 231; Hasbrouck v. City of Milwaukee, 21 Wis. 217, 225, 238; City of Milwaukee v. Gross, Id. 243; Millard v. Lyons, 25 Wis. 516; Grant v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 29 Wis. 125; Hogel v. Lindell, 10 Mo. 487; Pate v. Wright, 30 Ind. 476; 5 Ill. 302-305; Prater v. Snead, 12 Kan. *447; O'Donnell v. Segar, 25 Mich. 380; People v. Bonney, 19 Cal. 426, 446. The province of a trial court is sufficiently hampered without giving this section any unwarranted construction. This did not and could not have prejudiced any rights of defendant.

It was not error for the court to direct the jury to amend their verdict. The first verdict returned was, in the opinion of the court, informal. It found the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, as charged in the information filed against him, and contained the further words, to-wit, "and recommend his punishment to be the least amount allowed by law." The court had the un-*310 *doubted right to direct a verdict which is informal to be corrected; or a verdict which contains unnecessary or improper matter, or matter which is surplusage, to order that part of it to be stricken out, and the verdict corrected. There was no demand to have the jury polled, neither was said verdict received; but the court directed that, the verdict returned being informal, the jury should correct the same. It was not the province of the jury to render any but a general verdict as to the guilt or innocence of the accused.

BREWER, J. Defendant was convicted in the district court of Atchison county of the crime of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of ten years. From that conviction and sentence he has appealed to this court. The errors complained of may be grouped into four classes: First, objection to the sufficiency of the information; second, error in the instructions; third, the giving of an oral instruction; fourth, refusing to receive the verdict as prepared by the jury, and preparing a verdict for them to return. With three of these matters we have had little, but with the other, great, difficulty in coming to a conclusion.

1. It is objected that the information was insufficient. The information was a joint one against Isaac Potter, Walter Boyle, and the appellant. It charged murder in the second degree. It charged the fatal blow upon Isaac Potter, and that Boyle and the appellant were present, aiding and abetting. A severance was had, and the defendants tried separately. Isaac Potter was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appealed therefrom to this court, which reversed the conviction, and remanded the case for a new trial. Subsequent to the conviction of Isaac Potter the appellant was tried. When Isaac Potter's case was brought to this court, (State v. Potter, 13 Kan. *416, *422,) objection was made to the sufficiency of the information, but it was overruled. The specific objection now made was, however, not then presented, so that that decision may not be deemed *311 conclusive now. The claim now made by counsel is that "the accused is not charged in the information at all with having purposely murdered or killed Jacob B. Keeley, but only with having purposely aided and abetted Isaac Potter in the infliction of the wounds from which death ensued." The information, which is perhaps unnecessarily lengthy, charges that the three defendants, in pursuit of a common purpose, "unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, wickedly, purposely, and maliciously" made an assault upon the deceased; that each of the defendants (naming him separately) was armed with a certain weapon; that Isaac Potter did, with his weapon, "in a cruel and unusual manner, willfully, wickedly, purposely, and maliciously" strike, beat, bruise, and wound the deceased, and thereby gave to him four mortal wounds, (describing them,) of which wounds he died; that this appellant and Walter Boyle, with their weapons, at the same time and place, unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, wickedly, purposely, and maliciously encouraged, abetted, assisted, and protected in said acts; and then closes with the charge, "and so the county attorney * * * does say and charge that the said defendants, (naming each of them,) him, the said Jacob B. Keeley, in the manner and by the means aforesaid, unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, wickedly, purposely, and maliciously, and with malice aforethought, did kill and murder, contrary," etc. It seems to us, since the decision in the case of Smith v. State, 1 Kan. *365, that there can be little question as to the sufficiency of this information. It charges an assault by all, in pursuit of a common purpose; the killing by Isaac Potter; the presence of the others, aiding and abetting; and, finally, the intent upon all. In the Smith Case, just cited, there was, as here, an omission to charge the intent to take life elsewhere than in the closing clause of the indictment. But the court, disregarding authorities under the old practice, held the indictment good under our Code. It seems to us that that decision was correct, and it disposes of this question.

*312 2. The next objection we shall consider is that to the instructions. The court gave to the jury a general charge, and then, at the instance of the respective parties, several instructions.

The first point made is that it failed and neglected to state to the jury all matters of law which were necessary for their information in giving their verdict, (Crim. Code, § 236,) and upon this counsel say: "The offense of murder in the second degree was not in any manner explained to the jury, and they had no information from the instructions of the court from which they could form an intelligent idea of what constituted murder in the second degree." On examining the charge, we find that the court told the jury that if they found "that the defendant did, in the manner and form, and at the time and place, charged in the information, kill the said deceased," then it was their duty to convict of murder in the second degree; and in the first instruction he charged them that if they found that the defendant, "in connection with Isaac Potter and Walter Boyle, all acting with a common purpose, design, and intent to take the life of the deceased, purposely and maliciously killed the said deceased, without justification therefor, as charged in the information," then they should convict of murder in the second degree; and other instructions, given at the instance of both plaintiff and defendant, enlarged a little upon certain elements of the crime. It does not appear that any instruction asked by the defendant was refused, except one in relation to the presumption of innocence, and one in relation to reasonable doubt, which was refused as tendered, but given with a modification. Now, it may be laid down as a general rule that if the court gives, in general terms, the elements of the crime, and is not asked by defendant to enlarge upon and explain further any particular element thereof, no error has been committed in failing to give fuller and more specific instructions which will justify an appellate court in a reversal. Especially is this true when, as in this case, the testimony is not preserved, and nothing from which it can be inferred that any particular element called for especial notice and explanation. Doubtless it often happens that in view of the testimony certain matters require especial notice, and rules of law applicable thereto should be given with great fullness and detail, and a failure to do so would be sufficient to justify a reversal. But there is no presumption that this is so, and the fact, if it exists, should be made to appear in the record.

Again, it is objected that the court failed to give fully and correctly the law in reference to the several degrees of manslaughter and other inferior crimes. Craft v. State, 3 Kan. *485. In reference to these crimes it gave, or attempted to give, simply the statutory definition of them. It made some verbal changes from the language of the statute, but none working any substantial change in the meaning. Thus, in the section defining manslaughter in the first degree, is this phrase, "in cases when such killing would be murder at the common law." Instead of this, the court used this expression, "and which killing would be murder at common law." Then, again, it omitted, in explanation of this section, any definition of "murder at the common law." Hence counsel contend that the jury were not fully informed as to what constituted manslaughter in the first degree. Substantially the same criticism is passed upon the instructions in reference to some of the other degrees of manslaughter. In reference to these objections, in addition to what was said concerning the first objection to the instructions, the case of State v. Dickson, 6 Kan. *209, may be referred to, in which this court held that "when the instructions complained of relate to a degree of crime inferior to the principal offense charged in the information, and inferior to that of which the defendant is convicted, they will be deemed not to have prejudiced the defendant, whether erroneous or not." This is decisive upon these points.

An instruction asked in reference to reasonable doubt was modified by adding a fair, proper definition of reasonable doubt, and, as modified, given. There was clearly no error in this.

Some other objections are raised to the instructions, but none which we deem well founded.

*314 *3. It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to receive the verdict returned by the jury, and handing to them the form of a verdict. The verdict as returned was one finding the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, and with it these words, "and recommend his punishment to be the least amount allowed by law." The court declined to receive the verdict in that form, and handed them one without those words, which was duly signed and returned. It may be stated that on the form handed to them a blank space was left before the word "guilty," for the insertion of the word "not," and the jury instructed to insert the word "not" if they found the defendant not guilty. But this was unnecessary. The jury had signified the conclusions to which they had arrived when they returned the first verdict, and all that the court did was to see that the verdict was placed in the proper form. We do not think there would have been any impropriety in receiving the first verdict; but technically and strictly the jury have nothing to do with the question of punishment, but only with that of guilt; and they go outside the strict boundary of their duties when they attempt to influence the term of the punishment. The court keeps within the letter of the law when it confines the jury to their separate duties, and commits no error in so doing. Indeed, it may be laid down that it is the duty of the court to see that the verdict is in due form; and, if all that it does is to change the form, it is simply discharging an unquestioned duty.

4. This brings us to the last, and by far the most difficult, question in the case. The following are the facts in reference to it: After the jury had retired to consider of their verdict, they returned into court, and through their foreman, Dr. Stringfellow, asked of the court the following question: "I ask whether a party could be an accessory, aider, or abettor of another who committed the crime of manslaughter in the second degree?" The court thereupon, over the objection of the defendant, gave the jury the following instructions, to-wit:

*315 *"A person who aids or assists another in the commission of any crime is equally guilty with the person who actually commits the crime, and may be charged, tried, and convicted the same as the principal, and may be regarded by the jury in every respect as if he were the principal." In addition to this written instruction, the court stated orally to the jury as follows: "I mean by that, that makes him principal, and not accessory. There is no such thing, in my judgment, as accessory to this case. Those acts make him principal, and should be regarded by you as principal, and not accessory. He is either principal or nothing."

The statute says: "The judge must charge the jury in writing, and the charge shall be filed among the papers of the cause. Gen. St. p. 858; Crim. Code, § 286. It is error to omit to do so. State v. Huber, 8 Kan.* 447. A glance at some of the decisions in reference to this matter in other courts may not be un instructive.

In Indiana the statute provides that, "when the argument of the cause is concluded, the court shall give general instructions to the jury, which shall be in writing, and be numbered and signed by the judge if required by either party." 2 Rev. St. (G. & H.) p. 198, § 324. Upon this, in Townsend v. Chapin, 8 Blackf. 328, it was held error to give written instructions with verbal explanations and illustrations. The same doctrine was affirmed in Kenworthy v. Williams, 5 Ind. 375, and in Laselle v. Wells, 17 Ind. 83. In Meredith v. Crawford, 34 Ind. 399, the court declared that "oral explanations, comments, or modifications" were erroneous. In Rising Sun & V. T. Co. v. Conway, 7 Ind. 187, and in Feriter v. State, 33 Ind. 283, the decision was that the whole charge must be in writing. In the case of the Toledo & W. R. Co. v. Daniels, 21 Ind. 256, the trial judge gave this oral introduction to his written instructions: "This is an action brought against defendant to recover the value of the property alleged by the plaintiff to have been killed on said road. It has been intimated by the defendant's counsel that you may disregard *316 the instructions of the court as to the law governing *the case, but we say to you that you cannot do that. The court may err, but it is not the province of the jury to determine whether the law as delivered to them by the court be correct or incorrect. If wrong, the party feeling aggrieved by it has his remedy by appeal to the supreme court." The giving of this oral statement was adjudged error. In Pate v. Wright, 30 Ind. 476, it appeared that the trial judge repeated orally a part of one of the instructions, and, in reading another, remarked that he had not intended to read so far, and then re-read the instruction as intended. This was held no error.

In Colorado it is provided that "the instructions shall be reduced to writing, and may be taken by the jury in their retirement, and returned by them with their verdict." Laws 1861, p. 282, § 28. In

Dorsett v. Chew, 1 Colo. 18, and Giles v. People, Id. 61, where it appeared from the bills of exception that the court gave oral instructions, and oral explanations of written instructions, both were adjudged error.

In California the statute reads: "In no case shall any charge or instruction be given to the jury otherwise than in writing, unless by the mutual consent of the parties." In People v. Demit, 8 Cal. 423, and People v. Ah Fong, 12 Cal. 345, the judgments were reversed because of the giving of oral instructions. In People v. Payne, 8 Cal. 341, an oral modification of a written instruction was held erroneous. And in People v. Wappner, 14 Cal. 437, it was decided that an oral instruction was erroneous, whether given in the first instance, or after the jury had once retired to consider of their verdict and returned with a request for further information. In People v. Bonney, 19 Cal. 426, in which was an indictment for murder, the jury returned a verdict of "guilty as charged." The court told the jury verbally that the verdict was not in form, but should specify the degree of murder of which they found the defendant guilty, and directed them to retire and designate the degree. Held no violation of the statute, and no error.

*317 *In Ray v. Wooters, 19 Ill. 82, under a statute which declared that the court "shall in no case orally explain or qualify" the written instruction, an oral explanation was held ground for reversal. In O'Hara v. King, 52 Ill. 303, where the statute forbade instructions "unless such instructions are reduced to writing," (Scales, Comp. 261,) it appeared that during the argument of counsel the court interrupted, and stated orally, in the presence and hearing of the jury, its opinion as to the law of the case; but this was decided to be outside of the statute, and not erroneous.

In Florida the statute requires that the charge shall be wholly in writing; that upon refusing an instruction the court shall write out his own rulings of the law upon the point raised, all of which shall be in writing, and written before the same are delivered; and that all instructions given and refused shall be signed and sealed by the court, and form a part of the record in the cause. In Dixon v. State, 13 Fla. 637, it appeared that, after the court had finished its charge, one of the jurors asked whether they must believe all the testimony, or could disbelieve any part of it. The court answered orally that they could reject, etc.; but this was adjudged within the prohibitions of the statute, and an error sufficient for reversal.

In Clarke v. State, 31 Tex. 574, it was declared that oral instructions, given without the consent of the defendant, were forbidden by the statute, and sufficient for reversal.

In Missouri it was provided by the act of February, 1839, "that in no criminal case shall the court give to the jury any charge or instruction, on any question of law or fact, except the same be in writing, and filed in the cause;" and that, if any court should violate that statute, "the party may except, and for such violation the cause or judgment shall be reversed at the instance of the aggrieved party." Under this statute the case of Mallison v. State, 6 Mo. 899, was decided. There it appeared that a juror asked if, under the indictment, which was for murder, they could convict of manslaughter, and *318 the court replied orally that it had not decided *that point; that the court did not know that the supreme court had decided the point; that they (the jury) were judges of the law and the fact; that they might find the verdict as they pleased, and, when rendered, the court would decide on its validity. The judgment was reversed for error in making such oral reply. The statute in force at the time of the decision of State v. Cooper, 45 Mo. 64, provided "that the court shall not, on the trial of the issue of any indictment, sum up or comment upon the evidence, or charge the jury as to matter of fact, unless requested so to do by the prosecuting attorney, and the defendant, or his counsel. But the court may instruct the jury on any point of law arising in the case, which instruction shall be in writing." In that case, the court, with the consent of the defendant, charged the jury orally upon the law. This was held erroneous, and the judgment was reversed.

In Michigan the statute reads: "The court shall in no case orally qualify, modify, or in any manner explain the written charge." In O'Donnell v. Segar, 25 Mich. 367, it appeared that the court, in explanation of its written instructions, said orally "that the bringing of a suit for exempt property, or claiming it as exempt, was justified by law, and must be so regarded by the jury as well as by the courts." Commenting upon this, the supreme court say "that it was the expression of a mere legal truism, which could not and did not modify the effect of any of the charge given, and consequently cannot be treated as error." But where it was stated in the bill of exceptions that the court "otherwise orally explained," without giving the language used, they decided that the statute applied, and reversed the judgment. In Swartwout v. Michigan Air-line R. Co., 24 Mich. 407, it was held that the reading of a section of the statute as a part of the charge was no violation of the provision which required that the charge should be in writing and filed with the papers of the case.

In Hasbrouck v. City of Milwaukee, 21 Wis. 219, the court prefaced the written instructions with some oral statements, *319 *among which were these: "During the long and fatiguing trial the court may have become impatient at the delay of counsel, and made remarks that may possibly have influenced some juror. I wish it specially understood that nothing I have said was intended to influence unduly the verdict of the jury, and I do not wish any juror to be influenced by it in the least. In submitting this case to you I will not comment at all upon the evidence, leaving you to weigh it all in your own judgment, and bring in your verdict accordingly." This was held no part of the charge, and therefore not in violation of the statute which required that the charge be in writing. In Millard v. Lyons, 25 Wis. 516, a juror, after the charge, asked "whether the plaintiff had the right to use the defendant's divided grain to feed the stock and sheep." The judge answered that he would not have the right by law. This was held no part of the charge; the supreme court saying that the question might have been answered with the simple word "no," and that it would be nonsense to require the court to write that word, and then read it to the jury. In Grant v. Insurance Co., 29 Wis. 125, the court orally stated to the jury that the defendant had offered no proof to sustain the issues he had tendered, and, the plaintiff's proof being conclusive, they must find a verdict for the plaintiff. This was held no violation of the statute.

It will be noticed from this review that our statute is not so specific or minute in its restriction upon the action of the court as those of several other states. The language is general, and simply calls for a written charge, and requires it to be filed among the papers. We think the following propositions may fairly be deduced from the authorities, and are a just construction of the effect to be given to our statute: (1) The statute requiring a written charge in criminal cases is imperative, and a failure to comply with it is an error compelling reversal. (2) Where the bill of exceptions simply states that a part of the charge, or some of the instructions, were given orally, without stating the language used, the statute will be held to apply, *320 and the *judgment be reversed. (3) It is immaterial whether the oral portion of the charge is given before the jury retire to consider of their verdict, or after they, having once retired, return to ask further instructions; and whether it is a separate instruction, or a mere explanation of a written instruction, it is error in either case. (4) The mere fact that an oral communication has passed from the court to the jury is not of itself proof that the statute has been disregarded; but the court may properly make oral statements to the jury in reference to the form of the verdict, the manner in which the trial has been conducted, the behavior of the jury or counsel or parties, or any other oral statement which is not fairly and strictly a direction or instruction upon some question or rule of law involved in or applicable to the trial, or a comment upon the evidence. (5) Where a juror propounds a question to the court, it may make a direct answer without reducing the same to writing, provided in so doing it does not make an independent statement of a rule of law; in other words, where the question of the juror is the full statement of the rule, and the answer is no more than an affirmation or denial, such affirmation or denial need not be reduced to writing before it is given. It may be remarked in reference to these propositions, and especially the last, that the purpose of this statute is to secure to the defendant the exact rulings of the court, in order that he may avail himself of any error in those rulings; that it was not intended to cast any unnecessary burdens upon the court, or to hamper or restrict communi-ocations between the court and jury; that it should be so construed as fairly to secure that purpose, and not made a mere weapon of technical error; that in reference to answers to questions, as there is nothing to require the questions to be reduced to writing before they are put, it would seem trifling to compel the answer to be so reduced when the answer is simply responsive, and depends for its meaning upon the unwritten question. It seems to us that, tested by this last rule, the oral statement in this case must be held not a violation *321 of the statute, and no ground for reversal. Many words are used, but after all it amounts to no more than a negative reply to the question asked, if a party could be an accessory. The court replies that "there is no such thing as accessory; the party is principal or nothing." So far as the law is concerned, it was, under the provisions of our statute applicable to this case, correctly given in the written statement made in reply to the question.

In the record as it was presented to us at the time of the argument and submission, it did not appear that any exception was taken to the giving of this oral reply to the question of the foreman. Subsequently the appellant filed a motion to have the record corrected by the insertion of an exception, and filed in support thereof an affidavit of one of his counsel who was present during the trial, stating that exceptions were duly taken, and giving an explanation of the omission of a statement to that effect from the record brought here, which is a copy of the original bill signed and filed in the district court, and also a copy of a certificate of the district judge made and filed in the district court since the submission here. It would seem from this testimony that in the bill, as prepared by counsel, was a statement that exceptions were taken, and that this statement was subsequently erased; but whether before or after it was signed, does not seem clear. If the erasure was subsequent to the signing, it is a mere clerical mistake, which can be corrected; but if it was erased before, and the bill was signed without any such statement, it makes this an application to amend the bill, and presents a question of more difficulty. Counsel, appreciating the difficulty, have filed a supplemental brief, contending that, if no exceptions were taken, the defendant was still entitled to the benefit of any error in this action of the district court; and this, too, we find a question of no easy solution. We do not decide either of these questions; our conclusions being adverse to the appellant upon the action of the court supposing it duly excepted to.

The judgment will be affirmed.

*STATE OF KANSAS v. JOHN W. HARPSTER.

July Term, 1875.

Appeal: From Justices' Courts. No appeal can be taken from the judgment of a justice of the peace directly to this court. Const. art. 8, § 10. All appeals from such judgments, where appeal is allowed by law, must be taken to the district court. [Leavenworth v. Weaver, 26 Kan. 394.]

Appeal from a justice's judgment.

Complaint before a justice of the peace of Doniphan county, on oath of one A. C. J., charging defendant with having, in a certain building in the city of White Cloud, on the first day of June, 1875, sold "spirituous, vinous, fermented, and other intoxicating liquors to one G. S., one O. O., and one T. B. without having at the time a license as grocer, dram-shop keeper, or tavern keeper, obtained in accordance with the provisions" of the dram-shop act. A trial was had before the justice and a jury on the eighth of June, 1875. Verdict, "Not guilty." The defendant was discharged; and thereupon, says the transcript, "It is considered and adjudged by the court that the complaining witness, A. C. J., pay all costs in this prosecution, and stand committed until paid. To which judgment for costs the said A. C. J. excepts, and the state also excepts." The costs were taxed at $62.05. The state prepared a bill of exceptions, which was signed and settled by the justice, and a transcript thereof was brought to this court as upon appeal by the state in criminal actions.

A. L. Brewster and W. D. Webb, for the State.

T. H. Parish and T. M. Keith, for defendant.

BREWER, J. This is an attempted appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace directly to this court. This cannot be done.

The constitution, art. 8, § 10, explicitly declares that "all ap-*323 peals from probate courts and justices of the peace shall be to the district courts." Language could not be plainer. It is not in the power of the legislature to provide for an appeal from a justice of the peace directly to this court. And whatever may be the defects of the statute, or failure, if failure there be, to provide any way for appealing a case of this kind—a complaint for selling liquor without a license—to the district court, or whatever express or implied statutory grant of an appeal to this court, the paramount law forbids us to take cognizance of an appeal from a justice of the peace.

The appeal must be dismissed.

July Term, 1875.

1. Supreme Court: Presumptions in Favor of Judgment. On petition in error to the supreme court, all presumptions must be construed in favor of the correctness of the findings and judgment of the court below. [Lucas v. Sturr, 21 Kan. 482.]
2. Finding, General: When Sufficient. In a case tried before the court without a jury, where the court is not asked to make special findings of fact, or to state the facts in detail, the findings will be considered sufficient if all the necessary facts are stated in the findings, although they may be stated in ever so general or comprehensive terms.
3. Fraud: Contracts and Deeds Procured by, Set Aside. Where two men contrive and conspire to cheat and defraud a weak old man, mentally so weak as to be wholly incapable of managing his own affairs, and where they do by false and fraudulent representations cheat and defraud this old man, and thereby obtain his property for a grossly inadequate consideration, a court of equity may set aside and cancel all contracts or instruments by which these two men hold the old man's property, and may place the parties in the same situation and condition in which they were before the fraudulent transactions occurred.<sup>1</sup>

In an action in the nature of an action at law for damages a joint judgment against both would be proper; but in an action in the nature of a suit in equity, like this, and under the facts of this case, such a judgment is not proper. The judgment should be to wholly set aside the contract, and place the parties in their original condition.

Error from Douglas district court.

At the August term, 1873, Fults, as plaintiff, recovered judgment against Bainter and Barnett, defendants. The trial was by the court, without a jury, and the facts and conclusions found were as follows:

"(1) The plaintiff, Robert Fults, on the twentieth of October, 1871, and for a long time prior thereto, was the owner of 160 acres of land in said Douglas county, described as the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of sec. 35, in township 12, of range 17, of the value of \$3,500, and resided on the same with his family. He was then 69 years of age, illiterate, infirm from age and physical injuries, weak in mind, and incapable of managing his own affairs.

*325 *"(2) The defendant Ephraim Bainter, on the twentieth of October, 1871, and prior thereto, was the owner of a certain lot in the city of Topeka, in Shawnee county, described as the north half of lot No. 30, and all of lots 32, 34, and 36 on Quincy street north, in Crane's addition, on one of which was a dwelling-house, all of the value of $2,500, and said Bainter resided with his family on said premises. The defendant Barnett was an auctioneer and real-estate agent, and resided in Topeka.

"(3) Some time prior to October 20, 1871, Fults met the said Barnett in Topeka, and told him he desired to sell his farm and other lands, and his personal property, and put this money out at interest, but that he would not sell unless he could realize at least $10,000 for all of it, and requested Barnett to undertake the sale of his property at auction. Barnett undertook to do so, to advertise and sell the property, real and personal, for one per cent. on sales, assured Fults that he knew all about the property, and that it was worth more than $10,000, and would bring more than that sum cash down.

"(4) Afterwards, and before the twentieth of said October, said Bainter went to see Fults at the farm of the latter, and, having inquired if that was the farm advertised by Barnett for sale, and being informed that it was, proposed to plaintiff to trade to him for the farm some property in Topeka. Plaintiff replied that such a trade would not suit him, and Bainter went away. A few days afterwards Fults went to Topeka, and Barnett insisted on showing him Bainter's house and lots. Fults told Barnett it would not suit him to trade for city property, but went to see the house, and again said it would not suit him, and Barnett represented the house and lots as worth $35,000, and as desirable property.

"(5) On the nineteenth of October, 1871, Bainter and Barnett went to the farm where Fults lived, and contrived and conspired to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, and obtain his property to their own gain and advantage, well knowing that plaintiff at that time was not capable of managing his own affairs, and by means of false and fraudulent representations induced him to agree to exchange the farm in the first paragraph herein described, and to pay to the said Bainter, in addition, as boot-money, $1,000 in property,—live-stock,—which Bainter was to have the privilege of bidding off at auction while the sale was progressing, and did bid off to the value and amount of $947.

*826 *(6) Three days afterwards Bainter took possession of the farm, and commenced moving his furniture into the house, and Fults removed with his family into the house in Topeka, where he remained a short time, and afterwards removed to a farm in the neighborhood where he had before lived, where he still resides. Bainter still continues to occupy the land mentioned in the petition.

"(7) On the eleventh of November, 1871, under threats of vexatious litigation, (because of the refusal of plaintiff and his wife to make a deed,) deeds were made and exchanged; and, as there was an outstanding mortgage for $1,600 on said farm, Fults was required to execute a mortgage to Bainter for $1,600 on the house and lots to save himself. Fults afterwards paid off the mortgage on the farm, and caused it to be fully satisfied and discharged.

"(8) Some time after the deeds were exchanged, Fults requested Bainter to trade back, and offered him $400 to do so, which offer Bainter refused; Fults then offered him $700, which Bainter also refused; and finally Fults offered him $947, or the amount of the value of the stock bid off by him, and Bainter refused to re-exchange with that difference; but afterwards informed plaintiff that he would "rue," for $500 cash. Fults immediately went to one J. T. S., and made arrangements for getting $500, and so informed Bainter, but on learning from Bainter that his offer was for $500, in addition to the stock, Fults abandoned any further effort.

"(9) Fults gave Bainter the farm and $947 for the town property; but Bainter would not give the farm for the town property, with the privilege of keeping the $947 worth of stock, unless Fults would pay him $500 as the difference in value. Had the plaintiff acceded to the demand, the parties would have been restored to their former lands, and Bainter would have received $1,447 from Fults without giving any consideration therefor in exchange.

"The court therefore finds for the plaintiff, and gives judgment in his favor against the defendants for $947, with interest at seven per cent. per annum from October 20, 1871, and decrees that the conveyances recited are fraudulent and void, and henceforth held for naught, and that reconveyances be made by the parties, respectively, within ninety days, or, in default of such conveyances on the part of defendant Bainter, this decree of the court shall be a sufficient conveyance of the farm to plaintiff, Fults; and in default of a reconveyance by plaintiff, Fults, defendant Bainter to have judgment *327 against *him to the effect that defendant Bainter's title to the lands shall be confirmed. [Then follow a formal judgment and decree, in accordance with the conclusions so found by the court.]"

Wilson Shannon, for plaintiffs in error.

Barker & Summerfield, for defendant in error.

Before a decree or judgment will be reversed by this court, plaintiffs in error must have pointed out some fatal error, inconsistent with justice, and injurious to them, on the face of the record. They have not done this. Nor do they deny that they have committed a gross outrage on the defendant, but endeavor to evade justice by technicalities and quibbles, by stating matters in their argument of which there is not even a hint in the record; such, for instance, as the statement that the defendant in error conveyed the property to his daughter, and is therefore unable to reconvey to Bainter, etc. On this statement counsel for plaintiffs in error spins a long argument, and asks the court to reverse the decree. It is not necessary at this time to either deny the premises, or refute the conclusion drawn therefrom, for neither is properly before the court.

It is claimed that, even if the decree is good against Bainter, it is void against Barnett. Why? Is it because he went with Bainter "to the farm where Fults lived, and conspiring and contriving to cheat and defraud Fults, and obtain his property to their own gain and advantage, well knowing that plaintiff at that time was not capable of managing his own affairs?" He who assists in the perpetration of a wrong is as much guilty as he who actually does the wrong. 2 Hil. Torts, 295, § 9. We hope that the doctrine enunciated in Wilbur v. Hubbard, 35 Barb. 303, "that where two dogs, of different sizes, kill sheep in the dark, the jury have a right to *328 determine, in the absence of direct proof, that the larger dog killed the greater number of sheep," is not law; for it is now well known that the race is not always to the swift, nor victory to the strong. We have always been of the opinion that both Bainter and Barnett "killed the sheep," but counsel says Barnett did not get any of the spoils. If this is true, it only illustrates that the good old times are past and gone. Heretofore it has been conceded that there is honor even among thieves. But, if the court shall determine that there ought to be no judgment against Barnett, it will not on that account vacate the decree, but will simply modify it to that extent.

Counsel complains that the court below did not state what the false and fraudulent representations were. If he is so anxious to have this court know the particulars of this transaction, why did he not bring the evidence here? We should have been very grateful to him if he had brought up the evidence so as to let the court see the particulars of this nefarious business. It is not the duty of a trial court in its findings to state every word that is said by the witness, but simply the conclusion from the whole testimony.

Plaintiffs in error claim that the facts do not justify a decree against Bainter. One can hardly imagine a stronger case of fraud. Here are two men, apparently shrewd and crafty. They come in contact with a man suffering from senile imbecility. By means well known to such characters, they obtain from him a farm worth $3,500, and personal property of the value of about $1,000. And what do they give Fults, who has scarcely the intelligence of a child, and with whom they should have dealt as fairly as with an infant, for all this? Property of the value of $2,500. The inadequacy of the consideration, so gross as it is in this case, is alone ground for canceling the transaction. Kerr, Frauds & M. 188, 189. But when we add to this the physical and mental condition of defendant in error, is there any room for doubt left as to what a court of equity should do when such facts are brought before it?

*329 *VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought by Robert Fults against Ephraim Bainter and George Barnett, for the purpose of rescinding, setting aside, and canceling, on the ground of fraud, a certain executed contract, with certain deeds of conveyance, and other matters incidental thereto, whereby Fults exchanged some real estate and personal property belonging to him for some real estate belonging to Bainter. The principal questions discussed by plaintiffs in error are so obscurely and insufficiently presented by the record brought to this court that we think we can hardly consider them at all. The court below finds that the plaintiff below was, at the time the alleged fraudulent transaction occurred, "sixty-nine years of age, illiterate, infirm from age and physical injuries, weak in mind, and incapable of managing his own affairs." Now, how weak in mind was the plaintiff? Was he weak to idiocy, or only slightly weak? We cannot tell from the record. He was "incapable of managing his own affairs;" but whether from age, illiteracy, physical infirmity, or mental imbecility, or all, we cannot tell. None of the evidence has been brought to this court, and nothing else shows it. Hence we are left to conjectures and presumptions only. Now, as all presumptions must be construed in favor of the correctness of the findings and judgment of the court below, we must presume, in support of such judgment, that the plaintiff was extremely weak in intellect,—mentally so weak as to be "incapable of managing his own affairs,"—weak even to the very verge of idiocy; for mental weakness would best excuse him. The court below further finds that "on the nineteenth of October, 1871, Bainter and Barnett went to the farm where Fults lived, and contrived and conspired to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, and obtain his property to their own gain and advantage, well knowing that plaintiff, at that time, was not capable of managing his own affairs; and by means of false and fraudulent representations induced him to agree to exchange the farm in the first paragraph herein described, [Fults' farm,] and to pay to the said Bainter, in *330 *addition, as boot-money, $1,000 in property,—live stock,—which Bainter was to have the privilege of bidding off at auction while the sale was progressing, and did bid off to the value and amount of $947. On the eleventh of November, 1871, under threats of vexatious litigation, (because of the refusal of plaintiff and his wife to make a deed,) deeds were made and exchanged," etc.,—Fults gave a deed for his farm to Bainter, and Bainter gave a deed for his property to Fults.

Now, how did the defendants "contrive and conspire to cheat and defraud the plaintiff?" And what were the "false and fraudulent representations" which they used to effect their purpose? We cannot tell from the record of the case; but, in order to sustain the judgment of the court below, we must presume that they were such as would authorize the rescinding of the whole transaction. The counsel for plaintiffs in error claims that all these matters should have been set out in the findings of the court, in elaborate detail. He claims that the supposed false and fraudulent representations should have been set out in the findings, so that we could see whether in fact and in law they were such as would authorize the rescinding of the contract. But the defendants below did not ask the court to set out these matters in its findings. They did not ask the court to make special findings on any subject. Neither they nor the plaintiff ask the court to make any findings of any kind. It is therefore the misfortune of the plaintiffs in error, and not of the defendant in error, that the findings do not state the facts in more elaborate detail. It devolves upon the plaintiffs in error to show error, and not upon the defendant in error to show that there was no error. Under the circumstances of this case we think all the necessary facts in this respect are stated in the findings, although stated in very general and comprehensive terms, and therefore we think the findings in this respect are sufficient. Therefore, up to this point, we cannot say that the court below committed any error.

*331 We think that where two men "contrive and conspire to *cheat and defraud" a weak old man, mentally so weak as to be wholly "incapable of managing his own affairs," and by "false and fraudulent representations" do cheat and defraud him, and thereby obtain his property for a grossly inadequate consideration, a court of equity may set aside and cancel all contracts or instruments by which these two men hold the old man's property, and may place the parties in the same situation and condition in which they were before the fraudulent transactions occurred. The irrelevant findings complained of by plaintiffs in error cannot prejudice their substantial rights, and therefore are not sufficient grounds upon which to assign error.

Barnett does not seem from the record to have got any of the plaintiff's property. He made nothing out of the transaction, and is not a party to either of the deeds. Therefore the judgment rendered against him is erroneous. If the action had been one in the nature of an action at law for damages, instead of one in the nature of a suit in equity to set aside the contract and deeds, etc., and to place the parties in their original situation, it would have been different. If the plaintiff had sued for damages, he could have recovered damages against both Barnett and Bainter.

Under the facts of this case we are inclined to think that the plaintiff had the right to elect to consider the personal property transferred from himself to Bainter either as the specific articles transferred, or as the $947 in money for which such articles were taken. Hence there was no error in rendering judgment against Bainter for that amount of money, with interest. No question is made that the articles were not worth the money, and they were taken in lieu of the money.

As this was an action to rescind the contracts made between the parties, and to place them in their original situation and condition, it was error for the court below to so render the judgment that the plaintiff could, if he should choose, retain all the property that the amount of personal property which Bainter received from the plaintiff. Bainter was called into court to have the question determined whether the transaction between himself and Fults should be set aside, and each take the property he originally had. Bainter may have cared but little if such should be done; he may have been willing for Fults to make his own showing in such a case; he may have cared but little if the court should render a judgment, in substance, that the parties should "trade back;" he may have cared but little for a jury trial in such a case as this, and in this kind of action he would not be entitled to a jury trial; and therefore he may have contested this action but slightly; while, if he had known that the judgment was finally to be rendered as one substantially for damages, he may have cared a great deal. In such a case he might have desired to have a jury trial; and, if the action had been one for damages, he would have been entitled to a jury trial. He may have considered the property he gave worth as much as the property he received, and therefore might have been willing for a re-exchange of the property, but not willing that a judgment for a large amount of damages should be rendered against him. Now, a plaintiff who prosecutes an action for relief on the ground of fraud should not prosecute one kind of action up to the very last moment, and then, without notice or warning to the other party, take a judgment as though his action was a different kind of action. The plaintiff in his petition states, among other things, as follows: "This plaintiff further shows that he has always been, since the discovery by him that the representations so made as aforesaid by said defendants were falsely and fraudulently made, willing to reconvey to said defendants all the right, interest, and everything whatsoever conveyed by said defendants to this plaintiff, upon reconveyance to him of the real estate and personal property hereinbefore mentioned, and now here offers so to do."

This was a standing offer of the plaintiff up to the time of the *338 rendition of the judgment, and the judgment ought *not to relieve the plaintiff from fulfilling this offer. Nothing less than the fulfillment of said offer would be right or equitable in a case of this kind.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed as to Barnett; and it will be modified, as to Bainter, as follows: Bainter shall, within some reasonable time, to be fixed by the court below, pay to said Fults said $947, and interest, and shall convey to Fults, by a good and sufficient deed, all the said real estate heretofore conveyed by Fults to Bainter; but upon this condition only: that Fults shall first convey to Bainter, by a good and sufficient deed, all the said real estate conveyed by Bainter to Fults. In all other respects the judgment of the court below will be affirmed. This case will be remanded to the court below for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

F. M. DAVIS v. CYRUS A. FILLMORE. (Two Cases.)

July Term, 1875.

Supreme Court: Failure to Furnish Brief: Affirm Judgment. Whenever counsel for plaintiff in error fail to furnish the judges of the supreme court with a brief in the case, the court will, as a rule, affirm the judgment below, without any consideration of the errors assigned.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Osage district court.

Two actions were brought by Davis against Fillmore. Both were tried at the November term, 1873, and in each action judgment was given for the defendant. Plaintiff brings both here; the petitions in error being filed March 7, 1874.

Sheldon & Thompson, S. M. Berry, and J. B. Clark, for plaintiff.
Ellis Lewis, for defendant.

*334 *VALENTINE, J. The only question which we shall decide in either of these two cases is the same in both, and hence we shall consider the two cases together. The first case was an action of replevin brought by Davis against Fillmore for a portable sawmill. The defendant had purchased the mill from the plaintiff, and was then the owner of the same, but he had also given a mortgage thereon to secure the payment of five certain promissory notes, given by himself to the plaintiff, each for $500, due respectively in three, six, twelve, eighteen, and twenty-four months from date. There was a stipulation in the mortgage that the defendant should hold possession of the mill until the condition of the mortgage was broken. The only question, therefore, to be tried in the court below was whether said condition had been broken or not. The other case was an action for money founded upon transactions connected with said portable saw-mill. Each case was tried before a jury, and in each case the verdict was for the defendant. In the second case the defendant recovered $264.73. Judgments were properly rendered on the verdicts, and then the plaintiff brought both cases to this court on petition in error. Both cases came on regularly for hearing in the supreme court; both were regularly called by the court; and both were submitted to the court by the defendant on his briefs. But the plaintiff made no appearance in either case, nor has he made any appearance in either case, by brief or otherwise, at any time since he filed the cases in this court. We must therefore presume that he has waived and abandoned all his assignments of error as untenable, (Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. *176, *186; Howard v. Cobb, 6 Ind. 5; Robinson v. Tipton, 31 Ala. 595;) and probably they are all untenable. We will give some specimens of them. In the replevin case, the first assignment of error is "that the said court erred in the instructions given to the jury on the trial of said action." Now, we do not think that the court below committed any substantial error in giving *335 *instructions to the jury; but must we look through a long list of instructions to hunt error, with nothing more to guide us than the above assignment of error? The second assignment is "that the said court erred in refusing to give the instructions to the jury which the said Davis prayed the said court to give." Now, we cannot find in the record that "the said Davis prayed the said court to give" any instructions, or that he excepted to any refused. Third, "that the facts set forth in the answer of said defendant are not sufficient in law to constitute any defense." The answer was a general denial, and such an answer we think is good in replevin. Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. *177, *190, et seq.; Gilchrist v. Schmidling, 12 Kan. *269. Fourth, "that the said court erred in overruling the demurrer of the said plaintiff to the answer of said defendant." Now, we cannot find from the record that the plaintiff demurred to the answer of the defendant; but, even if he did, we suppose a demurrer to a general denial in replevin should be overruled. Fifth, "that said court erred in admitting the evidence of said Fillmore, to which said Davis objected." We think the evidence was competent and proper. But is it our duty, with nothing more than this assignment to guide us, to look through a vast amount of evidence to see whether it is proper evidence or not under the pleadings and previous evidence? Sixth, "that said court erred in ruling out the evidence offered by said Davis on the trial of said action." Now, there was substantially no evidence offered by Davis and excluded by the court. The court at one time, rightfully as we think, refused to let Davis prove what Davis himself at a former time had said; but no exception was taken to this ruling, and we think that Davis afterwards proved this same conversation. We can find no other evidence offered by Davis, and excluded by the court. Seventh, "that the said court erred in overruling the motion of the said Davis for a new trial of said cause." We have failed to discover the error. Eighth, "that said judgment was given for said Fillmore when it should have been given for said Davis, according to the law of the land." We think the *336 *judgment is correct. Ninth, "that the verdict of the jury was rendered in favor of the said Fillmore, when it should have been, according to the evidence, in favor of said Davis." We think the verdict was right; but, even if not, still there was ample evidence to sustain it. These are all the assignments of error in the replevin case, and these are fair samples of the errors complained of in the other case.

If we should examine the two cases thoroughly and critically, we would probably be unable to find any such substantial errors as would authorize a reversal of the judgments. But we do not choose to make any such thorough and critical examination, but choose rather to decide the cases solely upon the ground that the plaintiff has abandoned the supposed errors since filing his cases in this court. Business is accumulating so rapidly in this court that we need all the aid and assistance we can get from counsel. So henceforth, as a rule, whenever the plaintiff's counsel shall fail to furnish us with a brief, we shall affirm the judgment without any consideration of the errors assigned. Hutchinson v. Bain, 11 Kan. *234; Davis v. First Nat. Bank, 28 Ind. 240; and cases above cited. We decide these two cases upon this principle.

The judgments of the court below in these two cases must be affirmed.

JONATHAN DOUGLAS v. RICHARD McFADIN.

July Term, 1875.

Contract: Breach of: Withholding Knowledge of Loathsome Disease, when a Defense. D. leased to M. for one year all the arable land on the farm on which D. then resided. D., on his part, was to furnish everything, and board M. for the year at his house. M., on his part was to perform all the labor in raising the crops on said land. D. was then to have two-thirds of each crop raised on said land, and M. one-third thereof. At the time said lease was entered into, and subsequently *337 thereto, M. was "infected with a loathsome, *contagious, and infectious disease, called syphilis," which disease afterwards, and at the time M. boarded at the house of D., endangered the lives and health of D. and his family, and of which disease D. was, at the time he entered into said lease, ignorant. In ten days after the lease was entered into, and when D. became aware of said disease, he refused to board M. any longer at his house. M. then left the premises, and sued D. for damages, claiming (at least on the trial) as damages the value of the use of said land for one year, and the value of his board for one year. D., as a defense to said action, offered to show (both by his pleadings and evidence) that M. was affected with said disease; that he (D.) was ignorant of the same at the time he entered into said lease; and that he refused to board M. at his house because of said disease, but the court excluded said defense. Held, that it was error to exclude such defense, and the evidence offered to support it.

Error from Jackson district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Charles Hayden, for plaintiff.

VALENTINE, J. This action was brought originally in a justice's court by McFadin against Douglas for $300 damages alleged to have resulted from the breach of certain stipulations in a lease. It appears from the record that on August 26, 1873, defendant, Douglas, by a parol contract, leased to plaintiff, McFadin, for the term of one year, the farm upon which Douglas resided, upon the following terms, to-wit: Douglas was to furnish everything, and board McFadin at his house. McFadin was to do all the work. Douglas was to have two-thirds of each crop raised on the premises, and McFadin one-third. On September 4th and 5th, Douglas told McFadin that he could not board him any longer at his house, and wanted McFadin to give up the lease, or allow some other man to fill his place. *338 McFadin did not *agree to this; but still, on September 5th, he left Douglas' house. Three days later, on September 8th, he commenced this action, and alleged, among other things, that Douglas refused to board him, or to allow him to work on said premises. On the 16th the case was tried before a justice and a jury. The defendant filed a bill of particulars, denying generally the allegations of the plaintiff's bill of particulars, and also setting up as a defense to the plaintiff's action that at the time said lease was entered into, and subsequently thereto, the plaintiff was "infected with a loathsome, contagious, and infectious disease, to-wit, syphilis, which disease afterwards, and at the time the plaintiff boarded at the defendant's house, endangered the lives and health of defendant and his family," etc., and that at the time the lease was entered into the defendant was ignorant of said disease, and that because of such disease the defendant refused to allow the plaintiff to longer board at his house. This defense was stricken out by the court, on motion of the plaintiff. On the trial the defendant tried in various ways to introduce evidence to prove these matters, but the court, in every instance, on the objection of the plaintiff, excluded the evidence; and finally, at the close of the trial, the court instructed the jury "that in making up their verdict they are not to take into consideration any disease that the plaintiff may have been afflicted with, to which allusion has been made during the trial." Exceptions were duly taken by the defendant to these rulings, and to all the other rulings of the justice adverse to him.

We think the justice erred in these rulings. The defendant was not bound to board the plaintiff at his house while the plaintiff was affected with said disease, although the defendant had previously agreed to board the plaintiff. The plaintiff practiced a fraud upon the defendant when he procured from the defendant such an agreement without first disclosing to the defendant his own condition as to health. The plaintiff testified on the trial, among other things, as follows: "Defendant was to furnish team and seed and farming utensils, and board me at his house." The *339 defendant testified on the trial, among other things, as follows: "I also agreed to board him [the plaintiff] at my house." It was evidently the intention of the parties, at the time of making the contract, that the defendant should have the benefit of boarding the plaintiff at his own house; but, even if it was not, still the defendant could not have hired the plaintiff's board at some other house for the same price that he could have hired the board of a person in good health, and free from said infectious and loathsome disease, and therefore the plaintiff had no right, while so diseased, to demand his board from the defendant under any circumstances. Plaintiff further testified: "Defendant said he did not want me to go on with work, and that he could not board me at his house any longer. Defendant never put me off the premises. He has never refused to let me work the farm." The defendant further testified: "I never turned him [the plaintiff] off the place, or refused to let him work it; but I did not want him to board or lodge at my house while he had the disease." It was also shown by the evidence that the defendant offered to furnish a man for the plaintiff, while the plaintiff was diseased, for sixteen dollars per month, and that the defendant would pay the man, and take the amount out of the plaintiff's share of the crops, but the plaintiff refused, and said he was not able to hire a man. It was also shown that the defendant offered to pay the plaintiff for what he had done on the premises, provided the plaintiff would give up the lease, but the plaintiff refused. And then, as we have before stated, the defendant refused to board the plaintiff any longer at his house, and the plaintiff left the premises, and then commenced this action.

During the trial, the plaintiff, for the purpose of showing his damages, proved that there were seventy-two acres of arable land on the premises; that the annual rental value thereof was from $2.50 to $3 per acre; and that board at a farm-house was worth three dollars per week. The plaintiff's loss was in fact his board for one year, *340 and one third of the crops raised on said 72 acres of *land; or, in other words, one-third of the use of said 72 acres for one year. But he gained the labor that he would have had to bestow on said land. Now, in our opinion, from the evidence, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything. He was not entitled to recover for the use of the land, or for one-third of the crops, for the reason that the defendant never refused to let him cultivate the land; and he was not entitled to recover for board, for the plaintiff had a reasonable and legal excuse, under the circumstances, for refusing to board him any longer; or, in other words, the defense the defendant set up and offered to prove was a good one, and the justice erred in excluding it. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $30. How much of this verdict was for board, and how much of it was for the use of the land, we do not know, and cannot tell. It may have all been for board; it may have been the value of the board for a year, with something deducted for the value of the plaintiff's labor; or it may have been for the sum of the board and the plaintiff's share of the crops, with the value of his labor deducted. After the verdict was rendered the defendant moved for a new trial for various reasons. The justice overruled the motion, and then, on said sixteenth of September, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $30 and costs. The defendant then took the case to the district court on petition in error. The district court affirmed the judgment of the justice. In this we think the district court erred, for the reasons already given. After said judgment was affirmed in the district court, the defendant, Douglas, brought the case to this court on petition in error. There has been no appearance in this court on the part of the plaintiff, McFadin, and hence we can only conjecture as to the grounds on which he may rely to sustain his judgment in the justice's court.

As both the justice of the peace and the district court, in our opinion, erred, the judgment of the district court must be reversed, *341 and cause remanded, with the order that the *judgment of the justice of the peace be reversed, and for such further proceedings as may be proper in the case.

N. D. EASTMAN v. S. S. GODFREY.

July Term, 1875.

Costs: Security for, in Justices' Courts: Discretion of Court. In an action pending in a justice's court, the justice required the plaintiff, who was a resident of the county, to give security for costs. Afterwards judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and the defendant appealed to the district court. The district court ordered that the plaintiff give additional security for costs. The plaintiff failed to do so, and the court refused to dismiss the plaintiff's action because thereof. Afterwards the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant for debt, in a sum certain, and costs of suit. Held, that the court below, in refusing to dismiss the plaintiff's action, did not commit such a material error, affecting the substantial rights of the defendant, as requires a reversal of the judgment.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Saline district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

John Foster, for plaintiff in error.

J. G. Mohler and T. F. Garver, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. The plaintiff in error (who was defendant below) states his case in this court as follows: "This action was commenced before a justice of the peace, who, on the twentieth of February, 1873, required the defendant in error (plaintiff below, and a resident of the county where said action was commenced) to give security for costs. The action was appealed to the district court. At *342 the October term, 1873, of *the district court, and before judgment, plaintiff in error (defendant below) made a motion to require said defendant in error to give additional security for costs. The court found the security insufficient, and required said defendant in error to give additional security within sixty days. At the next term of the court, defendant in error having failed to give said security for costs, plaintiff in error made a motion to dismiss the action, which was overruled by the court, and excepted to by plaintiff in error. A verdict and judgment was obtained against plaintiff in error, to which he excepted, and now brings the action to the supreme court to reverse said judgment, and dismiss said action." This statement is substantially correct. And does it appear therefrom affirmatively, that the court below committed an error which affects materially the substantial rights of the plaintiff in error? It is only substantial error that will authorize the reversal of a judgment, (Code, <sup>1</sup> Sufficiency of notice to sureties on costs-bond, see Sanford v. Frankhouser, 24 Kan. 98; summons set aside where an attorney at law was the only surety on a costs-bond, Cook v. Caraway, 29 Kan. 41; an erroneous ruling of the trial court on a motion to quash the summons, because an attorney at law was the only surety on the costs-bond, cannot be reviewed while the case is still pending in the district court, Potter v. Payne, 31 Kan. 218; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 617.

§§ 140, 304;) and such error must be made to affirmatively appear. Now, supposing that section 186 of the justices' act, as amended in 1870, (Laws 1870, p. 187, § 15,) gives authority to justices of the peace to require security for costs from resident plaintiffs, still such authority is unquestionably vested in the discretion of the justice, as will readily appear from a careful perusal of the section. As to non-resident plaintiffs, the justice "shall" require security for costs; "but in all other cases the justice may" require such security. Why use the word "shall" for non-residents, and "may" for others, if it was not intended that the justice should exercise his discretion in the latter case? And if this authority of the justice is carried to the district court, on an appeal, by section 584 of the Code, (Gen. St. 746,) or by any other statute, then the authority of the district court is also discretionary; and, of course, if the court has a discretion as to whether it will require security for costs, it must also have the same discretion as to whether it will enforce the plaintiff to give security by dismissing his action if he does not do so; that is, the court may exercise a discretion as to whether it will require security for costs to be given, and, if it requires it, *may then exercise a discretion as to whether it will dismiss the plaintiff's action if security for costs is not given. And, where the court below is vested with a discretionary authority, we can reverse only where the court has abused its discretion.

In this case it does not affirmatively appear that the court below did abuse its discretion. At the October term, 1873, the court required additional security for costs to be given. At the March term, 1874, it refused to dismiss the action because security for costs had not been given. At that time the plaintiff had already recovered one judgment in the case, which had been set aside by the appeal; and a trial had also been had in the district court, in which the court had heard all the evidence, and at which the jury failed to agree; and, after hearing this evidence, the court may have had the strongest convictions that the plaintiff ought to recover, and, if so, the court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to dismiss the plaintiff's action merely because he failed to give additional security for costs. Afterwards the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant for $4.60 and costs of suit. Hence no substantial right of the defendant was affected by the plaintiff failing to give additional security for costs. The defendant has lost nothing. He is to pay the costs, and not the plaintiff. But suppose the court erred either in not setting aside its order requiring the plaintiff to give additional security for costs, or in not dismissing the plaintiff's action, still the defendant has no right to complain. The means by which a court enforces its own orders belong rather to the court than to the parties. The parties can only claim to use such means for the purpose of enforcing substantial rights in their own favor; and where a party has no substantial right to be enforced, as in this case, such party cannot complain of the court for failing to enforce its own orders, however erroneous the action of the court may be in the premises.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

*JUSTIS F. DRESSER v. JOHN W. WOOD.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Service of Summons: What and How Made. The service of a summons is sufficient if it "be by delivering a copy of the summons to the defendant personally;" and the copy summons is sufficient if said copy contain everything put in the summons or on it by the clerk. It is not necessary in such a case that the copy should be certified, or that it should contain any indorsement put on the summons by the sheriff.
2. ———: Second or Subsequent Service. Where service of summons is made on the defendant, and afterwards the plaintiff procures a second service to be made, the procuring of this second service is not so far an invalidation or waiver of the first service as to allow parties or third persons to treat it as a nullity.
3. ———: Finding as to Service. Where an action is commenced against five persons, including W., and service is made on W. both personally and by publication, and the court, in rendering judgment, finds that personal service was made on two of the defendants, and service by publication on the other three, including W., and does not even mention the personal service made on W., held, that such finding is not an adjudication that personal service was not made on W., and such finding does not invalidate the said personal service made on W., and especially it does not where the court had previously, in effect, on a motion to set aside such personal service, declared that it was valid.

Error from Jefferson district court.

Two mortgages on the same tract of land lying in Jefferson county were executed by John Branscom and wife, the owners,—one to John W. Wood, for \$2,750, dated October 11, 1867; the other to Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, copartners, for \$4,348, dated October 31, 1871. In the mortgage to Wood the land was described as the "S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 12, township 11, of range 17," etc. In the mortgage to Warner, Mowry & Hawkins it was described as the "S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of survey 12, of the lands known as the 'Kaw Half-breed Indian Lands,'" etc. On Nov. 4, 1871, an action was commenced for Wood, and in his name, to reform his mortgage, in which action the mortgagors, and said W., M. & H., the second mortgagees, were made defendants. Twenty-three days afterwards, November 27th, said W., M. & H. assigned their mortgage to Dresser. Judgment in the action above mentioned, reforming the mortgage to Wood, was given and entered May 24, 1873. Said decree contains the following: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said mortgage deed be held to be a prior lien to the mortgage deed mentioned in plaintiff's petition from John Branscom and Martha A. Branscom to the defendants Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, which mortgage was recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for said county of Jefferson on the fourth day of November, 1871; and that said mortgage deed lien whatever, of every kind and description, of the said defendants Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, or either of them."

<sup>1</sup>DOCTRINE OF LIS PENDENS DISCUSSED. The doctrine of lis pendens also requires that all persons, whether parties to the suit or not, shall take notice, to some extent, of judicial proceedings. The doctrine, however, applies only in cases where the suit is about some specific piece of property, and then only to the extent of preventing a purchaser pendente lite from acquiring any interest in the thing in litigation, to the prejudice of the adverse party; and in no case is a person, not a party to the suit, bound to take notice of judicial proceedings further than to prevent him from acquiring an interest in the thing covered by the litigation. Per VALENTINE, J. Marshall v. Shepard, 28 Kan. 321.

Dresser, on the thirtieth of September, 1872, brought his action to foreclose said mortgage given to said W., M. & H., and by them assigned to him. He made the mortgagors and Wood defendants. Wood answered, alleging the prior mortgage to himself, the mistake, the action to reform, and decree reforming the same, (attaching to his answer said mortgage, and a transcript of the record, as exhibits.) His answer also contained these averments: "That all the time prior to and at the time of rendition of said judgment and decree, said Warner, Mowry & Hawkins were the owners and holders of said note and mortgage mentioned in plaintiff's [Dresser's] petition, and still are the real owners and holders of said note and mortgage; and the plaintiff herein has not now, and never has had, any title or interest in or to the same. The plaintiff herein has, all the time since the date of the note and mortgage mentioned in plaintiff's petition, had actual notice of all the matters and things stated in this answer." Dresser replied, a general denial. The action was tried at the November term, 1873, of the district court, without a jury; A. L. W., judge pro tem., presiding. The real controversy was between Dresser and Wood as to the priority of their mortgage liens, and the question was whether Dresser was an innocent purchaser and assignee for value, and without notice, of the W., M. & H. mortgage, or whether he took said mortgage with such notice, actual or constructive, as subjected him to all the equities existing between Wood and said W., M. & H. at the time of his purchase. The district court found in favor of Wood on this question; and, finding that there was due defendant Wood, on his mortgage and notes, the sum of $4,408, and that there was due to plaintiff, Dresser, on his mortgage and notes, the sum of $4,813, decided "that the amount so found due to defendant *347 Wood is a first lien on said *premises, and is prior to any lien of said plaintiff thereon," and rendered a decree accordingly.

Riggs, Nevison & Simpson and Charles Dunham, for plaintiff.

No oral evidence was given on the trial in the court below. This court therefore examines the case as though it were an original one, and the presumption that the decision of the subordinate court is correct will not be indulged. Green v. Goble, 7 Kan. *297, *316; Ulrich v. Ulrich, 8 Ind. 403; State v. Kinneman, 39 Ind. 38; Moore v. Pye, 10 Kan. *250.

The evidence clearly shows that Dresser was an innocent purchaser for full value. Upon this point there is no contradictory evidence. Nor was Dresser affected by constructive notice arising from the registry of the Wood mortgage, for that mortgage could more properly be referred to another parcel of land than the one in dispute. The court will take judicial notice of the boundaries of counties, and of the government surveys, and of the fact that the land described in the original mortgage to Wood (the south-west quarter of section 12, township 11, range 17) is situate in Jefferson county. The Wood mortgage, therefore, properly described another parcel than the one in dispute, and situate in another portion of the township. It does not correctly describe the land in controversy; nor would any one suspect that it covered the land embraced in the Dresser mortgage. It should be remembered that Wood was negligent and dilatory in the prosecution of his suit to reform. More than sixty days elapsed, after the filing of his petition, before service was commenced by publication. Whatever might have been his equitable claim to the consideration of the court had he shown due diligence has been forfeited by his negligence. He was negligent in taking a mortgage containing a misdescription, and he was negligent in not proceeding to obtain service by publication immediately after the commencement of his action, and is not entitled to relief. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 146, 147.

*348 Defendant in error insists that, even if Dresser were ignorant of the existence of the Wood mortgage, he is yet bound by the judgment rendered in the action entitled "Wood v. Warner et al." That this position is untenable will appear from the following considerations: Wood, in his answer in the present action, does not allege that the suit of Wood v. Warner et al. was pending at the time when Dresser claimed to have bought the mortgage from W., M. & H., nor does he state when that action was commenced. The issue whether Dresser purchased pending the Wood suit was not presented by the pleadings. It is true, evidence was given by both parties to determine whether the Wood judgment was rendered pursuant to a valid service, but no evidence was offered to show that a suit was pending when Dresser bought, because the pleadings did not contain any such allegation. It is true, some evidence was given which might have related to that issue had such an issue been presented by the pleadings. But, as the pleadings stand, that evidence must all be referred to the issue before the court, viz., was the judgment in favor of Wood against W., M. & H. and the Branscoms grounded on a sufficient service? It is too late to invent a new issue to which to refer this evidence. We could not object to the evidence in the court below, for it was properly given to support the Wood judgment, of which judgment Wood in his answer alleges that Dresser had actual knowledge. Had it been offered for the purpose of proving a lis pendens, we could have properly objected to it, for the existence of a lis pendens was not alleged in the pleadings in the case.

Even admitting that the issue of lis pendens had been presented and tried in the court below, (which was manifestly not the case,) we insist that no evidence was given that shows that, at the time Dresser purchased the mortgage in dispute, any action was pending affecting said mortgage, or the rights of Dresser under the same. The service upon Warner was void, as the copy served by the special deputy was not a complete copy. The indorsement on a writ is part of the writ. When a suit is brought to recover money only, it has always been held that the amount to be recovered must be indorsed *on the copy, as well as on the original summons. A service of a copy without such indorsement would be no service. By parity of reasoning, the authority of the special deputy, being required to be indorsed on the summons, should also appear upon the copy. Whatever the law requires to be written upon the summons is a part of the summons. The special deputy has the same right to omit one indorsement as another. 3 Chit. Pr. 266. The defendant is supposed to know the sheriff and his general deputy. Their authority appears of record in the proper office. But no record seems to acquaint the defendant with the nature of the special deputy's authority. The authority does not appear upon the copy. That copy does not even apprise him that the person who delivered it claimed to be a special deputy. He may have been a mere volunteer.

The paper served did not even purport to be a copy. The well-known custom in serving writs is for the officer who holds the original summons to certify on the copy delivered to the defendant that the same is a true copy. This custom we believe to be universal, and we claim that the legislature must have had this universal custom in view when it enacted that the sheriff should furnish the defendant with a copy of the writ. Indeed, a universal custom is itself law, and does not become more obligatory from being incorporated into a statute. It does not comport with the dignity of courts of record that its processes, as served, should be unauthenticated, and have no voucher for their genuineness. In the present case the copy was uncertified. It is true, after the return-day has passed, the defendant, by making a trip to the county-seat, and examining the records of the court, may ascertain whether the ambiguous transaction was a farce or a reality; but we do not believe it is the intention of the law that he should be subjected to this hardship and delay. Processes of courts should prove themselves. The same is true of copies of such processes, designed to subject citizens to the jurisdiction and judgment of courts.

The seal of the court and the signature of the clerk is a sufficient *authentication of the original writ. Nothing less than the signature of the sheriff can authenticate the copy. A copy made by a person other than the lawful custodian of the original might be a correct transcript indeed, but it would not give the court jurisdiction, nor authorize the taking a default against a defendant. To have such an effect the process must have been served by a person known to the defendant to be an officer of the court, and must have been certified by such officer to be a true copy. To hold otherwise would be to establish a dangerous precedent. Whenever the law requires a written notice to be given, it has always been held that the person required to give the notice should sign the same. It is not a notice in writing, unless signed. A summons is a command of the court, addressed to the sheriff. The copy of the summons delivered to the defendant is a notice given by the sheriff, and should be signed by the sheriff. It is an oral notice from the sheriff, and not a written one, until certified by him. Suppose such a transcript of a summons, uncertified, and wanting the indorsement of the sheriff's authority to his special deputy, should be left at a defendant's residence, by a person other than the sheriff or his general deputy: would it be claimed for a moment that a default could be entered without further service?

Warner, Hawkins & Mowry were joint mortgagees. Their estate was a joint one. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 576; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 136. In actions affecting this joint estate they were all necessary parties, and must have sued and been sued together, (1 Washb. 557; 2 Hil. Mortg. 140; Shirkey v. Hanna, 3 Blackf. 403; 4 Kent, Comm. 407;) and a judgment against several joint defendants is considered a nullity when it appears that one of them was never served with process,—Freem. Judgm. § 136; Holbrook v. Murray, 5 Wend. 161; Duffum v. Ramsdell, 55 Me. 252; Powell, App. Proc. 285; Lapham v. Austin, 6 Pick. 246; Nash, Pl. & Pr. 675, (4th Ed.) It is claimed that Dresser acquired his title pendente lite, and that he is therefore bound by the decree in the action entitled Wood v. Warner, in *351 which it was sought to settle the *priorities between the Dresser mortgage and the Wood mortgage. But it will be noticed that the judgment in said action was given pursuant to a publication summons, which was commenced more than sixty days after the filing of the petition. We are content that Dresser should be bound by any judgment which the court could have rendered pursuant to any service made or attempted, or any publication commenced within sixty days from the filing of the petition. No judgment could have been rendered affecting the joint estates of Mowry, Hawkins & Warner, because there was an actual service of process on none of them, and even the pretended service was made on but one. According to the authorities already quoted the judgment rendered pursuant to such a service must have been a nullity. If a judgment had been rendered against Warner alone, it would have been void, not merely because the attempted service was void, but because a joint estate could not be affected by a several judgment against one of the joint tenants. If the judgment had been against the three joint tenants, it would have been void, because no service of process had been ever attempted on two of the joint tenants.

Our Code, § 81, provides that notice of lis pendens shall date from the filing of the petition only where the summons is served, or the first publication made, within sixty days after the filing of such petition. In the case of Wood v. Warner et al. the service had been made upon the Branscoms, and an attempt had been made to serve Warner, but it was not sufficient to affect the joint mortgage estate of W., M. & H. That estate Dresser had a right to purchase, for it was unaffected by anything done, or attempted to be done, in the district court at the time of the purchase by Dresser, or within sixty days from the filing of the petition. No service had been made or commenced upon which a decree could be rendered that should affect the joint mortgage estate. Section 20 of the Code provides that for the purposes of the statute of limitations an action shall be deemed *352 commenced, as *to defendants jointly interested, as soon as service is had upon one. This provision being expressly limited to statutes of limitation, it follows that the converse is true when the question is one of lis pendens, and that the writ is not pending as to any defendant unless service on such defendant is made or commenced within sixty days from the filing of the petition.

The attempted service on Warner was clearly waived by Wood when he made affidavit that service could not be made on Warner in this state, and proceeded to serve by publication. Warner clearly had until the answer-day mentioned in the publication notice in which to answer Wood's petition. It follows that Wood waived his rights, such as they were, under the attempted personal service on Warner. If there were any dispute about this, there is the final adjudication of the court that the judgment in Wood's favor against Warner, Mowry & Hawkins was rendered pursuant to the publication notice. This adjudication is binding, and cannot be questioned until set aside by the proper tribunal. Certainly a party counting on a judgment cannot be allowed to controvert one of the points decided in the action, nor to deny one of the findings contained in the judgment. We have not overlooked the fact that the motion made by Warner to quash the summons, and set aside the return of service, was overruled. The action of the court in this matter was clearly proper, for there was no ground for quashing the summons, the said summons being regular, and the motion was not divisible. But when the court afterwards rendered judgment in the case it passed upon the question of service, and found that the personal service was had on the Branscoms, and that service by publication was made upon W., M. & H., which service the court approved. This is a distinct adjudication that the attempted personal service on Warner was void.

The Wood suit was commenced at the instance of Branscom. It was not properly a suit until Wood consented that it should be *353 brought. Wood, who resides in Missouri, *gave that consent "some days" after the commencement of the action. But it is not proved to have been given before the date of Dresser's purchase, and, there being no testimony on that point, there is no evidence nor presumption that the assent was given before the Dresser purchase.

Personal service of summons in the case of Wood v. Branscom et al. was duly made upon Warner on the fourth of November. It was served by a duly-authorized special deputy-sheriff, and the copy delivered to Warner was a true copy of the summons issued by the clerk.

The indorsement thereon by the sheriff of the appointment of Newhouse to serve it was no part of the summons. Whatever the clerk puts in it, or indorses on it, and that only, is a part of the summons. There is neither reason nor propriety in putting any subsequent indorsement of the sheriff on the copy delivered to a defendant. Strictly and technically it would not be a true copy of the summons issued if added to and changed in that manner. If the letter of the statute has been complied with in making a service, the defendant's ignorance of what has been or is thereafter done in the case does not let him out of court. He has the certain means of knowing, and fails to use them at his own peril. No certificate of the deputy-sheriff was necessary on the copy served. The Code, § 64, says: "The service shall be by delivering a copy." If the legislature had thereby meant a certified copy, it would have been so expressed, because in another place where it did so mean it said so in the statute. Justices' Act, § 12. In all revisions of the Code the requirement of such certificate has been inserted in the justices' act with reference to constables, and omitted from the general Code with reference to sheriffs. It is unnecessary to give the reasons for this distinction. It is enough that it is so written. The expression of the requirement in the one section conclusively excludes it in the other section where it is not expressed.

*354 The personal service on Warner was not invalidated *nor waived by any subsequent proceedings in the case. Warner moved to set aside said service. His motion was by the court overruled, and the service held to be good. The case of Stevens v. Thompson, 5 Kan. *305, is in point. Upon the filing of an amended petition a second summons was issued, and a second service made, and this court held that such second service cut no figure, not even as to the time and manner of pleading; that, the first service being sufficient, the second summons had no function to perform. Now here there was no waiver by Wood of the personal service on Warner, nor was there any adjudication of the court against it. Warner, with other defendants, actually appeared in the action by filing an answer to Wood's petition. The court found the service by publication to be good, and that by it W., M. & H. were duly notified of the pendency of this action. Can it be contended that the judgment in that case now depends for its validity on the regularity of that service by publication, and that their personal appearance by filing answer cuts no figure,—that the court, by its findings as to service by publication, adjudicated their appearance by answer out of existence? That position is just as tenable as that the personal service on Warner was (without being referred to) thereby adjudicated away.

Wood's action to reform his mortgage was commenced November 4th, and on the same day personal service was made on the two Branscoms and Warner, three of the defendants, and on the sixth of January service by publication was commenced on Mowry and Hawkins, the remaining defendants. Dresser made his purchase of the Warner, Mowry & Hawkins note, November 27th. Under section 81 of the Code, by the purchase at that time Dresser acquired no interest in or lien on the mortgaged premises as against Wood, and Dresser was bound by the decree afterwards made in the action then pending. Bayer v. Cockrill, 3 Kan. *282. Said section 81 contains two distinct provisions. The first is that the filing of the petition is notice to the world ("third persons") of the pendency of the action, but that such notice shall not be of any avail if a service be *355 *not made within sixty days thereunder. This is not such a question as could arise under the statute of limitations. The second provision is that while an action is pending "no interest can be acquired by third persons in the subject-matter thereof, as against the plaintiff's title." It does not say merely that no interest can then be acquired from a defendant in the action. Its meaning is not so limited. An interest as against the plaintiff's title cannot be acquired from any person. In this case, Dresser made his purchase from defendants in the action of Wood v. Branscom et al., and one of the defendants from whom his purchase was made had already been served with a summons in the action. The ownership of Dresser's vendors being a joint one, and the purchase being a single and indivisible transaction, he could not thereby acquire any interest as against the plaintiff's title, even if he might have done so by a purchase of that which was owned solely by the two defendants not then served. The interest of Warner in each and every cent of the mortgage lien gives to Dresser's purchase the same bearing on this case as though made from Warner alone. As this is not a direct proceeding to set aside the decree made in the case of Wood v. Branscom et al., the authorities cited by plaintiff in error have little or no bearing on this case. In the case of Wood v. Branscom et al., Wood sued all the joint owners, and eventually obtained service on all, and a decree against all, which decree is still in force.

Inasmuch as Wood ratified and accepted the attorneys' acts in bringing an action for him as soon as he was apprised of them, the action so brought must be treated in all respects as though originally brought at his direction. Such ratification was made long before Dresser's purchase. The expression "some days after" the filing of the petition excludes the idea of its being some weeks after.

The plaintiff in error in his brief assumes that Wood was negligent. There is no evidence in the case tending to show that Wood or his attorneys knew or could ascertain the facts necessary to *356 be inserted in an affidavit for publication *prior to the time the affidavit was made. As the question of diligence in making that service by publication is no material element in the case, it is but fair to presume that Wood might have proved diligent inquiry and want of knowledge if such testimony had been proper and admissible.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought by Dresser against John Branscom, Martha Branscom, and John W. Wood, to foreclose a certain mortgage. The real contest, however, is between Dresser and Wood. Each is the owner of a mortgage given by the Branscoms upon the same land, and each claims priority of lien. Wood's mortgage was executed first; but, as a mistake was made in describing the mortgaged property, Dresser's mortgage would seem to take precedence. Dresser's mortgage was executed originally by the Branscoms to Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, partners in business, and was by them assigned to the plaintiff, Dresser. Immediately after the Dresser mortgage was executed, and while it still remained in the hands of Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, to-wit, on November 4, 1871, Keeler & Johnson, as attorneys at law, commenced an action in the name of Wood, but without his knowledge or consent, against the Branscoms, and against Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, to obtain a decree reforming the Wood mortgage, and making it the prior lien on the mortgaged property. The Branscoms were duly served with summons. Warner was also served with summons, but it is claimed by Dresser that the service was void, and this is the first question raised in the case. The service was not made by the sheriff in person. But he deputized a person by the name of S. Newhouse to serve the same. The authority was indorsed on the summons, in accordance with section 68 of the Code, (Gen. St. 642,) in the following words, to-wit: "I hereby deputize S. Newhouse to serve this summons. E. T. ELLIS, Sheriff." Newhouse served the summons on *357 a copy of the *summons with all the indorsements thereon, except the foregoing indorsement of authority to Newhouse to serve the summons. The copy delivered to Warner was not in any manner certified to be a copy.

Warner on the same day, November 4th, by delivering to him

It claimed by Dresser that the service of the summons was void, because said copy was not certified, and because said indorsement was omitted therefrom. Now, neither, as we think, was necessary. The statute provides that "the service shall be by delivering a copy of the summons to the defendant personally," etc. Civil Code, § 64. The statute does not require that a certified copy of the summons shall be delivered to the defendant, nor does it require that a copy of anything more than the summons shall be delivered to him. The summons is the writ as it is issued by the clerk. Code, § 59. It does not deed anything more than what the clerk puts in it, or on it, to make it a summons; and anything more is no part of the summons. Taking the statute as it reads, and these propositions seem clear beyond all doubt; and we know of no reason why we should not take the statute as it reads. This service, then, on Warner, was a good service, and gave Warner notice of all the rights of Wood; and, as a rule, notice to any one of two or more persons interested jointly as partners is notice to all. The action from and after November 4th.

was actually pending as to the Branscoms, and as to Warner. Afterwards Wood filed an affidavit for service by publication, and actually got service by publication, not only upon Mowry and Hawkins, but also upon Warner. It is claimed by Dresser that this second service on Warner invalidated the first, or was at least a waiver of the first. We do not think the claim is tenable. Stevens v. Thompson, 5 Kan. *305. Afterwards the defendants Warner, Mowry & Hawkins appeared in the case, filing an answer denying generally all the allegations of the plaintiff's petition. Afterwards, when the case was called for trial, the defendants Warner, Mowry & Hawkins did not appear. The court then found that personal service had *358 been made on the Branscoms, and *that service by publication had been made on the other defendants Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, and did not mention the personal service made on Warner. The court then proceeded to hear the case, and rendered judgment as prayed for by plaintiff, Wood. It is now claimed by Dresser that said finding of the court, that service by publication had been made on Warner, and not mentioning the personal service made on him, was an adjudication by the court that such personal service had never been made, or that the supposed personal service should be set aside. The claim is not tenable. Besides, Warner once made a direct motion to the court to set aside the personal service made on him, and the court overruled the motion; and it was not overruled, as the plaintiff in error now intimates, merely because it was connected with a motion to quash the summons, but it was overruled, as the record clearly shows, because the court considered the service good. And, further, if the court adjudicated the personal service on Warner out of existence, without even mentioning it, did not the court also adjudicate the appearance of Warner, Mowry & Hawkins out of existence? This latter will hardly be claimed.

The petition was filed, and service made on the Branscoms and Warner, on November 4, 1871. The mortgage was assigned by Warner, Mowry & Hawkins to Dresser on November 27th; Dresser having no actual notice of the commencement of the action, or of Wood's rights or claims. And service was not commenced to be made on the other two defendants, Mowry and Hawkins, until January 6, 1872. Hence more than sixty days had elapsed after the filing of the petition, and before service was commenced to be made on Mowry and Hawkins, and hence the lis pendens provided for by section 81 of the Code (Gen. St. 645) could not operate as against a purchaser from Mowry and Hawkins, provided they had owned the entire property in the thing transferred. But they did not own the entire property in the thing transferred. They, with Warner, owned the *359 *property jointly as copartners; and Warner had been served with summons, and the action had been actually pending as against him for twenty-three days when the mortgage was assigned to Dresser. But it is claimed by Dresser that as the mortgage was held jointly, and not in severalty, by Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, no judgment could be rendered against all or any of them upon a service made on Warner alone, and therefore that no lis pendens could have existed when Dresser purchased the mortgage from Warner, Mowry & Hawkins. Now, for the purposes of this case, we shall admit that no final judgment reforming the Wood mortgage as against them could have been rendered against Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, or against either of them, on the service made on Warner alone; but we do not think that it follows from this fact that no lis pendens could exist at the time when Dresser purchased the mortgage from Warner, Mowry & Hawkins, under which he claims priority. The service on Warner was unquestionably valid, so far as the question we are now considering is concerned. Indeed, there is no way, under our laws, by which a service of summons can be made on a copartnership firm except by making the service on each individual member of the firm; and from the time that each individual member of the firm is so served, the action stands actually pending against such member. If the service were void as to each member when served, it would evidently be void as to all of them when served, which cannot be admitted; but, as the service is valid as to each member when served, it would seem to be clear beyond all doubt that no person could purchase or obtain any interest in the subject-matter of the action from such member, when so served, so as to defeat or affect any right of the plaintiff in the action in which such service was made. But to purchase anything from one of the members of a copartnership firm is to purchase it from every member of the firm. For instance, take the present case. Warner's interest in the mortgage extended to every conceivable or inconceivable portion of the mortgage. No portion of the *360 *mortgage could be purchased without purchasing a portion of Warner's interest therein; and, as each and every partner who has any authority to make a sale of any portion of the partnership property is, in fact and in law, an agent for that purpose for each and all of the other members of the firm, a purchase from such member, who is an agent, is a purchase from each and all of the other members, who are principals. Therefore a purchase from Mowry or Hawkins or both would be a purchase from Warner, and therefore we think it follows from the foregoing premises that, whenever any member of a copartnership firm is served with a summons, a lis pendens is at once created to such an extent that no person can purchase from any member of the firm any portion of the subject-matter of the action so as to affect the rights of the plaintiff in the action. It would be unfortunate if such were not the law. If such were not the law, as soon as one member of a firm were served with summons, the other members might sell the subject-matter of the action to an innocent purchaser, just as was done in this case, and then, if for any reason service should not be personally made or commenced by publication on every other member of the firm within sixty days after filing the petition, any judgment that might thereafter be rendered might be wholly unavailing and ineffectual for the purpose of protecting or enforcing the rights of the plaintiff therein. And, further, if it be true that no judgment could have been rendered against Warner after he was served with summons, except upon the contingency that both the other members of the firm should also be served with summons, still it is no more true than that no judgment could be rendered against any or all of them except upon the happening of several other contingencies. Even after service is made upon all the defendants in any case, no judgment can be rendered except upon the happening of a greater or less number of contingencies. The judgment usually depends upon the evidence, and connected with the evidence are usually many contingencies; and the last contingency is not *361 removed until the judgment is actually *and finally rendered.

It cannot, therefore, be maintained that every contingency that might defeat the rendering of judgment must first be removed before a lis pendens can have any operation. We think a lis pendens was created by the service of the summons upon Warner. But it is claimed, however, by Dresser that such lis pendens was destroyed by the subsequent failure of plaintiff Wood to commence to obtain service upon Mowry and Hawkins within sixty days after the filing of the petition. Code, § 81. But Dresser purchased the mortgage in twenty-three days only after the petition was filed, and while the lis pendens was unquestionably (so far as this question is concerned) in full force and operation, and therefore Wood's laches in not commencing to obtain service on Mowry and Hawkins until sixty-three days had elapsed after the petition was filed, instead of within sixty days, as he had an undoubted right to do, could not have misled Dresser, to his injury. We do not think that the three-days laches of Wood destroyed the lis pendens already created and existing.

But it is also claimed by Dresser that said action was commenced without any authority from Wood, and therefore that the proceeding could not constitute a lis pendens. But the record shows that "some days after said action was commenced" Wood ratified the same. How many days thereafter is not shown. It evidently could not have been weeks, however, or the record would have said "weeks," instead of saying "days." And it could not have been more than seventeen days at most, for the following reasons: On November 4th the petition was filed and service made on Warner and the Branscoms; on November 16th Warner filed a motion to set aside the service and quash the summons; and on November 21st, just seventeen days after the petition was filed, this motion was taken up for hearing, and Wood appeared in the court to contest the same. It is true,

Wood's appearance was by counsel, but there is no pretense *362 that this appearance was unauthorized. The court overruled the motion. Now, by way of digression, was not this an adjudication by the court that the service on Warner was good? And the court had jurisdiction both of the subject-matter of the motion and of Warner, who made the motion; that is, the court had jurisdiction of Warner for the purpose of adjudicating upon this motion, for Warner voluntarily appeared for this purpose, and gave the court such jurisdiction. Warner excepted to the decision of the court upon this motion, and made a case for the supreme court. This decision was made on November 21st, and in six days thereafter, on November 27th, the mortgage was assigned by Mowry and Hawkins to Dresser. We suppose that no one will question the power of Wood to ratify and make his own whatever said attorneys had done for him in the way of bringing said suit; and we suppose no one will question the binding effect of the suit after its ratification. The suit was ratified by Wood before the mortgage was transferred to Dresser; and Warner, one of the mortgagees, well knew of the ratification, for only six days before the assignment was made he had had the contest with Wood over the service of the summons.

Dresser also claims that Wood did not sufficiently plead in this action the lis pendens of the other action. He set forth in this action, in his answer to Dresser's petition, the rendition of the judgment in the other action. He also sets forth in his answer that at all times up to the rendition of said judgment, and since, Warner, Mowry & Hawkins were the owners of the Dresser mortgage. These facts, if true, certainly constitute a good lis pendens. Indeed, it is not necessary that they should all be true, or wholly true, in order to constitute a good lis pendens. Suppose, for instance, that instead of Warner, Mowry & Hawkins owning the mortgage up to and after the rendition of the judgment, as pleaded, they merely owned it up to and after the time when the suit was actually pending against Warner, as was the fact, still the lis pendens would be sufficient. We think the answer was sufficient. And, besides, all the parties *363 tried the case on the assumption *that the question of whether a lis pendens existed or not was properly raised by the pleadings in the case; and therefore, even if it should now be found that any one of the pleadings was technically defective in this respect, still we should not reverse the judgment of the court below merely for that reason. Parties must generally raise such questions before they come to this court. If any objection had been made in the court below, the pleadings would undoubtedly have been made sufficient, if they were not already sufficient.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

JOHN DAVENPORT v. FRANK R. OGG, Ex'r, etc.

July Term, 1875.

1. Trial: Excluding Witnesses: Testimony of Disobedient Witness. Where the court makes an order excluding from the court-room, during the trial, all witnesses except such witness as may at any time be called in for examination, it is the duty of all witnesses to obey such order; and any person violating the order may be punished therefor. But, where a witness does violate the order, it is error for the court to exclude his testimony, simply because of such violation, over the objections and exceptions of an innocent party to the case who desires to examine the witness.
2. Witnesses: Conduct of: Credibility. The testimony of the witness should be received in such a case, and should go to the jury; but the conduct of the witness may also be shown to the jury for the purpose of affecting his credibility.<sup>1</sup>
3. ———: Conduct of Party: Presumption. Where there is nothing in the record tending to show that the party desiring to examine the witness participated in the guilt of the witness, it will be presumed by the supreme court that such party was innocent.
4. ———: Presumption: Where Witness is Competent. Where the testimony of a witness is excluded because it is supposed that the witness is incompetent, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, by the supreme court, if the witness is found to be competent, that the party offering him was prejudiced by the exclusion, although the testimony of the witness may not be set out in the record. The rule seems to be this: Where the court below excludes evidence because the evidence, and not the witness, is supposed to be incompetent, the record must contain the evidence sought to be introduced, so that the appellate court may see whether it is competent or not; but where the court below excludes the witness because the witness, and not his evidence, is supposed to be incompetent, then all that is necessary to put in the record is enough to show whether the witness is competent or not.
5. ———. And, where the competency of a witness is objected to for any particular reason, it will be presumed by the supreme court, unless the contrary appears, that no other ground for his exclusion exists; and hence all that is necessary in such a case for the record to contain, is enough to show whether the particular reason given for the exclusion is sufficient or not.

Error from Johnson district court.

Davenport filed a claim in the probate court of Johnson county against the estate of one M. D., deceased. The claim was resisted by Ogg, the executor, and a trial was had before the probate judge, and a finding for the claimant. The case was appealed to the district court, where a trial was had at November term, 1873. Judgment was given for the executor.

Sam E McCracken, for plaintiff in error.

The court erred in excluding the witness for disobeying the order of the court. The fault, if any, was the fault of the witness, and without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff or his attorney. A witness cannot, by any misconduct of his own, deprive a party of the benefit of his evidence, if there be no fault or connivance on the part of the person who has a right to his testimony. 2 Phil. F. R. Ogg, defendant in error, for himself.

*365 *VALENTINE, J. At the commencement of the trial of this case an order was made by the court below excluding from the courtroom, during the trial, all the plaintiff's witnesses, except such witness as might be called in at any time for examination. During the trial, Mary Atkinson, one of plaintiff's witnesses, came into the courtroom in violation of said order, and heard all the evidence in chief of another witness of the plaintiff. Afterwards the plaintiff offered to introduce this witness, but the defendant objected on the ground that she had violated said order. "The plaintiff [then] insisted that the witness should be allowed to testify; that they had called the attention of the court to the fact of the witness being in court as soon as the fact came to the knowledge of the plaintiff's counsel; that it was no fault of theirs, but of the witness; that the fact of the witness being in court before the plaintiff was apprised of the fact of said witness' being in court was known to defendant's counsel." This statement was not sworn to, and whether true or untrue we have no means of determining. And what the testimony of the witness might have been we cannot tell, for the court excluded the whole of it, not even allowing the witness to be examined on any subject, and the plaintiff made no statement as to what the testimony would be. Did the court below err in refusing to allow this witness to be examined? We think it did. There is no pretense that the witness was not a competent witness in every respect, except that she had violated said order; and there is no pretense that her testimony would not have been relevant and competent if it had been admitted. Her testimony was excluded simply and solely because she violated said order of the court. This was probably no punishment to the witness, but was rather a severe punishment to the plaintiff, who, as we must presume from the circumstances of the case, was an innocent party.

*366 Mr. Phillips says in his work on Evidence, that "if a witness who has been ordered to withdraw, continue in court, it was formerly considered to be in the judge's discretion whether or not the witness should be examined; but it may now be considered as settled that the circumstance of a witness having remained in court in disobedience to an order of withdrawal is not a ground for rejecting his evidence, and that it merely affords matter of observation." 2 Phil. Ev. (5th Amer. Ed.) 744, *887, and also see cases there cited. This is evidently the correct rule. A hostile witness should not have the power, by violating an order of the court, to deprive an innocent party of his testimony. Nor should the ignorance, mistake, misapprehension, or inadvertence on the part of the witness have the effect to deprive an innocent party of his testimony. The testimony of the witness should be received, and should go to the jury; but the conduct of the witness may also be shown to the jury for the purpose of affecting his credibility. That this view of the question is correct, see, also, Keith v. Wilson, 6 Mo. 435; State v. Salge, 2 Nev. 321; Gregg v. State, 3 W. Va. 705; Grimes v. Martin, 10 Iowa, 347; Bell v. State, 44 Ala. 393; State v. Sparrow, 3 Murph. 487; Hopper v. Com., 6 Grat. 684. The witness may be punished, as for a contempt, by fine and imprisonment for violating the order of the court. So, also, may any party or person who procures or abets such violation; and, if the party who wishes to examine the witness abets the violation of the order of the court, he may be punished by excluding the evidence of the witness; or, at least, this seems to be the weight of authority up to the present time. But all this is punishment for a supposed contempt of the court; and the guilt of the party punished must either come under the personal and judicial cognizance of the court, or it must be proved to the satisfaction of the court by evidence.

No innocent person can be punished in any manner, and no person is to be presumed, without proof, to be guilty; but, on the *367 contrary, every person, in the absence of *anything showing the contrary, is presumed to be innocent. Hence, in the present case, with or without the said statement of the plaintiff, as there is nothing in the record tending to show the plaintiff's guilt, he must be presumed by the supreme court to be innocent. There was nothing that transpired during the trial tending to show his guilt. It will also be presumed that the plaintiff was prejudiced by the exclusion of the testimony of said witness. Mr. Powell says: "It seems that to reject a witness which the record shows to be a competent witness would be error, for it would appear prima facie that the party was prejudiced by the rejection. And where a competent witness is excluded as incompetent, no necessity exists to set out in the bill of exceptions the matter expected to be proved by the witness, for the ground of the rejection would have been his legal disability to testify in the case, and there the contrary appeared from the record." Powell, App. Proc. 218, 219, § 12. See, also, Fairley v. Fairley, 34 Miss. 18, 21; State v. Salge, 2 Nev. 321, 326; Gregg v. State, 3 W. Va. 705, 709, et. seq.; and other cases above cited. In the case of Fairley v. Fairley, supra, the court say. "The record states that the plaintiffs offered the witness to prove their case, and it must be inferred, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that, if the court had permitted the witness to testify, this proof would have been made." The rule seems to be this: When the court below excludes evidence because the evidence, and not the witness, is supposed to be incompetent, the record must contain the evidence sought to be introduced, so that the appellate court may see whether it is competent or not; but where the court below excludes a witness because the witness, and not his evidence, is supposed for any reason to be incompetent, then all that is necessary to be put in the record is enough to show whether the witness is competent or not upon the ground upon which he is excluded; and it is not necessary, in such a case, to put into the record what the witness would testify to. Where the competency *368 of the witness is objected to for any particular reason, it will be presumed, unless the contrary appears, that no other reason for his exclusion exists; and hence, in such a case, all that is necessary, as a general rule, for the record to contain, is enough to show that the particular reason given for the exclusion is not sufficient. In the present case the witness was excluded solely because she herself, without any encouragement from any one else, violated an order of the court. The record contains sufficient to show that such reason is not sufficient, and hence the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

JOHN G. MEHNERT and others v. THERESA THIEME, Adm'x, etc.

July Term, 1875.

New Trial: Accident, and Unavoidable Misfortune. Where a party, acting as his own attorney in a case pending in the district court, fails to appear at the time set for trial, and judgment is rendered against him in his absence, and thereafter a motion is filed to vacate such judgment, and grant a new trial, and in support thereof the affidavit of the party is filed, alleging that he lived twelve miles from the court-house; that he had a large amount of stock, and no male help on his place, and was consequently obliged to be home every night; that in order to be present at the trial he rose on that morning between three and four o'clock, attended to his home duties, and started with his team between five and six o'clock; that he made no stops on the way, and drove with all possible speed, reaching the court-house about 10 o'clock, and after his case had been called and tried; and that the delay in driving in was caused by the bad and almost impassable condition of the roads, but without showing that the roads were for that season of the year, December, exceptionably bad, or that by an unexpected change they had become suddenly bad, or that the party was not fully aware of their exact condition: held, that this was not such a showing of accident which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, or of unavoidable misfortune, as required the setting aside of the judgment and the granting of a new trial.<sup>1</sup>

*369 *Error from Bourbon district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

John M Galloway, for plaintiffs in error.

McComas & McKeighan, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. The plaintiffs in error were sued upon a promissory note. Mehnert filed an answer in person, alleging part payment to the amount of $166.10, and that after the maturity of the note he and his co-defendant had given a mortgage due in twelve months as security, and that this time had not passed. They made no appearance at the trial, and judgment was rendered for the face of the note and interest. On the same day they, by an attorney, filed a motion to vacate the judgment, and grant them a new trial, on the ground that they were prevented from making their defense by "accident which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, and unavoidable misfortune." This motion was overruled, and this is the error complained of. Mehnert's affidavit was the only testimony offered upon said motion. He testified that he filed the answer, and that it was true; that he lived twelve miles from Fort Scott, where the court was in session; that he had a large amount of stock, and no male help on his place, and was consequently obliged to be home every night; that in order to be present in court in time on that morning he rose between three and four o'clock, attended to his home duties, and started with his team for Fort Scott between five and six o'clock, drove with all possible dispatch, and made no stoppages on the road; that he reached the court-house about ten o'clock, and found that the case had been called and disposed of a few minutes prior *370 thereto; that *the delay in driving in was caused by the bad and almost impassable condition of the roads. Was this accident which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, or unavoidable misfortune? It does not appear that the roads were for that season of the year, December, exceptionably bad, or that by an unexpected change in the weather they had become suddenly bad, or that Mehnert did not by frequent travel have full knowledge of their actual condition. At that time it is no uncommon thing for country roads to be very rough, and in very bad condition. Common prudence would dictate that one who was acting as an attorney, and attending to business in court then in session, should not run the risk of getting into court in the morning over such roads from a remote part of the county. The real difficulty was that Mehnert was attempting to perform the double part of suitor and attorney. While this is perfectly proper, yet whoever attempts it subjects himself to the obligations and liabilities of both. It is the duty of an attorney having business in court to be present during its sessions. There is his business; there is his work. Oftentimes that which will excuse the absence of a suitor, will come far short of excusing the absence of his attorney. Now, Mehnert was acting as an attorney, intrusted with business in the court then in session. Instead of employing some one to take care of his stock on his farm, and being himself in readiness to attend to his case, he is, with full knowledge of his great distance from the court-house, and the almost impassable condition of the roads, attempting to take care of both stock and lawsuit. He succeeded in the former, but failed in the latter, and failed simply from omitting the ordinary precautions which men take under similar circumstances. Hill v. Williams, 6 Kan *17.

The judgment will be affirmed.

*D. C. KNOWLES v. S. E. ARMSTRONG.

July Term, 1875.

1. Bills and Notes: Protest Damages. Where a petition on a negotiable promissory note alleges two indorsements, a demand and refusal of payment, and notice to the indorsers, it is not error to award protest damages.<sup>1</sup>
2. Mortgage: Judgment of Foreclosure: Indorsement of Summons. Where a summons in an action to foreclose a note and mortgage was indorsed by the clerk with the amount of money claimed to be due, and there was no indorsement of a claim for other relief, held, that there was no error on account of this indorsement in rendering both a judgment for the money due on the note and a decree for the foreclosure of the mortgage.

Error from Bourbon district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

McComas & McKeighan, for plaintiff in error.

Harris & Spencer, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. This was an action in the district court of Bourbon county, to foreclose a note and mortgage given by plaintiff in error and his wife to one Robert Armstrong, and transferred by indorsement of the note, first by the payee to G. W. Stewart, and by Stewart to plaintiff, defendant in error. Personal service was made on Knowles and his wife, who filed an answer, and then, by leave of the court, withdrew their answer and appearance. The errors complained of are that the court allowed protest damages on the note, and that under the summons it improperly rendered other than a money judgment.

In reference to the first, it may be said that the petition alleges *372 two indorsements, a demand and *refusal of payment, and notice to the indorsers. This was sufficient under the statute. Gen. St. 116, § 14. In regard to the second objection, it appears that the summons was indorsed by the clerk as follows: "The plaintiff herein claims $1,313.80, together with interest on $1,180 at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from November 11, 1873, and for which judgment will be taken if the defendants fail to answer." There was no indorsement of a claim for other relief than a personal judgment for money. Hence counsel contends that it was error to take other than such a judgment. This point has been already decided in this court adversely to the claim of plaintiff in error. Weaver v. Gardner, 14 Kan. *347.

The judgment will be affirmed.

WILTON TOWN CO. v. GEO. S. HUMPHREY.

July Term, 1875.

1. Execution: When no Protection to Officer. An execution, which recites a judgment only against B., and is issued upon a judgment only against B., is no protection to an officer in levying upon the property of A., although it commands him to seize the property of A.<sup>1</sup>
2. Corporation: Actions against: Misnomer or Misrecitation. If a claim sued on before a justice of the peace is a claim against a corporation, service made upon and defense made by the corporation, and judgment in fact rendered against the corporation, such proceedings will not be vitiated by a mere misrecitation of the name of the corporation.
3. Justices of the Peace: Construction of Proceedings. Great allowance must be made in the proceedings of justices of the peace for their ignorance of legal phraseology, and their want of familiarity with the requirements of judicial proceedings; and if from the record can be gathered what the magistrate intended to do and decide, and there is that which, however irregularly and inartificially prepared, can be construed into an expression of that intention, the record will be upheld as a sufficient record of the intended act and decision.<sup>2</sup>
- *373 *4. ———: Execution: Protection to Officer. Where an officer, acting under an execution which reads as follows: "You are commanded to take into your possession enough of the personal property of the Wilton Town Company to satisfy a judgment of $2.55, together with all costs that have or may accrue in a case wherein J. M. H. was plaintiff, and C. H. N. and J. W. B., officers of the Wilton Town Company, defendants, rendered this twentieth day of February, 1874, before H. B., a justice of the peace," etc., levied upon certain personal property of said Wilton Town Company, and where it is doubtful from the entire record whether the proceedings and judgment in the action in which the execution was issued were not in fact prosecuted and rendered against the said Wilton Town Company, and the execution fails to show against whom the judgment actually was rendered, held, that this court will not reverse the ruling of both a justice of the peace and the district court, to the effect that the execution protected the officer in making the levy, and that the town company could not maintain replevin from him.

Error from Greenwood district court.

Replevin, brought by the town company against Humphrey, before a justice of the peace, to recover possession of an office desk of the value of thirteen dollars. The defendant justified, and claimed possession, as a constable, under a writ of execution. The justice gave judgment for the defendant, and the town company took the case by appeal to the district court, where it was tried at the April term, 1874, without a jury. The transcript shows that "the court, after hearing the evidence, and being fully advised in the premises, ruled and adjudged that the said execution protected the officer, and was a sufficient justification for him, the said defendant, in taking the property in controversy, and that the defendant is entitled to the possession of the property in controversy." Judgment was given in accordance with this decision in favor of defendant and against the plaintiff, and the costs were taxed at the sum of $217.

T. L. Davis, for plaintiff.

G. H. Lillie, for defendant.

*374 *BREWER, J. This was an action of replevin, brought by the plaintiff in error, plaintiff below, against the defendant, a special constable. It was first tried before a justice of the peace, and then on appeal in the district court. On both trials judgment was rendered against the plaintiff. The evidence was briefly to this effect, that the property belonged to the plaintiff, and that it was taken by the defendant upon an execution issued by a justice of the peace. The judgment was in favor of John M. Hatfield, and against J. C. Price, C. H. Norton, R. L. Osborn, and J. W. Borton, officers of the Wilton Town Company. The execution was as follows:

"To G. S. Humphrey, Special Constable: You are commanded to take into your possession enough of the personal property of the Wilton Town Company to satisfy a judgment of $2.55, together with all costs that have or may accrue in a case wherein John M. Hatfield was plaintiff, and C. H. Norton and J. W. Borton, officers of the Wilton Town Company, defendants, rendered this twentieth day of February, 1874, before Hiram Bersie, a justice of the peace in and for Lane township, Greenwood county, Kansas. Make legal service and due return according to law. HIRAM BERSIE, J. P.

"Dated this third day of March."

This is one of those petty cases which never ought to be brought to this court, one in which the principal matter in interest is now the costs; and one in which it is doubtful whether strict rules of law ought to be enforced in the construction of the judgment and process of a justice of the peace, or great allowance made for his ignorance of legal phrase, for the purpose of giving effect to the probable intention of the magistrate. For it cannot be doubted that an officer is not protected in seizing the property of A. under an execution which recites only a judgment against B., and is issued upon a judgment only against B., notwithstanding it commands him to seize the property of A. So that, if this judgment was really against the *375 officers of the town company as individuals, it furnished no basis for an execution against the property of the company; and an execution reciting such judgment is no protection to the officer in making this levy. On the other hand, if the claim sued on was one against the company, the service made upon the company, the defense made by the company, and the judgment in fact rendered by the justice against the company, a misnomer of the company in the judgment, or a misrecitation of the name under which it should have been sued, ought not to vitiate the proceedings. Great allowance often has to be made in the proceedings of these officers for their ignorance of legal phraseology, and their want of familiarity with the requirements of judicial proceedings; so that if there can be gathered from the record what the magistrate intended to do and decide, and there is that which, however irregularly and inartificially prepared, can be construed into an expression of that intention, the record will be upheld as a sufficient record of the intended act and decision.

With some hesitation we are constrained to sustain the ruling of the district court. The fact that the execution commands the officer to levy upon the property of the company is evidence that it was the party against whom the proceedings were really had, for it is against all probability that upon a judgment against one party an officer should be directed to seize the property of another. Again, if the proceedings were against certain individuals, it would be strange that any description other than their names should be used, while the language actually used is, in many states, the appropriate description of a corporation. A county is in this state sued as the "Board of county commissioners of the county of ———." Gen. St. p. 254, § 5. Again, the parties have omitted to bring before us the record and papers of the case before the justice, and it may well be that that record and those papers would tend to make clear what is now doubtful as to the party against whom the proceedings were had, as was the case in Goodsell v. Wheeler, 34 Conn. 485. But, finally *376 and chiefly, the execution does not recite any judgment. It commands the officer to seize the property of the company to satisfy a judgment rendered in a certain case, but does not declare against whom the judgment was rendered. It is true, the company is not stated as one of the parties, plaintiff or defendant, but it may be that the parties named were the original parties; and though the company was subsequently made a party, yet the justice, in obedience or supposed obedience to section 117 of the Civil Code, which declares that "the title of a cause shall not be changed in any of its stages," continued to describe the action by the names of the original parties. Of course, if the execution were entirely regular upon its face, and recited a judgment against the company, or even recited a judgment in a case in which the company was a party, without specifying against whom it was rendered, it would be protection to the officer, and replevin would not lie. Westenberger v. Wheaton, 8 Kan. *169.

The judgment will be affirmed.

JOHN HAMLYN v. JAMES C. BOULTER.

July Term, 1875.

Mortgage: Pledge of Chattels: Right of Possession: Conditions.

Where B., being indebted on several judgments before a justice of the peace, procures H. to become surety for a stay of execution on said judgments, and to indemnify him gives a chattel mortgage on certain personal property, which mortgage expressly provides that H. shall have the exclusive control of the goods, shall sell them, and receive the proceeds, until he is fully repaid or otherwise indemnified, held, that judgment in favor of B. for the value of a portion of said goods should be reversed, where the findings fail to show that the judgments have been paid, and do show that H. has not realized enough from the sale of the goods to protect himself.<sup>1</sup>

*377 *Error from Labette district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

F. A. Bettis and David Kelso, for plaintiff in error.

H. G. Webb and W. B. Glasse, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. The defendant in error, as plaintiff, brought his action in the district court of Labette county, alleging that Hamlyn, the defendant, had converted certain personal property belonging to plaintiff, and asking judgment for its value. The defendant answered that the plaintiff, being a judgment debtor in sundry cases, had requested him to become surety on a stay of execution upon such judgments, and that he had so done; that to indemnify him plaintiff had given him a chattel mortgage upon the property described in the petition, a copy of which mortgage was attached to the answer; that, as authorized in said instrument, he had sold some of the goods and applied the proceeds in payment of said judgments; that he had paid on said judgments more than he had received from the sale of the goods; and, finally, that the plaintiff was indebted to him in sundry matters. A general denial was filed for reply. The case was referred to a referee, who made his report, with a finding of facts, and conclusions of law. The testimony is not preserved. A motion was made in the district court to set aside the report of the referee, because "not sustained by sufficient evidence, and contrary to law." This motion was overruled, and exceptions duly taken. The referee finds, among other things, that the chattel mortgage set forth in the answer was executed as alleged, that the plaintiff was a judgment debtor, and the defendant became security for stay of execution as stated. He did not find that those judgments had been paid, and did find that the defendant had not realized enough from the goods to protect himself. Turning to the mortgage, we find that it expressly gives to Hamlyn the exclusive control of the goods, the sale of them, and the handling of the proceeds thereof, until he is fully repaid, or otherwise indemnified. Indeed, by our statute, in the absence of stipulations in the instrument to the contrary, Hamlyn would have had the legal title and right of possession. Gen. St. p. 585, § 15. No action, therefore, could be maintained against him for the conversion of the goods, or for the value of any portion of them, until he had been fully repaid or indemnified, either by a sale of the goods or otherwise.

The judgment of the district court will therefore be reversed, and the case remanded with instructions to sustain the motion to set aside the report of the referee.

ZEPHENIAH HOLCOMB v. JOHN A. DOWELL.

July Term, 1875.

1. Supreme Court: Assignment of Error: No Exceptions in Record: Limit of Inquiry. Where a case is tried by the court without a jury, special findings of fact made, no exceptions taken to them, no motion made to set them aside, and no application for further findings, and the only error alleged is, that upon the facts found the court erred in its conclusions of law, this court cannot inquire whether the testimony was properly admitted, whether it sustained the findings, or whether other facts were also proved by it, but is limited to the inquiry, whether upon the pleadings and findings the proper judgment was entered.
2. Statute of Frauds: Parol Contract for Sale of Lands: Possession, and Lasting Improvements. Where an action of ejectment is brought, and it appears by way of defense that a parol contract had been theretofore made by the plaintiff for the sale of the premises to the defendant; that under said contract the defendant, with the knowledge, consent, *379 and approval of the plaintiff entered *into possession and made valuable and permanent improvements thereon, said improvements being three or four times the value of the land; that the contract called for subsequent payment, and that payment, though often demanded, had not been made through lack of funds: held, that a judgment in favor of the defendant would not be reversed.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Brown district court.

C. W. Johnson, for plaintiff.

The district court found that the defendant is in under a contract which gives him such equities; that under the rule laid down in Courtney v. Woodworth, 9 Kan. *443, the plaintiff cannot sustain ejectment, but must sue to rescind, or file a bill to foreclose, and have his own homestead sold if Dowell does not pay. The only question is, is this the correct view of the law? In Courtney v. Woodworth the defendant had an equity. He had paid for the land two hundred dollars in money and three hundred dollars in negotiable notes. Neither the money nor the notes were tendered back. The land was not a part of the vendor's homestead, and could be aliened without the joint consent of husband and wife. We think the true rule is that whoever pleads or proves a state of facts that would entitle him to the equity of a specific performance, if he were plaintiff, can defend in ejectment on setting up his equity. In this case the contract was void, and Dowell could never enforce it, Mrs. Holcomb objecting, (even if Holcomb should be estopped,) if the ninth section of article 15 of the constitution has any meaning. But Holcomb is not es-topped. He has never received a dollar of money,—none has ever been tendered; and the defendant's whole defense consists in trying to force a recovery of damages out of a homestead by getting upon it under a parol contract of purchase, and thus compel the application of a homestead claim he could not maintain at law. *380 That ejectment will lie in such cases, we refer to Wright v. Moore, 21 Wend. 230; Gardiniere v. Deyo, 3 Johns. 422; Patton v. Nicholson, 3 Wheat. 211; Hoatling v. Hoatling, 47 Barb. 163; Day v. New York C. R. Co., 53 Barb. 155. And to the same effect are the following, which also hold that no notice to quit is necessary: Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. 26; Jackson v. Miller, 7 Cow. 747; McClane v. White, 5 Minn. 178, (Gil. 139.) Where one enters under a license as purchaser, agreeing to pay, on a failure to pay he becomes a trespasser ab initio, liable to be turned out as such, and for mesne profits. Smith v. Stewart, 6 Johns. 46. "No notice to quit is necessary where the relation of landlord and tenant has not existed; nor even under tenancies at will." But in the case at bar there was no tenancy at will, because there are no terms of the occupancy except to pay the purchase price within thirty days. The putting in possession was a mere constructive fiction, arising from the fact that Holcomb saw Dowell moving a house on the land, and did not have him enjoined from moving on until payment was made. Ejectment was held to lie against the vendee who would neither perform, nor offer to perform, in the cases of Powers v. Ingraham, 3 Barb. 576; Jackson v. Stackhouse, 1 Cow. 122; Prentice v. Wilson, 14 Ill. 91; Wales v. Bogue, 31 Ill. 468. And see Tyler, Ejectm. 554. An agreement to sell does not constitute a license to enter. Erwin v. Olmsted, 7 Cow. 229; Kellogg v. Kellogg, 6 Barb. 116; Spencer v. Tobey, 22 Barb. 260; Suffern v. Townsend, 9 Johns. 35; Cooper v. Stower, Id. 331. Making improvements does not create any equity. Near v. Watts, 7 Watts, 321.

Ejectment will not lie in this action. It is a purely legal remedy. To recover in ejectment the plaintiff's legal rights must be such as to oust the defendant's equities. Plaintiff made the contract to sell the land to defendant, and both he and his wife (who is not a party to this suit) saw him expending money upon it, erecting his buildings, and improving it daily, without objection. This we think would be "joint consent of husband and wife." The constitution does not provide that the consent shall be in writing, and equity will not permit a man and his wife to stand by and see another lay out *381 money, and make valuable and lasting improvements *on their joint land, any more than it will permit the man alone to do so. Both husband and wife in this case are estopped from saying that their joint consent was not given. That ejectment will not lie in this case, we think is settled in this state by Courtney v. Woodworth, 9 Kan. *443.

BREWER, J. This was an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff in error, plaintiff below, for the recovery of a tract of twelve acres, in Brown county. Judgment was rendered for the defendant, and of this judgment plaintiff complains. The case was tried by the court, without a jury. Special findings of fact were made. No motion was made to set aside these findings, no exceptions taken to them, and no application for any further findings. The errors alleged are "that the conclusions of law are not the law of the case on the facts found; that on the facts found plaintiff was entitled to recover the premises, and that plaintiff was entitled to judgment and defendant was not." Hence, the question presented to us is, which party upon the pleadings and facts found is entitled to judgment? We need not inquire whether the testimony was properly admitted, whether it sustained the findings, nor whether other facts were also proved by it. McGonigle v. Gordon, 11 Kan. *167. This we think eliminates some matters discussed in the briefs of counsel.

The petition was an ordinary petition in ejectment. The answer alleges a written contract for the exchange of farms; that subsequently it was verbally agreed between the parties that this contract should be set aside; and that plaintiff should deed the twelve acres in controversy and a lot in North Robinson to the defendant, and the defendant should pay therefor $250; that in pursuance of said agreement the lot was selected and deeded; that plaintiff put the defendant into possession of the twelve acres, and the defendant has put thereon lasting and valuable improvements, describing them; that the defendant has paid seven dollars; that there is due *382 $243, which the defendant is willing to pay, and *desires a specific performance. A reply was filed containing a general denial. Five findings of fact were made: (1) That plaintiff had the legal title; (2) that the parties made the written contract, that plaintiff's wife did not sign that contract, and that the land plaintiff was to deed was that upon which he then and still resided; (3) that this written contract was set aside, and a parol contract made as stated in the answer; that under this parol contract defendant went into possession, and made permanent and valuable improvements, and that this was done with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the plaintiff, and that defendant has ever since resided thereon; (4) that the money agreed to be paid was to have been paid on the first of June after the contract, but has not been paid, in whole or in part, for want of funds, though payment has been frequently demanded; (5) that plaintiff's wife is still living. Upon these pleadings and findings did the court err in refusing to give plaintiff a judgment for possession, and in giving defendant a judgment for costs? We think not. The court tendered leave to the plaintiff to amend his petition, so as to make it one to foreclose his lien for the unpaid purchase money, but he declined the offer, and claimed the land. Counsel in their brief discuss the question of a parol alienation of the homestead. But there is nothing in pleadings or findings from which it can in any way be inferred that this twelve acres was a part of the plaintiff's homestead. It appears that the land mentioned in the original written contract was the land on which he resided, but it does not appear that this twelve acres is a part of that tract. If we look to the testimony, it would seem probable that it was a part of the homestead; but we find there also evidence tending to show the wife's assent to the alienation, and improvements, and we suppose she can be bound equally and in the same manner with her husband. Edwards v. Fry, 9 Kan. *426. The case, then, as it stands, is a case of a parol contract for the sale of lands, accompanied by the taking of possession and the making of permanent and valuable improvements, with the knowledge *383 and assent of the vendor. In this case the improvements were three or four times the value of the land. This, equity declares, takes the case out of the statute, and makes a contract binding upon the vendor, equally with one in writing. There is therefore a contract to sell lands, with payment promised at a subsequent day, and not made as promised, possession taken, and improvements of great value made. Upon these facts will ejectment lie? We think not. Courtney v. Woodworth, 9 Kan. *443.

The judgment will be affirmed.

J. M. HAGAMAN v. F. W. NEITZEL.

July Term, 1875.

1. Justices' Courts: Docket Entries: Bill of Exceptions. The statute directs what matters shall be entered on the docket of a justice of the peace, and if a party desires to preserve the rulings of the justice as to other matters, for review on petition in error, he must take a bill of exceptions.
2. ———. Though a justice enters upon his docket a statement of matters other than those by law directed to be entered thereon, such statement does not thereby become a part of the record and available for review in a higher court upon petition in error.
3. ———. So, where upon a docket in which was entered all the matters directed to be entered, and preliminary to the record of the trial, was this statement: "And now, on this fourth of December, 1873, this cause came on for hearing; defendant, being in the justice's office, requested to know what time it was, and was informed by the justice that it was ten minutes past ten o'clock by his watch, (ten o'clock being the hour for the trial,) whereupon the defendant requested that the case be called. The plaintiff was not present, but had been in a few minutes before, about fifteen or twenty minutes before ten o'clock. The justice stated that the constable was now preparing a more suitable room for the trial of this cause, and it would be called in a few minutes Defendant departed, and was not in court again by himself or counsel. Shortly *384 after, the plaintiff entered the justice's office, and claimed that the hour of trial had not arrived, and produced a watch indicating time at ten minutes to ten o'clock A. M., and insisted upon trial of this case, and would risk judgment if it should be in his favor. Thereupon defendant was called three times, and did not answer; and was not in court during the trial. Trial had," etc. Held, that there was nothing in this statement properly before the district court on a petition in error.

4. Evidence: Exceptions to: Waiver. Where no exception is taken to the admission of testimony, any error in its admission is waived.

5. Trespass: Severance and Removal of Property. Where a trespass has been committed upon real estate, and property severed therefrom and removed, the owner may waive a trespass and sue for the value of the property removed, and the law will imply a promise to pay such value.

Error from Cloud district court.

Neitzel commenced his action in a justice's court, and filed his bill of particulars as follows:

—All of which is due from the defendant to plaintiff and unpaid."

The district court, at the December term, 1873, affirmed the justice's judgment in favor of Neitzel.

J. M. Hagaman, plaintiff in error, for himself.

The hour mentioned in the justice's summons for appearance was 9 A. M., and when one hour and ten minutes had elapsed, defendant in error failing to appear, it was error for the justice to refuse *385 to call the case, and affected the substantial rights of plaintiff in error. Justices' Act, § 83; Cow. Treat. 353, § 907.

The defendant was not bound to wait longer than ten o'clock for the plaintiff to appear, (Justices' Act, § 17;) and he having failed to appear before the defendant left the office, all the proceedings thereafter had were coram non judice. But Neitzel claims that the watch of the justice was too fast. Were that true (but it is not) he should not be permitted to profit by it, for he made his own selection of a justice before whom to try the case; he should not expect immunity from loss or defeat by the justice erring in giving the time any more than erroneously giving the law. But the justice's time was not too fast, as will be seen by his entry: "Shortly afterwards plaintiff and his attorney came into the office and produced a watch indicating time at ten minutes to ten o'clock, and insisted upon trial of the case, and would risk judgment," etc. Now, if he satisfied the justice that his watch was correct, and the justice's wrong, why did he have to "insist" upon trial, and agree to "risk" judgment before he was permitted to go on with the trial? The pretension is an absurd one. But the justice had no right to try the case, no matter though he may have been mistaken in the time, and afterwards become convinced of such mistake. It was an outrage upon the rights of the defendant for him to take up the case and allow the plaintiff to take judgment after he had misled the defendant by his incorrect statement of the time. The time given by the justice to the defendant must be considered and held to be, for the purpose of this case, the correct time. To hold differently would in effect nullify the law. It is not pretended that the justice was engaged in any other business, nor were both parties present at any time. A defendant may wait longer than one hour for a tardy plaintiff to appear, but is not bound to, and if he chooses to leave, and does leave, the jurisdiction of the justice is at an end. In specifying a condition upon which the justice may postpone the appearance, or exercise discretion, according to well-settled rules for the construction of statutes, all other *386 grounds are denied; and wisely so, for experience proves that discretionary power in the hands of ignorant men, such, unfortunately, as are often chosen to the responsible office of justice of the peace, becomes a weapon of oppression, instead of means for the furtherance of justice.

A second error is that the justice had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the first two items in Neitzel's bill of particulars. The bill of exceptions shows that the "146 feet of fence" and the "22 loads of stone" were a part of the land, and that plaintiff in error committed a trespass upon and injury to Neitzel's land with respect to those items. The action, then, as to these items was an action for "trespass on real estate," and, the amount claimed being more than one hundred dollars, the justice had no jurisdiction. Justices' Act, § 6.

We submit, "Omnia præsumentur esse acta." Broom, Leg. Max. 907; Cow. Treat. §§ 907, 909. A party may waive a trespass and sue for the value of the articles taken. Bernstein v. Smith, 10 Kan. *67. The statements in the justice's transcript about sayings and doings of the parties, form no part of the record. Pennock v. Monroe, 5 Kan. *586; Snauk v. Holland, 6 Kan. *144. The defendant below mistook his remedy. He should have appealed, or proceeded under section 144 of the justices' act. He allowed the justice no opportunity to correct any error, and the district court could not examine the evidence. Coburn v. Weed, 12 Kan. *182; Ayres v. Crum, 13 Kan. *269.

BREWER, J. Neitzel sued Hagaman before a justice of the peace, and obtained judgment for $125.85. Hagaman took the case by petition in error to the district court, and the judgment was affirmed. Of this he now complains, and asks a reversal. The principal question discussed arises upon a statement of facts in the transcript from the justice's docket. It should be noticed that this transcript shows *387 the filing of a bill of particulars, the issue and return of summons, with a *copy of the constable's return upon the writ, a trial, the defendant not appearing, and a judgment. The summons was returnable on the fourth of December, 1873, at 9 A. M. Preliminary to the record of the trial is this statement: "And now, to-wit, on this fourth day of December, 1873, this cause came on for hearing; defendant, being in the justice's office, requested to know what time it was, and was informed by the justice that it was ten minutes past ten o'clock by his watch, whereupon the defendant requested that the case be called. The plaintiff was not present, but had been in a few moments before, about fifteen or twenty minutes to ten o'clock A. M. The justice stated that the constable was now preparing a more suitable room for the trial of this cause, and it would be called in a few moments. Defendant departed, and was not in court again by himself or counsel. Shortly after, the plaintiff entered the justice's office, and claimed that the hour of trial had not arrived, and produced a watch indicating time at ten minutes to ten A. M., and insisted upon trial of this case, and would risk judgment if it should be in his favor. Thereupon defendant was called three times, and did not answer, and was not in court during the trial. Trial had," etc.

Upon this it is contended by Hagaman that he had a right to depend upon the reply of the justice as to the time, and that when the hour for the trial arrived the justice must, if the plaintiff were not present, have dismissed the action, and had no jurisdiction to proceed to a trial thereafter in his (defendant's) absence. On the other hand it is insisted, as a preliminary matter, that this statement of facts is not so presented that any notice can be taken of it. The matters contained in the statement are not matters which properly form a part of the record, and are not preserved in any bill of exceptions. And this we think is correct. The statement is simply one of conversations between the justice and the respective parties. It contains nothing which the statute requires should be entered upon the justice's docket. Justices' Act, § 188. The justice was under no obligations to enter it upon his docket. It was a mere volunteer act on his part. So far from being under obligations to enter

*388 it, he ought not to have done so. He has no right *to burden a transcript with other matters than those the law requires him to place thereon. A party aggrieved by any act or ruling of his may have the same preserved in a bill of exceptions. One was taken in this very case in reference to some other matters, as will hereafter appear. And if a party does not care to avail himself of this right, he has no cause of complaint. The mere fact that this statement is found on the justice's docket gives us no right to examine and act upon it. It must be properly there, being either of those matters the law directs to be entered, or else preserved in a bill of exceptions. McArthur v. Mitchell, 7 Kan. *173; Backus v. Clark, 1 Kan. *303; Altschiel v. Smith, 9 Kan. *90. While we do not think this statement properly before us for decision thereon, we may say that it does not appear but that the justice called the case for trial at exactly 10 o'clock by the correct time; and, further, that if a justice does delay calling a case a few moments past the trial hour, as appears by his watch, to allow for differences in time by different watches, or to have a suitable room prepared for the trial, and notifies a party then present that he will call the case in a few moments, and does so call it, he commits no error so far affecting the substantial rights of such party as to compel a reversal. We do not mean by this that a justice may arbitrarily wait an indefinite time, but simply that an allowance of a few moments, accompanied by notice to a party who is present, works no substantial injury to that party.

The other error complained of is presented in a bill of exceptions. The bill of particulars claimed among other things to recover for 22 loads of stone, and 146 feet of fence. The total claim was $179.35, and included many other articles. Upon the trial the justice received and considered evidence to prove that defendant entered upon the land of plaintiff without his permission, and quarried and carried away a quantity of stone, and also entered, tore down, and carried away certain posts and boards, and that these were the stone and *389 fence sued for, and also received and con*sidered testimony tending to prove an account arising on contract. No objection was made to the introduction of this evidence, and no exceptions taken. Besides, it does not appear that there was any effort to recover for the trespass, but only the value of the articles taken. A party can always waive the trespass and sue for the value of the property taken, and the law will imply a promise to pay. Bernstein v. Smith, 10 Kan. *60.

These being the only matters complained of, the judgment will be affirmed.

HENRY WHEELER and others v. JOHN JOY.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Instructions: General Exceptions. A general exception to a whole charge is not available, unless the whole charge is erroneous, or unless the charge in its general scope or meaning is erroneous.
2. Supreme Court: Error: Should be Shown. Where the complaint in the brief is that the charge was vague and inexplicit, or inconsistent, and counsel fail to point out wherein it was so, this court will make no critical examination of the charge for the purpose of finding out the alleged defects.

Error from Cloud district court.

Action by Joy against Wheeler, Tisdale, Parker, Hawks, and Terry, partners as the "Southwestern Stage Company," to recover damages for injuries sustained by him by the uncoupling and overturning of defendants' stage coach, while plaintiff was being carried therein as a passenger. BREWER, J. This was an action to recover damages for a physical injury. The only errors complained of are thus stated in brief of counsel for plaintiffs in error: "The court erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for mental suffering;" "the charge of the court did not present the law in a clear manner to the jury, but was vague and inexplicit, and tended to obscure the case rather than throw light upon it;" "the charge was inconsistent." So far as these last two matters are concerned, it is not pointed out in the brief or elsewhere wherein the charge was vague and inexplicit, or inconsistent. An examination of the charge does not suggest to us anything to sustain these claims, and the record fails to show that it contains all the instructions given, and as counsel have failed to assist us in the matter, we pass it without further consideration. As to the first objection, it is enough to say that the only exception to the charge was thus taken: "To the giving of which instructions defendants then and there objected and excepted." Now, it is well settled that under such an exception a single portion of the charge cannot be singled out, and for error in it the judgment be reversed; but the charge as a whole, and in its general scope, must Appeal from Johnson district court.

Adams and another were charged before the police judge of the city of Olathe, on the oath of E. M. F., with having "kept open" their dram-shop or saloon, in said city, "on the fourth day of July, 1874," contrary to a certain ordinance passed and approved April 21, 1874. The defendants removed the case by appeal to the district court, where it was tried, at the November term, 1874, upon the following agreed facts: "The plaintiff, the city of Olathe, is now, and was at the time of the filing of the information in this cause, a city of the second class, duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Kansas. On the fourth of July, 1874, said defendants were the proprietors and keepers of a dram-shop in a one-story frame building situated on lot No. 3 in block No. 51, in said city. On said fourth of July, said defendants, E. W. Adams and N. Julien, kept their said dram-shop open, and admitted divers persons to said dram-shop and transacted business in their line as such dram-shop keepers with the persons so admitted. On said fourth of July there was in force in said city an ordinance entitled 'An ordinance to regulate billiard saloons, dram-shops, ball-alleys, and tippling-houses in the city of Olathe, and repealing certain ordinances in conflict therewith,' passed and approved the twenty-first of April, 1874.

<sup>1</sup> The rule here stated held not applicable where the trial court made special findings of fact, and the conclusion of law from said findings was "that the defendant is not guilty as charged." State v. Cumnerford, 16 Kan. 509.

Said ordinance was duly passed and published as required by *392 law, and was, so far as the passage and due publication of *the same is concerned, in full force and effect on the said fourth of July, and still remains unaltered and unrepealed. All facts necessary to warrant the court in finding the said defendants guilty are hereby admitted, saving only the question as to the authority of the said city to pass the said ordinance." On the trial (says the bill of exceptions) "the defendants, by their attorneys, objected to the admission of said ordinance, on the ground that it was and is in conflict with the laws of the state governing cities of the second class, which objection was by the court sustained, and said ordinance was found, held, and adjudged by the court to be in conflict with the laws of the state, and said ordinance was ruled out." The defendants were discharged.

A. Smith Devenney and John J. McKoin, for the City.

The only question which we need consider is as to the legal force of the ordinance for the violation of which the proceedings before the police judge were instituted; that is, whether, under chapter 100 of the Laws of 1872, p. 192, "An act to incorporate cities of the second class," the legislature left it to the city council to fix the amount of fine to be imposed in case of conviction for violating an ordinance, the maximum not to exceed one hundred dollars, (City Charter Act 1872, § 67, p. 212;) in other words, whether the city council could fix a minimum, or whether it was left by the city charter to the tribunal trying the cause to fix the amount of fine in each case at such sum as it should deem proper within the limits of the general law. By the ordinance in question the council fixed the maximum fine at the sum of $100, and minimum fine at $25. The council having established a fixed uniform penalty of one hundred dollars as the greatest fine to be imposed, and the sum of twenty-five dollars as the least, the district court held the ordinance a nullity. And yet the limitations fixed by the ordinance are precisely those prescribed by the dram-shop act, (Gen. St. 400, § 4.)

*393 *We contend the ordinance was not void, being within the terms of the authority granted to the city of Olathe by its charter. Laws 1872, pp. 211, 212, § 67. This section authorizes the city council to prescribe "such fine, not exceeding one hundred dollars, or such imprisonment, not exceeding three months, or both such fine and imprisonment, as may be just for any one offense," etc. Sections 47 and 49 give the council exclusive authority to regulate dram-shops, impose penalties, etc. The legislature have regulated the subject for the whole state as they deemed proper, and the city government have made such local regulations as they thought fit "for the good order and peace of the city." City of Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. *630; Canton v. Nist, 9 Ohio St. 441. If the general law of the state in relation to dram-shops has no application to the case at bar, then we maintain that the sections of the charter referred to authorized the council to legislate in the manner it did by prescribing the minimum fine, and taking the power from the court trying the cause. Legislative power may be conferred on the city, and in such case the council becomes the legislative body of the city; and it is acting as such not less when establishing the minimum as when establishing the maximum of punishment. City of Lansing v. Van Gorder, 24 Mich. 456; State v. Binder, 38 Mo. 450. That the council had the power to establish the sum of twenty-five dollars as the minimum fine, we also refer to Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 271, 278; City of Chicago v. Quimby, 38 Ill. 274.

In Illinois an ordinance was treated as wholly void because it fixed the minimum fine at five dollars, when the general law required it to be three dollars. Petersburg v. Petersburg, 21 Ill. 205. Is not the converse of the proposition true? that is, is not the ordinance valid if state law is followed? In the case at bar the ordinance in question followed the general law.

VALENTINE, J. This was a prosecution by the city of Olathe against E. W. Adams and N. Julien for keeping open a dram-shop on the fourth of July, 1874, in violation of a city ordinance. The *394 prosecution was commenced before the *police judge. The defendants were there found guilty, and they then appealed to the district court. In the district court they were acquitted, and the city now appeals to this court. The city claims that the prosecution is in its nature a criminal action, and we think the city is correct, (Neitzel v. City of Concordia, 14 Kan. *446;) and therefore the city brings the case to this court by appeal, under section 283 of the Criminal Code, (Gen. St. 865,) instead of by petition in error, as is required in civil actions. For the purposes of this case, therefore, we shall assume (and probably correctly) that this is a criminal action; that it is appealable to this court under the Criminal Code; and that it is governed by all the rules pertaining to other criminal actions so far as such rules can be made applicable to this case. The facts of the case, so far as it is necessary to state them, are substantially as follows: A complaint was made on oath, and in writing, charging the defendants with the said offense. The defendants were arraigned upon the charge, and pleaded "not guilty." Trial was had in the district court, before the court, without a jury. The case was submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts; and, for the purposes of this case, we shall assume that the facts showed that the defendants were guilty. "And" (as the record shows) "the court having had the cause under advisement, and having duly considered the issues herein, and the said agreed statement of facts, and being well advised in the premises, finds for the defendants." This finding we think is equivalent to a verdict of "not guilty;" and for the purposes of this case we shall assume that the finding is erroneous. The court then rendered judgment upon this finding for the defendants for costs, and discharged the defendants. The judgment was the only one that could have been rendered upon said finding. The city now appeals to this court, and asks to have said judgment reversed. Can it be done? If the judgment had not followed the finding, of course it could be reversed. State v. Walter, 14 Kan. *375. Or, if this were a civil action, we could ignore the finding of the court below, *395 considering it merely as a conclusion of law from the facts admitted. We could decide the case upon the agreed statement of facts, and could order the proper judgment to be rendered upon the facts agreed to. Brown v. Evans, ante, *88. But, the case being in its nature a criminal action, we have not the same authority to ignore or overrule the finding of the court below. If we should merely set aside the judgment of the court below, the finding would still remain in all its force and vigor, and no other or different judgment could be rendered thereon. The finding would still require the same judgment as has already been rendered. And we know of no authority in this court, or in any other court, to set aside a verdict or finding of "not guilty" in a criminal action. We think it is the universal opinion, both of bench and bar, that a verdict of "not guilty," in a criminal action, ends the case. The defendant could not be tried a second time against his consent; for under section 10 of the bill of rights (Const. Kansas) he cannot "be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense." Now, although the finding of the court below may be founded upon an erroneous view of the law, still we do not see how we can disturb it. The plea of the defendants was "not guilty." The agreed facts showed them, as we have assumed, to be guilty. The court, however, found them not guilty; and, with our understanding of criminal law, this finding is conclusive.

The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

*STATE OF KANSAS v. JAMES D. REEVES.

July Term, 1875.

Officer: Official Oppression: Ignorance of Officer: Criminal Intent.
In a trial upon an information, under section 207 of the crimes act, against a justice of the peace, charging willful and malicious oppression, partiality, misconduct, and abuse of authority, "in requiring an excessive bond on an appeal from a judgment rendered by him, and in refusing to approve a surety on said bond who was in fact sufficient," it is error to instruct the jury that "gross ignorance of law in a case like this amounts to criminal intent."

Appeal from Mitchell district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

A. J. Banta, for appellant.

The verdict was contrary to the evidence and to law. A crime cannot be carved out of the evidence. There must be corruption in office on the part of the justice, and it must be of the same character that would warrant the impeachment of a district judge, or other officer liable to impeachment. 1 Bish. Crim. Law. (5th Ed.) §§ 460, 462. There is no evidence at all that is proof of corruption. One W. O. Smith offered as surety on appeal, and the justice did not think him sufficient. The bond was signed by the surety only. As he was pressed about it, the evidence shows that he inquired of others, and one justice of experience told him he would not take Smith, and another leading citizen told him the same thing; one person told him he thought Smith was good. The evidence, all taken together, simply shows a desire to do what is right, and it can be construed into nothing else. The jury were misled by the instructions of the court, and must have thought that if the bond was in fact sufficient in *397 *their opinion, then the defendant was guilty. The court misdirected the jury in material matter of law. The court gave the following instructions, the defendant excepting: "Gross ignorance of law in a case like this amounts to criminal intent." The effect of the court's instructions is that if defendant was grossly careless or ignorant in the discharge of his official duties, then he is guilty, whether such carelessness or ignorance be in respect to law or fact. The instruction above copied states as a proposition of law that, as to the official acts of justices, gross ignorance on their part as to their duties is a crime. The language of the court is, "amounts to criminal intent;" but the court is kind enough to say to the jury that, if they have "a reasonable doubt" of the gross ignorance of defendant, they may acquit, impliedly saying if they had an abiding conviction of his ignorance, they must find guilty; and to make matters worse, the court leaves the jury to figure out the best they can what gross ignorance is. This is indeed strange law. The truth is that in cases of this kind the gist of the offense is the corrupt mind of the justice. This mental condition the state must prove, and the burden is on the state at all stages of the trial; and where a mental condition is the gist of the offense, then ignorance or mistake as to law or facts does avail. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, (5th Ed.) §§ 297, 300. To be guilty, the justice must have known the law, and willfully, and with intent to oppress, refused to comply with it.

G. W. Bertram, Co. Atty., for the State.

The evidence all goes to show that defendant, Reeves, was unwilling to have his action in the suit before him (as justice of the peace) reviewed by the district court. In the first place he refused to sign a bill of exceptions to his ruling as such justice, after having his attention repeatedly called to the law, and he even went so far as to tell the parties, as is shown from the evidence, that he could be compelled to sign the bill by a writ of mandamus, showing a willful determination not to do so, unless so compelled. A good and *398 sufficient *bond on appeal was then offered, and he pretended not to be satisfied that the surety offered was a man of property, and demanded a certificate as to the ownership of land which the surety claimed. This was produced, showing a clear title to land, and still he was a "doubting Thomas," and wanted other names on bond, well knowing that the ten days would expire before they could be procured. If a party must get such names as a justice of the peace may dictate to an appeal-bond, then the defendant is a model officer. A justice can require a surety to justify as to his property, and perhaps demand other evidence; but where such proof is furnished he has no alternative but to approve the bond. The evidence all shows that the defendant acted willfully. The instructions considered together are a fair charge, and there is nothing in them for the defendant to complain of. The one most prominent of those is the one on "gross ignorance." See 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 643, 679.

BREWER, J. Defendant was convicted in the district court of Mitchell county upon an information charging "willful and malicious oppression, partiality, misconduct, and abuse of authority, in his official capacity of a justice of the peace," under section 207 of the crimes act, (Gen. St. 363.) That section reads: "Every person exercising or holding any office of public trust, who shall be guilty of willful and malicious oppression," etc. The facts, as they appear, were that the defendant, a justice of the peace, after rendering a judgment against one Fred. E. Smith for $26.58 debt, and $13 costs, required a bond for appeal in the sum of $350, and refused to approve the surety offered. He claimed that he was advised by plaintiff's counsel, and so believed, that the bond must be large enough to cover costs in the district court, and that he was also advised by several disinterested parties that the surety offered was wholly insufficient. Upon the trial the court gave this instruction: "Gross ignorance of law in a case like this amounts to criminal intent."

*399 The same doctrine was recognized in several other instructions. Is this the law? If it is, it makes the office of a justice of the peace attendant with more dangers than is ordinarily supposed. These officers are seldom lawyers; they are chosen, not on account of their knowledge of the law, but on account of their supposed good sense. It may be, and often is, that they are deplorably ignorant of the decisions of the courts, the accepted construction of statutes, and the well-settled rules of evidence and practice. They may be "grossly ignorant" as to these matters. Shall they, intending to do right, and exercising the best judgment they have, be punished criminally for their gross ignorance? Take this very case. The bond required was unnecessarily large, but the statute does not fix the amount. It says it shall be "in a sum not less than fifty dollars, nor less than double the amount of the judgment and costs." If the justice, on the suggestion of plaintiff's counsel, makes it large enough to cover the possible costs in the district court, or even larger than was necessary for that, and acts in good faith, shall he be punished criminally for his error? Or if, in the same good faith, he rejects a surety in fact good, but whom he believes from the information he has received to be insufficient, must he be fined, or sent to the county jail, for his error? We cannot think this is the law. The grossness of the error may be a circumstance tending to show an intent to do wrong,—may perhaps in some cases be sufficient to sustain a finding of such intent; but that is as far as the law will go. It is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the erroneous ruling indicates ignorance of the law, or an intent to do wrong. If the latter, it may be criminal. If the former, not. Gross ignorance is not, in a case like this, the equivalent of a criminal intent. It is, by the statute, only "willful and malicious" conduct that renders a party guilty; and no matter how ignorant he may have been, or how grossly he may have erred, he has not violated the statute, unless his acts were willfully and maliciously wrong. See State v. McDonald, 4 Har. (Del.) 555; State v. Porter, Id. 556; Com. *v. Shed, 1 Mass. 227; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, (3d Ed.) §§ 299, 320; Whart. Amer. Crim. Law, 833, 836; Clark v. Spicer, 6 Kan. *440.

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial.

STATE OF KANSAS v. HARVEY BROWN.

July Term, 1875.

1. Jurors: Challenges for Cause: Opinion of Juror. In a criminal prosecution for murder, while the jury were being impaneled, one of the jurors, upon an examination as to his competency to serve as a juror, stated "that he had formed the opinion that the deceased was killed, and that the defendant killed him," and nothing further was shown with reference to the competency of said juror; and the defendant then challenged said juror for cause, and the court overruled the challenge. Held, that the court erred.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Certain parties called as jurors testified on their voir dire that they had heard or read of the matters charged in the information, and had formed opinions thereon; but, it appearing from the whole of their examinations that such opinions were not settled or fixed, and that they could give full and fair consideration to all the testimony, and be guided solely by it in their conclusions, it is held that the challenges were properly overruled. State v. Spaulding, 24 Kan. 5. See, also, State v. Medlicott, 9 Kan. 176, and note.

2. ———. And, the defendant having exhausted all his peremptory challenges in said case, the error will be considered material, although said juror was afterwards discharged by the court on one of the defendant's peremptory challenges.

Appeal from Atchison district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

F. D. Mills, for appellant.

S. H. Glenn, Co. Atty., for the State.

VALENTINE, J. The defendant, Harvey Brown, was charged *401 with killing and murdering one William H. Phillips. *The charge was murder in the first degree. The defendant was tried, and found guilty of murder in the second degree. After he was sentenced, he brought the case to this court on appeal. Several errors are assigned, but it will not be necessary to consider many of them.

Among other assignments of error, the defendant claims that the court below erred in impaneling the jury. The record shows that, "upon the examination of said jurors touching their competency to serve as jurors in said cause, L. S. Howe, one of said jurors, answered in response to the question whether he had formed or expressed an opinion upon any material fact in the case, that he had formed the opinion that Phillips, the deceased, was killed, and that Brown (the defendant) killed him." And, again, "the question was asked said juror in the following manner and form: 'Have you formed or expressed an opinion that Phillips, the deceased, was killed, and that Brown, the prisoner, killed him?' and the said juror answered that he had so formed an opinion." Said juror was then challenged for cause, but the court overruled the challenge. Afterwards, however, the defendant challenged said juror peremptorily, and he was discharged on the peremptory challenge. The defendant exhausted all his peremptory challenges. The foregoing is all that the record shows concerning said juror.

Section 10 of the bill of rights of the constitution provides that a defendant in a criminal action shall have the right to be tried "by an impartial jury;" and section 205 of the Criminal Code (Gen. St. 853) provides that "it shall be a good cause of challenge to a juror that he has formed or expressed an opinion on the issue, or any material fact to be tried." We think the court below erred. The question whether the defendant killed Phillips was a "material fact to be tried." It was, indeed, one of the principal facts in this case.

The question of the competency of jurors, as involved in this case, differs widely from the question concerning the same subject decided in the case of State v. Medlicott, 9 Kan. *257. There is nothing in this case that tends to show that the opinion of the juror *402 amounted only to an impression, *slight or otherwise. There is nothing that tends to show that the opinion was founded merely upon newspaper articles or rumor. And there is nothing which tends to show that the opinion was hypothetical, conditional, indefinite, or uncertain. It would seem from the record that the opinion was in fact an opinion, and that it was definite and absolute. We have no disposition to disturb in the least the rule enunciated by the court in the Medlicott Case. But this case differs so materially from that case that, while this court held that there was no error in impaneling the jury in that case, we must hold that there was error in impaneling the jury in this case; and, as the defendant exhausted all his peremptory challenges, we must hold that the error was material, although said juror was finally discharged by the court on one of the defendant's peremptory challenges.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

STATE OF KANSAS v. FRANK WHITBY.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

Burglary: Elements of Crime. To constitute the crime of burglary there must be an entry, as well as a breaking, of the building; and an information is fatally defective which fails to charge an entry, and a judgment thereon must be arrested.

Appeal from Crawford district court.

At the January term, 1875, of the district court, Whitby was arraigned for plea upon an information filed against him, by which information it was intended to charge defendant with the crime of burglary in the first degree. Defendant pleaded "guilty" to the *403 facts charged, and then moved in *arrest of judgment, for that said "information did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense." This plea was overruled, and defendant was sentenced to imprisonment.

<sup>1</sup> Burglary in the night-time, as defined by section 63 of the crimes act, does not include burglary in the day-time, as defined by section 69 of the same act, State v. Behee, 17 Kan. 402; burglary under section 68 of the crimes act may be committed in a "saloon building," State v. Comstock, 20 Kan. 650; insufficient information, State v. Fockler, 22 Kan. 542; describing manner of breaking and entry, State v. McAnulty, 26 Kan. 533; question for jury, see State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 498; the lifting of a latch of a closed door, and the pushing open of the door, with the intent expressed in the statute, is a sufficient breaking to constitute burglary, State v. Groning, 33 Kan. 18; S. C. 5 Pac. Rep. 446; evidence of finding of goods, Cummins v. People, 8 N. W. Rep. 305; possession of goods taken is not prima facie evidence that the possessor committed the burglary when they were taken, Stewart v. People, 8 N. W. Rep. 863; what information must state, Hall v. People, 5 N. W. Rep. 449; allegation of being armed held surplusage, Harris v. People, 6 N. W. Rep. 677; defective indictment, People v. Stewart, 7 N. W. Rep. 71; imprisonment held not excessive, State v. Foster, 7 N. W. Rep. 643; State v. Lacy, Id. 646; inference from possession of goods, Neubrandt v. State, 9 N. W. Rep. 824;

J. T. Bridgens and M. A. Wood, for appellant.

The record shows that Whitby, in the absence of his counsel, pleaded guilty to a certain information filed against him, and was sentenced to imprisonment for the term of twelve years at hard labor in the penitentiary, and that such sentence was pronounced on overruling a motion in arrest of judgment. Does this information charge a public offense against this appellant? We think it does not. The information contains no allegation that appellant ever broke, or attempted to break, into the dwelling-house of the person therein named; nor that he entered into such house. It does not charge an assault upon the person of D. A., named in the information. It only charges an assault upon the dwelling-house of the person therein named. Properly construed, it does not charge the appellant with burglary, nor with rape, nor with the intent to commit either crime, nor with the violation of any statute of this state.

A. A. Fletcher, Co. Atty., and A. M. F. Randolph, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BREWER, J. Appellant was sentenced to the penitentiary for the term of twelve years as upon conviction upon an information for burglary in the first degree. A motion in arrest of judgment was overruled, and this is the error complained of. The attorney general, after an examination of the information, very properly concedes the error. The information is for burglary, but fails to charge any entry. It charges that defendant, "feloniously and burglariously, forcibly burst and did break, with intent," etc. It is well settled that to *404 constitute burglary there must be both a breaking and *an entry. Our statute makes no change in the law in that respect. The motion in arrest ought therefore to have been sustained, and the judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to sustain the motion in arrest. The defendant will be returned from the penitentiary, and delivered over to the jailer of Crawford county to abide the further order of the district court. Under sections 279 and 280 of the Criminal Code a new evidence held not to support information that prisoner broke and entered a store, not adjoining to or occupied with a dwelling-house, with felonious intent, Moore v. People, 11 N. W. Rep. 415; indictment held sufficient, State v. Ruby, 15 N. W. Rep. 848; possession of goods recently burglarized, unexplained, will not of itself justify a conviction, State v. Tilton, 18 N. W. Rep. 716; such evidence is admissible, State v. Franks, 19 N. W. Rep. 832; People v. Carroll, 20 N. W. Rep. 66; Same v. Same, Id. 575; degrees of offense—description—value of goods, State v. Kane, 23 N. W. Rep. 488; evidence of identity—evidence that defendant knew that there was money in the house admissible, State v. Kepper 23 N. W. Rep. 304; evidence of ownership of building—variance, People v. McGilver, 7 Pac. Rep. 49; evidence of attempt at another burglary, Id.; under the Montana statute, in order to constitute burglary in the day-time, there must be a breaking and entering with intent to commit a felony, and the facts which make up the constituent elements of the felony, and which show the intent to commit the same, must be alleged in the indictment, Territory v. Duncan, 6 Pac. Rep. 858; at common law and under Nevada statutes, State v. Dan, 4 Pac. Rep. 336; allegation of value, People v. Stapleton, 3 Pac. Rep. 6; description of building, People v. Young, 3 Pac. Rep. 813.

information can be filed, and the defendant put upon trial thereunder.

STATE OF KANSAS v. PERRY NULF.

July Term, 1875.

1. Information: "Prosecuting Attorney." An information in a criminal action, signed and filed by the proper prosecuting officer, who describes himself in such information as "prosecuting attorney," and not as "county attorney," will be held sufficient if it is in all other respects sufficient.
2. ———: Verification by County Attorney. The verification of an information by a prosecuting attorney, upon information and belief, is sufficient.<sup>1</sup> Appeal from Ottawa district court.

At the May term, 1875, of the district court, Nulf was found guilty of the offense of grand larceny, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for three years.

J. G. Mohler and Bishop Perkins, for appellant.

R. F. Thompson, Co. Atty., for the State.

The information was prepared and signed by the proper officer. *405 Gen. St. 284, § 136. This section makes the county *attorney the prosecuting officer for all criminal actions in which the state is a party. In the Criminal Code the prosecuting officer is everywhere designated as the "prosecuting attorney." Now, as the county attorney is the only prosecuting officer in criminal cases, the terms "county attorney" and "prosecuting attorney" are synonymous titles when used after the prosecuting officer's name in those cases. Section 67 of the Criminal Code designates the "prosecuting attorney" as the officer by whom informations may be filed, and directs that he should subscribe his name thereto. This last requirement is probably for the purpose of showing the court that the information was filed by the proper officer, and there is nothing in this section, or in our statutes, that requires that the title of the prosecuting officer should be annexed to his name. The county attorney is an officer of the district court, of which facts the court is bound to take judicial notice. Norvell v. McHenry, 1 Mich. 227; Anderson v. Bell, 9 Cal. 315; State v. Postlewait, 14 Iowa, 446; Masterson v. Le Clair, 4 Minn. 163, (Gil. 108;) Thompson v. Haskell, 21 Ill. 215. It follows, then, that if an information is preferred in and signed by the name of the county attorney, it is all that is required; and, if that name should be followed by the title "Prosecuting Attorney" or "County Attorney," this, while it is unnecessary, would only be additional evidence that the defendant was being prosecuted by the proper officer.

That the information is properly verified, see section 3, p. 279, Laws 1871, which provides that the county attorney can verify an information upon "information and belief." This information is verified by the county attorney upon "knowledge and belief." Webster defines "information" as "news or advice communicated by word or writing; intelligence; notion; knowledge derived from reading or instruction." And of "knowledge" the same authority says: "That which is known; that which is gained and preserved by knowing; actual acquaintance gained by learning." Knowledge, then, is derived from information; and, if a party is in possession of *406 the former, he must also have the latter; and, when verified upon knowledge, the verification rests upon information, fulfilling the letter and spirit of the law.

VALENTINE, J. This was a criminal prosecution for grand larceny. It is insisted on the part of the defendant (who is appellant) that the court below erred in refusing to quash the information filed in this case, and also in refusing to arrest the judgment. The grounds upon which this claim is based are as follows: (1) The information is not signed by the proper officer; (2) the information is not properly verified.

The information was signed by "R. F. Thompson, Prosecuting Attorney," and he is described in the body of the information as the prosecuting attorney of Ottawa county, state of Kansas. Under the laws of Kansas all criminal informations must be signed and filed "by the prosecuting attorney of the proper county, as informant," (Gen. St. 831, 832, §§ 67, 68, 71;) and also, under the laws of Kansas, the "prosecuting attorney" is always the "county attorney," (Gen. St. 283, 284, §§ 135-137;) that is, every criminal action prosecuted in the name of the state must be prosecuted by the county attorney, who is the public prosecutor. Therefore, for the purpose of prosecuting criminal actions, the prosecuting attorney and the county attorney is one and the same person. Besides, the first statute above cited, which recognizes the public prosecutor as "prosecuting attorney," was passed nearly six years after the other, which gives to him the title of "county attorney." Therefore, in our opinion, a criminal information signed by the public prosecutor as "prosecuting attorney" is equally as valid as though it should be signed by him as "county attorney." He is both. But would the information be void if he should merely sign his name to the information, and give no description of his official character? The statute does not in terms require that he should give any description of his official *407 *character. The description does not seem to be very material; for, even where he described himself as county attorney for the wrong county, the information was nevertheless held sufficient, (State v. Tannahill, 4 Kan. *117, *118;) and the district court must always take judicial notice of the official character and identity of the public prosecutor. See authorities cited in appellant's brief, and 5 U. S. Dig. (1st Ser.) 490, pars. 151-163. There is no pretense in this case that the information was not signed by the proper public prosecutor. But, even if there were, it would not be tenable, for the district court recognized him as such. He prosecuted the defendant until the defendant was finally convicted and sentenced, and he is described in other portions of the record as "R. F. Thompson, county attorney of Ottawa county;" and there is nothing in the record that tends to show that he was not the county attorney. We therefore think that the information in this respect was sufficient.

"The verification of an information by a prosecuting attorney, upon information and belief, is sufficient." State v. Montgomery, 8 Kan. *351; Laws 1871, p. 279, § 3.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

July Term, 1875.

1. Venue: Change of, in Criminal Cases. A motion for a change of venue was supported by the affidavits of the accused and two others, showing facts that made out a prima facie cause for a change of venue; but the state filed over ninety affidavits controverting the conclusions of those of the accused. The trial court did not err in refusing a change of venue.<sup>2</sup>

Information for murder. Trial, and verdict of guilty, at the November term, 1874. A motion for a new trial was made, and con-

<sup>2</sup> Before a court is justified in sustaining an application for a change of venue on account of the prejudice of the inhabitants of the county, it must affirmatively appear from the showing that there is such a feeling and prejudice pervading the community as will be reasonably certain to prevent a fair and impartial trial. tinued until the March term, 1875, when a new trial was refused, and defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for twenty years.

Stillings & Fenlon, J. G. Mohler, and J. G. Spivey, for appellant.

As appears by the record, the information charged that appellant did, on the third of November, 1874, murder one Thomas Anderson. It appears by the record that on the same day another information was filed against said appellant, in the same court, charging appellant with the murder of one William N. Anderson. It further appears from the testimony preserved in the record that on the day mentioned in the informations the persons mentioned in the two informations were shot by appellant; that Thomas Anderson died almost instantly, and without uttering a word; that William N. Anderson lived for fifteen hours after the shooting, and prior to his death made certain statements which are called "dying declarations." Ten days after the alleged homicide, and two days after the filing of the informations, the appellant was brought into court to answer to the said informations, and thereupon moved for a change of venue, which was refused. An exception to such ruling was taken by the appellant. The case, being then ordered to proceed, resulted in a verdict against the appellant of "murder in the second degree." A motion was duly filed for a new trial, the hearing of which, and all and on the thirty-first of March, 1875, the motion was overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict. It further appears by the record that, at the same time Thomas Anderson was killed, William N. Anderson was also killed under precisely the same circumstances; also that at the November term of court, immediately after the homicide, the appellant was, against his protest, tried in Saline county, and convicted of murder in the second degree for the killing of Thomas Anderson, and was subsequently tried, in March, 1875, for the murder of William N. Anderson, and was acquitted.

The evidence shows that, when the appellant was tried for the killing of Thomas Anderson, the public mind in Saline county was prejudiced, embittered, and poisoned against the appellant to such an extent that a fair trial could not have been had; and the newspapers, whose articles are copied in the record, do not state one single fact in the case, as shown conclusively by the sworn evidence. We submit as part of the history of this case, and a fact to be seriously considered by thoughtful men everywhere, that it is about time that the press, beneficial as it is, should in some way be made to comprehend that the life, liberty, and character of a citizen are not thoughtlessly or ignorantly to be jeopardized by it. It is in this case, as shown by the sworn evidence introduced under all the guards and protections of the law, absolutely appalling to read the statements made by the papers regarding this transaction; and considering their tremendous influence on a moral community, which looks to the home press for facts of local importance, it is not, perhaps, to be wondered at that in November, and but a few days after the affair, a jury, infected by the general horror produced by these newspaper articles, should convict on facts and circumstances which four months afterwards, when the fever had passed away, convinced the calmer minds of the same community that the prisoner on trial was innocent of crime. The strange peculiarity of this case is this: that the killing of Thomas

Anderson, when tried therefor in November, was murder, but *410 the killing of William *N. Anderson, under precisely the same circumstances, done at the same time, by the same person, with the same weapon, when tried therefor during the succeeding March, was no crime at all.

The district court erred in not granting the motion for a change of venue. This court will notice that the motion for a new trial was not argued till after the trial for the murder of William N. Anderson, in March, 1875. The evidence introduced on the hearing of the motion for a change of venue at least tended to show a state of feeling existing in the community, during the prevalence of which, and for that cause, it might reasonably be supposed it would be dangerous to the prisoner to be tried. The newspaper articles, conclusively proved false and groundless; the proof of the acts of the lawless mob who attempted the life of the prisoner, and attacked the jail of the county in the presence of the judge of the court, and during term-time,—are certainly some evidence tending to show the existence of that state of feeling in which and by which the law, in its justice and humanity, declares no citizen shall be tried. As to these facts, there is no counter-evidence. A number of persons, residents of the county, and doubtless reputable citizens, file their affidavits to the effect that in their opinion a fair trial could be had; and this is all the answer. It is only for convenience sake that the law provides that a person charged with crime shall be tried in the county in which it is alleged the crime was committed. The great purpose and design of the law is that a fair, impartial trial shall be had; and where that cannot be had, or there is rational ground to believe it cannot be had, the law intends, proposes, designs that the venue shall be changed. Of course, a discretion is vested in the trial judge, but this must be a judicial discretion; and, when abused, as we respectfully submit it was in this case, the right of the party injured is to submit the case to this tribunal. There is no arbitrary power granted to the trial judge, no discretion involving the life or liberty of the citizen, that is not subject to revision by this court. It is not unknown to the stu-*411 dent of the judicial history of our *own country, as well as that from which we derive the principles and practices of our jurisprudence, that judges, even, have trembled before or at the sound of the popular howl. And the right and the power and the duty of this, the highest judicial authority of the state, and the last resource of the citizen, to control the action of the trial judge, cannot be doubted; and we submit that when this court takes into consideration the evidence submitted on the hearing of the motion, and the other fact exhibited by the record of the acquittal of the prisoner on another trial at a subsequent time, on the same facts, it must (as it seems to us) be apparent that the first conviction was obtained, not on the evidence, but by reason of the existing prejudice in the community. If facts such as are shown by the record here,—the false newspaper articles, the mob, and the violence attempted and perpetrated on the public officials and the public buildings, the verdict of an able jury on the same facts at a subsequent period,—if all these do not make out a case for a change of venue as contemplated by the statute, what in the name of reason would make out a case as so contemplated?

The court erred in admitting the so-called "dying declaration" of William N. Anderson. There was no sufficient preliminary proof made that the person making the declaration was in extremis. State v. Gillick, 7 Iowa, 287; State v. Nash, Id. 347. We submit that there is no evidence in this case to show that, at the time William N. Anderson made the statement, he was then under a sense of impending dissolution. The fact that he said he did not expect to live, or words to that import, and bid good-bye to the boys, is certainly not sufficient to show that the last hope of life had fled; and that condition of mind must be shown, under the authorities, before any dying declaration can be received in evidence. See 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 156, 158, 162, 346; 3 Phil. Ev. § 236; State v. Medlicott, 9 Kan. *257. It is apparent from the testimony of Dr. Stearns that the person making the declaration was not in possession of sound mental faculties at the time such declaration was made. The mental *412 condition of the declarant must be such as would *warrant a court in permitting his testimony if sworn in court. It is shown by the evidence that William N. Anderson, when the declaration was being made, was at least half unconscious, and under the influence of morphine. No such witness could have been allowed in open court to testify. The declaration made was verbal, and that introduced in evidence was the written memorandum of the person who heard it made. The record shows that the whole declaration made by the person was not reduced to writing, but only that part which the witness Cunningham thought was necessary to write out. The person making the declaration never saw or read or heard read or signed the paper received in evidence, or knew its contents. A written paper made by Cunningham—a mere memorandum of his, not of what the declarant said, but of that part of what he said which Cunningham thought material, not dictated by the declarant, not seen or read by the declarant, not read to him, signed by him, or assented to by him, of the contents of which memorandum the declarant had no knowledge—is offered and received in evidence as declarant's "dying declaration." We imagine the bare statement of this is sufficient, and we challenge the judicial records of the world to produce any precedent for such ruling.

The dying declaration of William N. Anderson, made fifteen hours after the death of Thomas Anderson, even if not subject to any of the objections heretofore made, is not competent evidence against the defendant upon his trial on an information for the murder of Thomas Anderson. The exception in favor of dying statements, in cases of homicide, is confined solely to the statements of the person whose death is the subject-matter of investigation. This is the settled rule in this country and in England. But it is probable cases can be found which in the slightest degree depart from this rule; and these, when examined, do not really depart from the rule. It will not be claimed here, we presume, that this statement was part of the res gestæ. And it leaves the bald, naked proposition, for the first *413 time affirmed by any court since murder trials *have been conducted according to known rules of evidence, that the statement of a person whose death is not the subject of inquiry, not under oath, not in the presence of the accused, not subject to cross-examination, not subject to the pains and penalties of perjury, or subject to civil damages, may be had in evidence against the accused. If this be the law, to his enduring honor be it said, a Kansas judge has first discovered it. If William N. Anderson's statement, so taken, could be read in evidence, why not the statement of a hundred others who might claim that they were present at the time of the homicide; and, if competent when made fifteen hours after the act of killing, why not fifteen days or fifteen years? If the only fact necessary to make his statement competent was that he was in extremis, in articulo mortis, then, if made by him twenty years after the killing, it would still be competent, if he then made it under like circumstances. If he could do so, of course it follows that twenty or a hundred others could at different periods, under like sense of impending death, do the same. This doctrine, carried to its logical result, would break down all the barriers which the wisdom of the judiciary and legislation of ages has enacted for the protection of the citizen. Taking the case all in all, its history and surroundings, our duty to our client justifies us in the assertion that the trial, verdict, judgment, and sentence combined, are a gross judicial outrage, and we confidently appeal to this court for the right which has been denied us elsewhere. This court has heretofore said, (Horne v. State, 1 Kan. *42:) "We have no right to consider probabilities in reference to a single case when called upon to apply the general principles of established law, and to register a precedent for the future action of courts. We perform a single and unmixed duty when we declare, upon the call of the accused, what are his legal rights." And in numerous cases, even against popular clamor, this court has laid deep and firm the just principle of the law in this state, that no man shall suffer unless in accordance with law. The cases of Horne v. State, 1 Kan. *42; Smith v. State, Id. *365; Craft v. State, *414 *3 Kan. *450; State v. Medlicott, 9 Kan. *257; State v. Reddick, 7 Kan. *143, and other leading cases,—are familiar to the profession and the people, and the principles that underlie them all are the principles of the civilized administration of criminal justice, which may not in this age be set aside.

A. M. F. Randolph, Atty. Gen., for the State.

As to the error first alleged, we submit that the record shows to a moral certainty that, when the appellant was tried for the killing of Thomas Anderson, the public mind in Saline county was not “prejudiced, embittered, and poisoned” against him to such an extent that he did not and could not have a fair and impartial trial in said county. The affidavits of Bohan, Fitzpatrick, and Going, in support of the motion for a change of venue, are utterly overwhelmed by the opposing testimony of ninety citizens of Saline county, representing each and every one of the thirteen townships thereof, said affidavits being to the effect that in the several townships of said county there was no undue excitement or bitterness of feeling over the killing of Thomas and William N. Anderson by the said Barney Bohan; that these three persons were not generally known in said county outside of Brookville, in the western part thereof, and in its vicinity, and in Salina; and that there was no prejudice against said Bohan so that he could not then have a fair and impartial trial in said county. These affidavits show that the jury and the inhabitants of Saline county were not, as it is alleged, “infected by a general horror produced by the newspaper articles” embodied in Bohan’s affidavit. The articles were generally calm and temperate in their tone, and did not seek to prejudice Bohan’s case. The feeling against Bohan was mostly confined to the personal friends of the Andersons.

We submit that the court did not err in admitting the so-called declarations of William N. Anderson. There was sufficient preliminary proof that the said Anderson was in extremis at the time of his making said declarations, and that they were made under a *415 sense of impending death; also, *that he was conscious of his condition at the time of his making such declarations, and that all that was relevant to the shooting was exactly taken down by Cunningham. As to the objection that the statement was not read and signed by the declarant, see the following authorities: 1 Greenl. Ev. § 161; State v. Nettlebush, 20 Iowa, 257, 260; State v. Tweedy, 11 Iowa, 350–359; Collier v. State, 20 Ark. 36, 45; People v. Glenn, 10 Cal. 32, 36, 37; Beets v. State, 1 Meigs, 106, 107; Com. v. Casey, 11 Cush. 417; Com. v. Cooper, 5 Allen, 495; McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401; Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587; Johnson v. State, Id. 618; State v. Peace, 1 Jones, 251; State v. Tilghman, 11 Ired. 513; State v. Arnold, 13 Ired. 184; Moore v. State, 12 Ala. 764; People v. Grunzig, 1 Park. Crim. R. 299.

As to the objection that the dying declaration of William N. Anderson is not competent evidence against Bohan upon his trial on an information for the murder of Thomas Anderson, we submit that it was properly received. The killing of Thomas Anderson was inseparably connected with the killing of William N. Anderson as a part of the res gestæ. The killing of both brothers was all one transaction. The facts and circumstances attending their deaths linked them together in their last hours as closely as if they were the Siamese twins. State v. Terrell, 12 Rich. 321, 329; Rex v. Baker, 2 Moody & R. 53; 1 Greenl. Ev. 156, note; State v. Wilson, 23 La. Ann. 558.

We submit, further, that if the declaration in writing of William N. Anderson should be held to have been improperly admitted, then that this error is wholly insufficient to reverse the judgments herein. Said statement contains nothing whatever but cumulative evidence. Each and all the facts contained therein were otherwise fully established by competent evidence in the case, mainly by the testimony of Bohan himself.

KINGMAN, C. J. The appellant was tried for the murder of Thomas Anderson, and found guilty of murder in the second degree, and brings the case to this court by appeal. In the argument attention is called to two errors of the court below. These alleged errors are—First, in not granting the motion for a change of venue; and, second, in admitting the so-called dying declaration of William N. Anderson in evidence.

Did the court err in refusing to order a change of venue? The application was supported by the affidavits of the appellant, the sheriff, and the acting jailer of the county. These affidavits made out a prima facie case for removal; but the state read a great number (over ninety) affidavits from citizens of each of the townships of the county, abundantly showing that there was no such state of feeling generally prevailing throughout the county as would prevent the accused from having a fair and impartial trial therein, or would even make it difficult to obtain an impartial jury for the trial. Outside the village of Brookville, where the accused and the deceased had resided, and been generally known, there seems to have been no more feeling than usually prevails in any community where there is a homicide. Two lives were taken by violence. The better feelings of men were shocked by the event. Some intemperance of expression may be expected in such cases from men; but it is obvious that where that feeling existed it created no strong prejudice against the accused. The extracts from the two papers at Salina, while they, in several important respects, stated the facts more harshly against the accused than the testimony justified, yet they, at the same time, cautioned their readers that the statements made were gathered from reports, and must not be considered as being reliable, and that it was the duty of all to wait till the case was heard before forming their opinions. With this caution before the reader, the mistakes as to the facts would hardly create a prejudice against the accused in the minds of fair men. There were articles in the Brookville paper strongly tending to inflame the public mind, and perhaps so intended; but that paper had little circulation in the county outside of Brookville, and in several of the townships was not known at all. Following the decision in the case of State v. Horne, 9 Kan. *119, we are of the opinion that there was no error in refusing a change of venue.

*417 *Was there error in admitting the dying declaration of William N. Anderson? It is so urged on various grounds, the principal of which are these: Because the preliminary proof did not sufficiently show that the person making the declaration was certain that the hand of death was on him; that he was not in possession of sound mental faculties at the time such declaration was made; that all the declarant said was not reduced to writing, but only that part that the writer deemed relevant; and chiefly because the dying declaration of William N. Anderson, made hours after the death of Thomas Anderson, is not competent evidence against the accused upon his trial on an information for the murder of Thomas Anderson only. As our conclusion on the last point suggested is decisive in the case, the consideration of the other points may be waived; especially as their decision depends upon questions of fact raised upon the record, rather than upon controverted points of law.

The facts of the case bearing upon the question under consideration are substantially these: A little before 4 o'clock A. M. on the third of November, 1874, the appellant shot Thomas Anderson and William N. Anderson. The shots (four in number) were in rapid succession, but a brief time intervening between the first and last shots. Of the wounds then inflicted Thomas Anderson died almost instantly, without uttering a word. William N. Anderson lived about seventeen hours, and some time about noon made the statement admitted as a dying declaration. The appellant was tried on an information for the murder of Thomas Anderson only.

On these facts the question arises, can the dying declaration of one person be received as proof of guilt against a party charged with murdering some other person? In State v. Medlicott, 9 Kan. *283, the rule on this point was thus stated: "Such declarations, therefore, are admissible only when the death of the person who made the declaration is the subject of the charge, and where the circumstances of the death are the subject of the dying declaration." In that case the question involved was whether the deceased was in the *418 full belief that he was in articulo mortis when he made the declaration; and the attention of the court was mainly directed to that question, and the part quoted need not have been stated. The court, therefore, feels no such embarrassment on account of what was said in that case as will interfere with a full examination of the question now. In 1 Phil. Ev. 287, the rule is laid down thus: "Such declarations are generally admissible only where the death of the declarant is the subject of the inquiry, and where the circumstances of the death are the subject of the dying declaration;" and to the same effect the rule is laid down in the decisions generally. In a note to section 156, 1 Greenl. Ev., Mr. Redfield states that this evidence is not received upon any other ground than that of necessity, in order to prevent murder going unpunished; and that a misapprehension of the true grounds on which such testimony can be received has sometimes led courts into error, as in England, where at one time such declarations were admitted in other than murder cases. But these decisions have been overruled as not correctly stating the law. The admission of this kind of testimony is an exception to the general rule that excludes hearsay testimony. Its admission can be justified only on the ground of absolute necessity, growing out of the fact that the murderer, by putting the witness, and generally the sole witness, of his crime beyond the power of the court, by killing him, shall not thereby escape the consequences of his crime. On no other ground can the admission of such testimony be justified. It is true that sometimes courts have given, as the reasons for its admission, some of those limitations that have been established as safeguards to prevent the rule from being abused. Such statements are not sound, and are likely to lead to confusion, and in some cases they undoubtedly have done so. Necessity, then, being the only ground on which such testimony can be admitted, it remains to be seen whether that necessity exists so generally, or to so great an extent, where the death of any one else than the declarant is the subject of the inquiry, as to justify the adoption of

Cases may be suggested where the necessity appears to be strong. Thus, where a murder is committed, and a material witness of the crime, but not affected by it, and by whom alone it can be proven, is dying, and in that hour makes a declaration of the facts which he knows, and which took place months before, this declaration is made under circumstances equivalent to the sanction of an oath; but the accused cannot cross-examine,—cannot call attention to other material facts not thought of by the declarant. No one will contend that this declaration can be given in evidence. The necessity exists, but it applies to a single case, and not to a class of cases, and therefore should not be made an exception to the rule excluding hearsay testimony. It would be as difficult to suggest a case where, as in this, two men are killed at or near the same time, that any necessity exists for the admission of the statement of the one whose death was not the subject of the inquiry, as it is in any other criminal case where a material witness is dead. This case is a fair illustration. If the declaration of William N. Anderson was necessary to convict the accused, then it could have been used on the trial for the murder of William N. Anderson. The accused was as guilty of his murder as of that of Thomas. There is, then, no necessity for extending the exception further than has already been done. Once break down the barriers established by the wisdom of our law, and extend the exception beyond the reason that permitted it, and it would let in a most dangerous species of evidence in a whole class of cases. The great weight of authority will bear out the rule as laid down in State v. Medlicott; and reason is all in favor of holding the rule as there stated. In the cases of State v. Terrell, 12 Rich. 321, and of State v. Wilson, 23 La. Ann. 558, which greatly resemble this case, such evidence was admitted. The cases do not, in our judgment, rest on authority, and no satisfactory reasons are given for the ruling. These cases stand alone in this country, and we prefer to adhere to well-established rules, rather than follow decisions *420 for which no reason is given, *and which seem dangerous in their tendency. It follows that the evidence was improperly admitted.

The learned counsel for the state, however, suggests that the case was abundantly made out in every particular against the appellant by other evidence. This may be so; and, if so, it is a striking illustration of how unnecessary it was to introduce the dying declaration in this case. But what effect this evidence had upon the jury, and what effect the other evidence had, it is not the province of this court to decide; nor has it the means of doing so. The evidence was admitted after a long struggle, and may well have had more influence upon the jury than it would have upon this court. The evidence was vital; and, as it was improperly admitted, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

STATE OF KANSAS v. JAMES TAYLOR.

July Term, 1875.

1. Larceny: Name of Owner: Variance. Where an information charges the larceny of the property of Michael Wandler, evidence that the property belonged to J. M. Wandler will not sustain a verdict against the defendant.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———. Nor, in such a case, will the fact that on the opening of the trial the county attorney called "Michael Wandler," and thereupon a witness answered, took the stand, was sworn, and testified that his name was "J. M. Wandler," and that he owned the property, sustain a finding that Michael Wandler and J. M. Wandler were one and the same person.

<sup>1</sup> The names "Brimford" and "Binford" are not idem sonans, Entrekin v. Chambers, 11 Kan. 877. Upon facts of case, held, that "Mollie" Brown was "Mary" Brown; that the two names represented the same person, State v. Watson, 80 Kan. 282; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 470.

Appeal from Davis district court.

Taylor, alias "Peter Bergman," was charged by information with the larceny of fifteen head of neat cattle "belonging to one Michael Wandler." Trial and conviction at the April term, 1875, of the district court.

*421 **McClure & Humphrey*, for appellant.

H. H. Snyder, Co. Atty., for the State.

There was evidence presented to the jury that "Michael Wandler," the prosecuting witness, and owner of the cattle alleged to have been stolen, and "J. M. Wandler" were one and the same person. The prosecuting witness was addressed in presence of the jury by the name of Michael Wandler; and J. M. Wandler in presence of the jury acknowledged, by answering when thus addressed, that his name was Michael Wandler. It will be observed that the transcript does not contain the questions asked the several witnesses. If this were the case, it would be seen that in all cases where the name of the prosecuting witness was spoken by the attorneys he was spoken of as Michael Wandler. This was certainly evidence sufficient to lead the jury to conclude, beyond a reasonable doubt, that J. M. Wandler and Michael Wandler were one and the same person, as the real fact was.

BREWER, J. Defendant was convicted in the district court of Davis county of the crime of grand larceny, and sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of three years. From this he has appealed to this court. A single matter only requires notice, for in that we find a fatal error. The information charged the larceny of certain cattle belonging to Michael Wandler. The evidence showed that the property belonged to J. M. Wandler, and there is nothing in the evidence, as preserved in the record, to show that Michael and J. M. Wandler are one and the same person. The only thing in the record bearing upon this is the recitation of what took place in the opening of the *422 trial, as follows: "The county *attorney first called Michael Wandler, who, having answered and taken the stand, was duly sworn, * * * testified as follows: 'My name is J. M. Wandler.'"

From this counsel argues that, as the witness who testified that his name was J. M. Wandler answered when Michael Wandler was called, the jury had sufficient evidence to justify them in finding that J. M. W. and Michael W. were one and the same person. Counsel says that other things equally significant took place during the trial which do not appear in the record; but, of course, we must take the record as it is; and there is not enough in it to sustain the verdict. The testimony of the witness was that his name was J. M. Wandler, and there was no testimony tending to show that he was ever known by any other name. His answering to the call of Michael Wandler, and coming onto the witness stand in obedience thereto, took place before he was sworn; and a jury may not bridge a variance between the charge and the testimony by inferences from the conduct of an unsworn witness. His conduct before he was sworn is no more evidence than his statements would have been; and it would not seriously be contended that a jury might rest their verdict upon the statements of a witness prior to his being sworn. It may be that this was an inadvertence in the trial, or an oversight in preparing the record; and it may also be that the owner was not Michael Wandler, but an entirely different person, named J. M. Wandler.

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. The appellant will be returned from the penitentiary to the jailer of Davis county, to abide the further order of the district court of that county.

*428      *JULIUS KUHN v. W. H. H. FREEMAN and others.

July Term, 1875.

Vendor and Vendee: Action for Purchase Money: Against Legal Representatives of Vendee. A vendor of a piece of land gave to the vendee a title-bond, and received in return one-half of the purchase money in cash down, and the other half in two promissory notes. Afterwards, the vendee died, leaving a widow and four children. An administrator was duly appointed. Subsequently, by certain condemnation proceedings, a railroad company obtained a right of way for its road across said land, and paid the damages assessed to the county treasurer. Afterwards the vendor assigned the notes to the plaintiff, and also executed deeds to the widow and children according to their respective rights under the law of descents, precisely in accordance with said bond, except that he did not covenant against the use of said right of way by said railroad company, and delivered said deed to the plaintiff, to be by him delivered to the proper parties when said notes were paid. Said deeds were duly tendered, and payment of said notes duly demanded and refused. The plaintiff then commenced this action against the administrator, widow, children, and treasurer, asking judgment against the administrator for the amount of the notes and interest, and against all the defendants, that the land and amount of money in the hands of the treasurer should be subject to the payment of the judgment. Held, that the action may be maintained.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Marshall district court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

J. A. Broughten, for plaintiff.

The petition is sufficient to compel specific performance, and to procure a sale of the land for the satisfaction of the unpaid purchase money. By the contract of sale, Hamaker, the obligee in the title-bond, became the owner of the land. Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 402; 1 Story, Eq. §§ 790, 1212; Sugd. Vend. 226; Simmons v. McDowal, Walk. Ch. 175; Adams, Eq. § 140; Douglas v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 5 Kan. *622; Courtney v. Woodworth, 9 Kan. *443; Stevens v. Shadwick, 10 Kan. *406. As the damages allowed by the *424 commissioners for the taking of the rail*road right of way took the place of the land taken, plaintiff would, for the purpose of procuring satisfaction of the purchase money, be entitled to the damages so allowed. It may be claimed that the widow and children of the vendee were entitled to covenants against the right of way condemned; but they were not, and any exercise by the sovereignty of the right of eminent domain is not to be considered as contracted or covenanted against. Rawle, Cov. 140-145, 184, 185; Ellis v. S., 13 Wall. 655; 1 Washb. Real Prop. (3d Ed.) 54, 460.

VALENTINE, J. On June 29, 1870, Jacob Weisbach was the owner of a certain piece of land in Marshall county. On that day he sold it to Daniel W. Hamaker for $3,000, receiving one-half in cash down, and the other half in two promissory notes, each for $750, and payable, one in one year, and the other in two years. Weisbach gave a bond for title to Hamaker. On January 16, 1871, Hamaker died, leaving a widow and four children as heirs to said land. On April 3, 1871, W. H. H. Freeman was duly appointed administrator of Hamaker's estate. During the months of August and September, 1871, the St. Joseph & Denver City Railroad Company located their road through said land, and commissioners, duly appointed for the purpose, assessed the damage at $219.80, which amount was duly paid to Charles F. Koester, county treasurer of Marshall county, for the owner of the land. Weisbach assigned said notes to the plaintiff, Julius Kuhn, and also, on June 25, 1873, executed deeds for the land to the widow and children of said Hamaker, according to their respective rights under the laws of descents, and placed them in the hands of Kuhn, to be by him delivered to the proper parties *425 when the notes should be *paid. The deeds were duly tendered, and payment of the notes demanded and refused; and then, on September 4, 1873, said Kuhn commenced this action against said administrator, widow, children, and Koester, to recover a judgment against the administrator for the amount of said notes; and against all the parties, to subject the land, and the money in Koester's hands, to the payment of said judgment. The plaintiff's petition stated all the foregoing and other facts. The defendants demurred to the plaintiff's petition on the following grounds: "(1) That said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against these defendants; (2) that said plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue herein; (3) that there is a defect of parties plaintiff; (4) that there is a defect of parties defendant; (5) that there are several causes of action improperly joined." The court below "sustained said demurrer on the ground that said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action," and dismissed the plaintiff's action, over his objections and exceptions.

We think the court below erred. If the plaintiff had any cause of action of any kind against any one or more of the defendants,—even a cause of action on the notes for the amount due thereon, or for any portion thereof,—then the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer. And we think the plaintiff had a cause of action. That an action could have been maintained by the plaintiff on the notes, and to subject the land to the payment of the notes against Hamaker if he had lived, and if the railroad company had not obtained said right of way, there can now be no question. Courtney v. Woodworth, 9 Kan. *443; Stevens v. Chadwick, 10 Kan. *406; Curtis v. Buckley, 14 Kan. *449. And we can see no sufficient reason why the plaintiff may not maintain the action against the successors of Hamaker, his administrator and heirs, notwithstanding said right of way. It is certainly true that his administrator, widow, and children have succeeded to all his rights and liabilities, real and personal, which may pass to an administrator and heirs; and it is equally true that *426 the *rights and liabilities involved in this case are such as may pass to an administrator and heirs. It is probable that the demurrer was sustained solely because of the condemnation of a strip of the land for said right of way, and because Weisbach, for that reason, could not convey to said widow and children a perfect and absolute title for said strip of land. There is no other reason that we can think of; and the defendants in error have not chosen to enlighten us upon the subject by filing a brief or otherwise. This reason, we think, is not sufficient. None of the usual or ordinary covenants in a deed can be broken by a portion of the land covered by the covenant being taken under the right of eminent domain. The exercise of the right of eminent domain is the exercise of a sovereign power; and no person is presumed to covenant against the acts of sovereignty. Hence, where the deed has already been executed, and afterwards the vendor sues the vendee for the purchase money, it is universally held that the vendee cannot set up, as a defense to the action, that a portion of the land has, since the execution of the deed, been taken under the right of eminent domain, and therefore that some of the covenants in the deed have been broken. Nor can the vendee sue the vendor, in such a case, in a separate action, on the supposed broken covenant. He must pay the vendor the full amount of the purchase money, and receive the condemnation money paid as damages for his compensation. This is the only remedy he has.

The case at bar, however, is to some extent different from the above. The deed in this case was not executed at the time when the sale was made; and before the deed was executed the easement of the right of way had attached to the land, so that the vendor cannot now make as absolute and perfect conveyance as he agreed to do. But still this difference in the facts we do not think should make a difference in the decision of the question involved. It cannot be presumed, when the vendor agreed to make a good and perfect conveyance, that the parties contemplated that he was agreeing to do a thing notwithstanding what might be the future acts of the sovereign authority. *427 When Weisbach agreed that he would make a good title, he had absolute and complete title to the land. By the agreement and sale the land became in equity the property of Hamaker. The legal title was allowed to remain in Weisbach merely as a security for the payment of the notes, and may be considered merely in the light of an equitable mortgage. When Hamaker died, the land descended to his widow and children. When the right of way was established, it was in fact obtaining an easement on the land of the widow and children of said Hamaker, and not upon the land of Weisbach, and they were entitled to receive the money paid by the railroad company as damages; and Hamaker's estate remained liable to the holder of the notes, just as it was before, for the balance of the purchase money not yet paid on the notes. But suppose this were not true, what would be the remedy of Weisbach; or, rather, what would be the remedy of Kuhn, the assignee of Weisbach? Even Weisbach, if he still owned the notes, could not rescind the contract, and get the land back, after one-half of the purchase money had been paid to him by the vendee, and possibly after valuable improvements had been put upon the land; and he certainly could not maintain an action of ejectment for the land. But, as Weisbach has transferred his interest in the notes, he cannot maintain an action of any kind. For the same reason that Weisbach could not rescind the contract, nor maintain ejectment, Kuhn cannot do so; and there is this additional reason why Kuhn cannot do so: he never owned the land. But suppose that Kuhn and Weisbach should agree that they would never convey the legal title to said land to said widow and children, how would even that benefit them while the widow and children continue to hold the equitable title and the possession of the premises, and have all the benefit and enjoyment of the same? The notes amount to $1,500, exclusive of interest. The damage done to said land was only $219.80, and the widow and children are entitled to draw that amount. Now, must Kuhn lose his $1,500 because $219.80 worth of land was converted into money? And it was *428 no fault of *Kuhn or Weisbach that said strip of land was taken for a roadway. Neither of them had any power to prevent it. It was taken under the sovereign authority of the state, and therefore it must not be held that any one was blamable or censurable. But all parties must perform their contract just as far as they can, and where they cannot they are excusable. Weisbach has performed his part of the contract just as near as he can. The title he offers to convey is perfect and absolute except for said right of way. We think the plaintiff may recover.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded, with the instructions to the court below to overrule both of the demurrers filed in this case, and for such other and further proceedings as may be proper.

KOHN & WEIL v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF FORT SCOTT.

July Term, 1875.

Statute of Frauds: Principal and Agent: Verbal Promise to Pay Moneys Advanced to Agent. Where K. & W., by a parol agreement with a certain bank, promise that if the bank will cash a certain draft to be drawn by and in the name of a certain agent of theirs upon T., L. & Co., that said K. & W. will be responsible for its payment, and afterwards such agent does draw such draft, and the said bank cashes the same, and afterwards said draft is dishonored by said T., L. & Co., held, that the bank may maintain an action to recover from said K. & W., on said parol promise, the amount paid out on said draft, with interest.<sup>1</sup>

Error from Bourbon district court.

Action by the First National Bank to recover from Samuel Kohn and Jacob Weil, as partners, certain moneys paid to one Ruhman as their agent. The facts are fully stated in the opinion. The *429 bank, at the September term, *1873, (C. W. B., judge pro tem., presiding,) recovered judgment for $1,108.89, and costs, and Kohn & Weil bring the case here for review.

Hulett & McCleverty, for plaintiffs in error.

The bank seeks to recover upon the ground of a parol promise and agreement alleged to have been made by the defendant Weil to McDonald, president of the bank, in a conversation with said McDonald, to the effect that Ruhman was to act as agent of Kohn & Weil at Fort Scott, in the purchase and shipment of hides, etc., to be shipped by

Ruhman, for their account, to Taussig, Livingston & Co., St. Louis, and that the bank might cash Ruhman's drafts upon Taussig, Livingston & Co. to the amount of $1,500, and Kohn & Weil would be responsible therefor. It was further alleged that Ruhman drew this draft as the agent of Kohn & Weil, and in and about their business; that the bank had cashed the draft upon the faith of the alleged promise, forwarded it for collection, and that it was returned protested for non-acceptance and non-payment; that the amount paid to Ruhman was used by him in and about the said business of Kohn & Weil. The defendants admitted an agency in Ruhman, but limited, and of the extent of which the bank had notice, but alleged that no promise in writing had been made to the bank, or that any such promise had been made, and denied generally all allegations.

The court erred in admitting the conversation detailed by McDonald, over the objection of the defendants. If the defendants could be charged as acceptors of this draft by reason of the alleged promise, then it must have been in writing. A promise to accept, to amount to an acceptance, must be in writing. Gen. St. 115, §§ 8-10; Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat. 66; Loonie v. Hogan, 9 N. Y. 435; Schimelpennich v. Bayard, 1 Pet. 264; Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet. 111; Goodrich v. Gordon, 15 Johns. 6; Bissell v. Lewis, 4 Mich. 450; Elliott v. Miller, 8 Mich. 132; Blakiston v. Dudley, 5 Duer, 373. These cases hold that such a promise, if in writing, amounts to an acceptance, provided, however, that the terms of authority are strictly followed. That a parol promise to accept is not binding, *430 *see Loonie v. Hogan, 9 N. Y. 435; Blakiston v. Dudley, 5 Duer, 373. But if this action is intended to bind Kohn & Weil for the default or failure of Taussig, Livingston & Co. to honor this draft, or of Ruhman to pay it, then the statute of frauds would require the promise to be in writing; so that in any view parol testimony would be incompetent, and the court erred in admitting it.

We think, however, that the conversation detailed by McDonald does not, by any fair construction of language, constitute a promise. All it does show was that Ruhman was to act as agent of Kohn & Weil, and, to provide funds, could draw on Taussig, Livingston & Co., not more than $1,500. McDonald says, "I was authorized to pay to that extent." Does not that simply disclose the fact that a limited agency existed? If limited, then all persons were required to acquaint themselves with the extent of the agency. Taussig and his book-keeper swear that Ruhman had already overdrawn about $1,450; so, if Ruhman, as the agent of Kohn & Weil, could only draw to the extent of $1,500, as McDonald says, then this draft, even if it had been in proper form, was rightly protested. If an agent exceeds his authority, the principal will not be bound. Nixon v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. 398; Beach v. Vandewater, 1 Sandf. 265.

The witness Osbun, who cashed the draft, testifies that nothing was said between him and Ruhman at the time the draft was drawn

The draft-register shows that the draft was charged, not as the draft of Kohn & Weil, but as the draft of Ruhman. Not a syllable of the evidence tends to show that this draft was in any way connected with the business of Kohn & Weil, but shows beyond doubt that the bank treated it as if it were the draft of Ruhman, drawn by him for his own personal benefit, and charged against him individually, until the bank, by this action, seeks to bind third parties, whom they have not in any way connected with the transaction. Had this draft been signed by Ruhman as agent of Kohn & Weil, and in such a manner only as an agent must sign in order to bind his principal, then, of course, it would have devolved upon the alleged principals, by way of *431 *defense, to show either that Ruhman was not their agent, or that he had not acted for them, or within his powers; but, this draft being at least prima facie the draft of Ruhman, with nothing about it to show agency for any one, we submit that it must require more evidence than simply that Ruhman had drawn this draft, and the bank teller paid it, without either exchanging a word, in order to bind Kohn & Weil. The draft being executed by Ruhman individually, it is not any evidence against Kohn & Weil; and no evidence tending to bind Kohn & Weil upon such a draft would be proper, since it would be contradicting a written instrument by parol. Minard v. Mead, 7 Wend. 68. "No person in making a contract is considered to be the agent of another, unless he stipulates for his principal by name, stating his agency in the instrument he signs." Stackpole v. Arnold, 11 Mass. 27; Story, Ag. §§ 147, 154, 161; 1 Pars. Cont. 54. In De Witt v. Walton, 9 N. Y. 571; Eastern R. Co. v. Benedict, 5 Gray, 561; Bank of N. A. v. Hooper, Id. 567; and Anderton v. Shoup, 17 Ohio St. 125,—it is decided that, even where an agent executes commercial paper in his own name, though he discloses his principal, still it is only the contract of the agent and not of the principal, though the principal may have had the benefit of it. So all evidence in this case was improper, and the petition does not even state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

McComas & McKeighan, for defendant in error.

The court substantially instructed the jury that, if they found the facts as detailed by witnesses for the bank, they should find for it; if as detailed by Weil, against the bank. The jury found for the bank; and that finding disposes of the questions of fact.

This is not an action on an acceptance, and hence the argument of counsel, and cases cited on this point, have no application. The statute of frauds, however, is one of the defenses set up in defendant's answer, and urged in the instructions asked below, though apparently abandoned in the argument. The agreement of K. & W., that they should be responsible for all money advanced on drafts drawn *432 by T., L. & Co., was *not a promise "to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another." It was not a collateral, but an original, undertaking; the promise being that, if the bank would advance money to K. & W. through their agent, on his drafts, they would be responsible. The advantage to be gained ran to K. & W., and not to Ruhman or the bank. Emmerson v. Slater, 22 How. 28, 43; Castling v. Aubert, 2 East, 325; Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet. 170. But, even if this was an action on a failure to accept, we do not think it would come within the provision of our statute relating to bonds, notes, and bills. That provides "that no person within this state shall be charged as an acceptor of a bill of exchange, unless his acceptance shall be in writing." Gen. St. 115, § 8. This provision would hardly excuse the non-performance of a promise to a bank or other person to accept a draft if such bank or other person would advance money to the drawer on the draft. The consideration of the advance being the promise to accept, a promisor would, we think, be forced to make it good.

It is claimed that this action cannot be maintained, because it is an attempt to charge persons other than as shown by the draft. It is not an action to charge Kohn & Weil as parties to the draft, but an action on their original promise, and for money had and received by the principals, K. & W., through their agent, Ruhman. It makes no difference to the bank what Ruhman did with the money. The bank was not their agent, and could not follow it, and see it properly applied; and whether it was or not properly used the record does not show. This is the true test, viz.: that where the written instrument is merely used, among other things, as evidence to show the right or liability, the party really liable may be sued. 2 Pars. Cont. 56, note.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action on an alleged parol contract entered into between the First National Bank of Fort Scott and the firm of Kohn & Weil. The alleged contract was made on the *433 part of the bank by B. P. McDon*ald, its president, and on the part of Kohn & Weil by Jacob Weil, a member of the firm. At the trial of this case in the court below both McDonald and Weil testified with regard to what said contract was; and there was but very little if any other evidence with reference thereto. McDonald and Weil differed in some respects with regard to the terms of the contract; but as the whole case was fairly submitted to a jury, and as the jury found a general verdict in favor of the bank, and against Kohn & Weil, we must now presume that the contract was just what McDonald testified that it was. The jury made no special findings, and there is nothing else in the record than what we have mentioned that would tend to impeach the general verdict of the jury. Then, upon the theory that the contract was just what McDonald testified that it was, the principal facts in the case are substantially as follows: During the winter of 1872, Kohn & Weil, of Leavenworth, were general dealers in hides, wool, etc., and William Ruhman was their agent for such business at Fort Scott. Weil went to the bank of the plaintiff below, and told McDonald that Ruhman was going to purchase hides, etc., inclusively for their firm, and ship the same to Taussig, Livingston & Co., St. Louis, Missouri; and in order to obtain funds for such purpose Ruhman would draw drafts on Taussig, Livingston & Co., not to exceed $1,500 at any one time, and that if the bank would cash such drafts they, Kohn & Weil, would be responsible for their payment. McDonald, for the bank, agreed to cash said drafts. Afterwards Ruhman drew the following draft, to-wit:

FORT SCOTT, February 17, 1872.

"Pay to the order of First National Bank, Fort Scott, one thousand dollars, value received, and charge same to account.

"W. RUHMAN.

"To Taussig, Livingston & Co., St. Louis."

The bank cashed this draft, then sent it to St. Louis, where it was presented to Taussig, Livingston & Co., who refused to pay it. It was then duly protested, and sent back to the bank at Fort *434 Scott. The bank then commenced this *action against Kohn & Weil, asking judgment for the amount of the draft, with interest, protest fees, damages, and costs. The facts are all fully set forth in the plaintiff's petition; and therefore, if the plaintiff may recover at all, if the bank has any cause of action against Kohn & Weil on the foregoing facts, the plaintiff may recover in this action.

The objections to a recovery seem to be about as follows: (1) No action can be maintained against Kohn & Weil on the draft, for they are not parties thereto, either as drawers, acceptors, or indorsers. (2) No action can be maintained on the parol contract, because—First, it does not purport to make Kohn & Weil acceptors of the draft, and could not if it did, for an acceptance, or agreement to accept, must be in writing, (Gen. St. 115, §§ 8–10;) second, the contract is void, being in contravention of section 6 of the statute of frauds, (Gen. St. 505,) which requires that all promises to answer for the debt or default of another shall be in writing. There are perhaps some other objections made, but they are based upon what counsel think the facts ought to be, and not upon what the record actually shows them to be. For instance, counsel for Kohn & Weil would take the parol contract as Mr. Weil testified that it was, while we must take it as Mr. McDonald testified that it was. We do not think that any of the objections, or all of them taken together, are sufficient to defeat a recovery. In order to hold Kohn & Weil liable, it is not necessary to consider them as parties to said draft. They were certainly not parties on the face of the draft, and yet their agent was; and generally, where an agent does business for an unnamed principal, he makes the principal as well as himself liable. Wolfley v. Rising, 12 Kan. *535; Butler v. Kaulback, 8 Kan. *668, *674, et seq. No one claims that Kohn & Weil were acceptors of the draft, or that they ever agreed to accept it. Taussig, Livingston & Co. are the only persons who could have accepted the draft before it was dishonored, and no one would suppose that a contract would be made before a draft were drawn for any person to accept such draft "supra protest." Said parol *435 contract is not *void as being in contravention of section 6 of the statute of frauds. Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet. 170, 181, 182. It is an original promise of Kohn & Weil that they will pay their own debt contracted by their agent, Ruhman, if Taussig, Livingston & Co. do not pay it.

The bank took judgment in the court below for merely the amount of money paid out by the bank on the draft, with 7 per cent. interest per annum. This judgment will be affirmed.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. v. CITY OF FORT SCOTT.<sup>1</sup>

July Term, 1875.

1. Case Made: Power of Judge pro Tem. Under section 1 of chapter 85 of the laws of 1870, a judge pro tem. may, after the expiration of the term at which a case has been tried before him, if within the time allowed by law, or the order of the court, settle and sign a case made.

<sup>1</sup>The making and serving of a case are the acts of the plaintiff in error; the suggestion of amendments, the act of the defendant in error; and the settling and signing of the case, the duty of the judge. The jurisdiction of the judge to settle the case is a special and limited jurisdiction, which only arises at the time, and under the circumstances, specified by law; and in the absence of any appearance of the opposite party, or a waiver of amendments, it should appear upon the face of the record—First, that the case had been duly served; and, second, that amendments had been suggested or waived, or that the opposing party had notice of the time and place of the settling of the case. Weeks v. Medler, 18 Kan. 425. Case made, signed, and settled by judge pro tem. Garvin v. Jennerson, 20 Kan. 371. Trial judge has the power, on his own motion, to make such alterations, erasures, and additions in it as may be necessary to make it speak the truth. The decision of the trial judge, that a case made, as prepared for his signature by one of the parties to the action, is untrue, is conclusive and final. Building Ass'n v. Beebe, 24 Kan. 363. The district court has no power to extend the time for making a case, after the time fixed by the statute and by order of the court or judge has once elapsed. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Koors, 26 Kan. 215. But see Baker v. Hall, 29 Kan. 617. Insufficient certificate, Allen v. Krueger, 25 Kan. 74; Edmondson v. Beals, 27 Kan. 656; authentication of, Muscott v. Hanna, 26 Kan. 770; withdrawing case for authentication, Pierce v. Myers, 28 Kan. 364; presumption, Hammerslough v. Hackett, 30 Kan. 57; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 41; Douglass v. Parker, 32 Kan. 593; S. C. 5 Pac. Rep. 178; supplementary proceedings, Taylor v. Mason, 28 Kan. 381; Salina B. & S. Ass'n v. Beebe, 24 Kan. 363; correction of, Edwards v. Porter, 28 Kan. 700; omissions cannot be supplied by stipulation of counsel, Parker v. Remington S. M. Co., 24 Kan. 81; after expiration of term of office of trial judge, Gruble v. Wood, 27 Kan. 535; see Taylor v. Mason, 28 Kan. 381; may delay settling and signing, how and when, Hammerslough v. Hackett, 30 Kan. 57; S. C. 1 Pac. Rep. 41; court rules in reference to, Jones v. Menefee, 28 Kan. 436; sufficiency and validity of, determined, see Meixell v. Kirkpatrick, 25 Kan. 13; Farlin v. Sook, 26 Kan. 397; Muscott v. Hanna, Id. 770; Baker v. Hall, 29 Kan. 617; see, also, Morgan v. Chapple, 10 Kan. 168, and note.

2. ———: Time for Settling: Suggesting Amendments. The statute allows three days, after the time fixed for making and serving a case, for the suggestion of amendments; and an extension of time for making and serving a case does not take away the three days for the suggestion of amendments, and such latter time commences to run, not from the date of the actual service of the case made, but from the expiration of the period of extension.
3. ———. Where, by the order of the court thirty days are given in which to make and serve a case, it is settled and signed in time, if settled and signed within thirty-three days from the date of the order.
4. ———: Certificate of Judge: False Certificate Disregarded. Where the certificate of the trial judge to a case made, or bill of exceptions, is shown to be intentionally false, and to have been fraudulently prepared, this court may disregard it; but it should be wholly disregarded. If the falsehood and corruption be in favor of the plaintiff in error, and to secure a reversal, ordinarily the rights of the defendant in error can be protected in a new trial. If in *favor of the defendant in error, and to prevent a reversal, cases may arise in which it will be the duty of this court to set aside the judgment and order a new trial, upon the presumption, on account of such corruption in the preparation of the case made, or bill of exceptions, that the plaintiff in error was wronged upon the trial.
5. ———: Certificate not to be Altered or Reformed. But not even in such a case will this court attempt to reform the certificate by striking out or adding thereto. So that, where a motion has been made in this court to strike out a portion of the certificate of the trial judge to a case made, on the ground that it was intentionally false, and fraudulently prepared, and the charge is made that there was a conspiracy between the said judge and the counsel of defendant in error to prevent the plaintiff in error from obtaining a case for review, such motion must be overruled without regard to the questions of fact raised thereby.
6. Municipal Corporations: Contract with Railroad Company: Breach of Contract: Damages. The city of Fort Scott subscribed $75,000 of stock in the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and issued $75,000 of its bonds in payment therefor. It also, by virtue of the said contract, issued to the said company $25,000 of its bonds for the purchase of the right of way through the city, and grounds for machine-shops, engine-houses, etc. The subscription was made upon condition that the company should construct, within six months, a railroad from Sedalia, Missouri, through Fort Scott, to connect with the line running from Junction City in a south-easterly direction; that it should make this the great through line to the Indian Territory and Texas, and construct no other line of road south of Fort Scott in the same direction; and that it should make Fort Scott the end of a division, and erect engine-houses and machine-shops at or near said place before doing so at any other point south-west of Sedalia on the through line of its road. The company complied with this contract, except that it did not make Fort Scott the end of a division, and did not erect the engine-house and machine-shops there, but did so erect them at Parsons. In an action by the city against the company for damages, for failing to comply with this part of its contract, testimony was admitted for the purpose of proving the damages sustained, over the objection of the company, tending to show a decline in the population of Fort Scott, and a depreciation generally in the value of real estate through the city during a period commencing subsequently to the construction of the road, yet prior to the building of the shops and engine-houses at Parsons, and ending after the fact of such building had become known at Fort Scott. Held, that such testimony was improperly admitted, and that such matters did not enter into or form a part of the proper measure of damages.

- *437 *7. Damages: Speculative Damages not Allowable. Such testimony is objectionable because it is speculative, and because amid the variety of causes tending to produce such results there is no means of determining how much is due to this single cause; it is also tantamount to inquiry into profits, and those not the direct and immediate fruits of the contract, but remote and uncertain; and it does not disclose the direct pecuniary loss of the city, which, in an action ex contractu, is the proper measure of damages.
- 8. ———: Rules for Measuring. The following may be laid down as true rules for ascertaining the damages in cases like this: Wherever it can be shown by the contract, or aliunde, that a certain and definite amount was paid as a consideration for the condition broken, such sum and interest may be properly recovered. Or, where the unperformed condition is the erection of buildings, or other improvements, within the city, the value of such improvements for purpose of taxation may be treated as the measure of damages.
- 9. ———: Where Contract is Entire. Where the contract is an entirety, and there is in it no means of apportionment, and nothing can be shown aliunde to establish an apportionment, nor to show the relative or absolute values of the several conditions, no action can be maintained to recover the consideration, if unpaid, nor upon a quantum meruit, until all the conditions are performed; and if the consideration has been paid in advance, and only part of the conditions are performed, the entire consideration can be recovered back. Yet to this conclusion, in any given case, the law reluctantly comes, and only when it is perfectly clear that by no construction or evidence can there be any apportionment or determination of values.

Error from Bourbon district court.

The city of Fort Scott brought its action to recover from the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, for alleged breach of contract, upon the statement of facts set forth in plaintiff's petition, in substance as follows:

"The city of Fort Scott is, and was at the time mentioned therein, a city of the second class, organized under the laws of Kansas. The defendant company, in the year 1870, was engaged in the construction of a railroad via Fort Scott from Sedalia, Missouri, to Denison, in the state of Texas. Said railway company, in order to secure aid from the city of Fort Scott in the construction of its road through the state of Kansas, proposed to said city that if it would subscribe $75,000 to its capital stock, and issue the bonds of the

*438 city *in payment therefor, and also issue the bonds of the city in a sum not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of procuring the right of way through the city for its road, and of purchasing not exceeding twenty-eight acres of land for depots, engine-houses, machine-shops, and yard-room, it would, within six months from an election thereafter to be held upon the question of issuing said bonds, construct, or cause to be constructed, and put in operation a line of railroad from Sedalia, Missouri, to the city of Fort Scott, and that it would extend the road, as soon thereafter as practicable, in a south-westerly direction to a point therein named on the defendant's road; that the company would make said line of railway from Sedalia, or any point north-west thereof to which the company might thereafter extend the line of its road, the great through line by way of Fort Scott to Texas; that the company would make Fort Scott the end of a division upon its road, and would erect engine-houses and machine-shops at or near Fort Scott, before doing so at any other point south-west of Sedalia, upon the through line from Sedalia by way of Fort Scott to the Indian Territory and Texas, as soon as the business of the line should, in the opinion of the company, render such shops necessary. Thereupon the city council of the city of Fort Scott passed an ordinance submitting said proposition to the qualified electors of said city, and an election was held in accordance therewith on the thirtieth of August, 1870, and resulted in favor of the proposition contained in the submission. On the fifth of December, 1870, the city of Fort Scott subscribed $75,000 to the capital stock of the company, by an ordinance passed on that day. On the twenty-second of December, 1870, the city passed another ordinance giving to the company $25,000 in its bonds, in lieu of the grounds it had agreed to purchase and donate for right of way, etc.; and on the eleventh of February, 1871, the city delivered $75,000 in the city's bonds to the defendant in payment of such first-mentioned subscription.

"And the plaintiff avers that it has duly kept and performed all the conditions of said contract upon its part, and delivered $100,000 of the bonds of said city to said railway company, which has negotiated them, and they have passed into the hands of innocent purchasers; but said company did not comply with its part of said contract, but, on the contrary, neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to make Fort Scott the end of a division upon said line of its road, and neglects and refuses to locate its engine-houses and machine-shops, any or either of them, at the city of Fort Scott, or at or near said point; but has located its machine-shops and built its engine-houses at the city of Parsons, which is south-west of Sedalia, on the line of its said road. In the fall of 1873 the defendant did erect engine-houses and machine-shops at the city of Parsons, and have them finished and in operation for the purpose of doing the business of their line of road, contrary to the terms of the aforesaid agreement.

"And plaintiff charges that it has been greatly damaged by reason of the conduct of the defendant in this behalf; that if the defendant had complied with its said agreement, and made the city of Fort Scott the end of a division on the line of its road, and erected the engine-houses and machine-shops at or near said city, the so doing would have greatly increased the business and augmented the population and wealth of the city, and thereby decreased the rate of taxation necessary to pay the interest on said bonds so issued to the defendant.

"The plaintiff avers that the sole consideration of and for the last-named twenty-five thousand dollars in bonds, was to enable the defendant to purchase grounds for said engine-houses, machine-shops, etc.; and that the defendant received said bonds, negotiated them, and applied the proceeds to other and different purposes, and did not apply the proceeds to the purposes mentioned in the contract.

"And the plaintiff avers that the said bonds (viz., the $75,000 and the $25,000) were obtained from the plaintiff by the defendant by lying, fraud, deceit, and hypocrisy on the part of the defendant, with the intent to cheat and defraud the plaintiff.

"Wherefore the plaintiff prays and demands judgment against the defendant for the value of the said bonds, and the damages so sustained as aforesaid, to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars."

A copy of the ordinance (ordinance No. 108) reciting and designating the terms of the proposed subscription, and submitting the question to an election on the thirtieth of August, 1870, was attached to and made a part of said petition. The plaintiff attached to its petition, and as a part thereof, ordinance No. 129, approved December 5, 1870, making the subscription of the $75,000 voted at *440 said election of the *thirtieth of August, which last-mentioned ordinance has a preamble as follows:

"Whereas, heretofore, to-wit, on the thirtieth of August, 1870, a special election was, in pursuance of ordinance No. 108, and of due proclamation, and notice thereof, held in the several wards of the city of Fort Scott for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of said city the question of subscribing, in the name of said city, $75,000 to the capital stock of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and of selling and assigning said stock for a nominal consideration to the capitalists engaged in the construction of said railway, under the name of the Land Grant Railway & Trust Company, of New York, and of issuing and delivering the bonds of the city of Fort Scott to said company in payment of said subscription, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the railroad of said company south-westwardly from said city, upon certain terms and conditions in said ordinance contained; and whereas, upon the canvass duly made of the votes cast at said election, it appeared that there were cast in favor of the proposition submitted 523 votes, and against said proposition three votes, and that the same were thereby adopted; and whereas, the terms and conditions upon which said subscription, and the issue and delivery of said bonds to said company, depended, have been complied with by the said company: Now, therefore, be it ordained," etc.

The defendant answered, admitting the due incorporation of plaintiff and defendant, the passage of the ordinances mentioned in the petition, the submission therein provided, the election, the subscription of the $75,000, and the delivery of the city's bonds therefor, and the giving to defendant of $25,000 additional in bonds, as claimed; but defendant denied all the other averments of the petition, and alleged performance by defendant. The action was tried at the March term, 1874, of the district court, J. M. G., judge pro tem., presiding. The plaintiff called Samuel Proctor, F. Gould, Geo. W. Chess, and Wm. Fletcher, as witnesses, from whose testimony it appears that Fort Scott is 108 miles south-westerly from Sedalia, and Parsons is 51 miles south-westerly from Fort Scott; that the de-defendant, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, *441 *commenced the building and erection of their round-house at Parsons in the fall of 1871, and their machine-shops at the same place in 1872, all of which were in running order in the summer of 1873; that said round-house has fourteen stalls, and is used for the Sedalia branch of defendant's road, and the machine-shops are 100 feet wide by 300 feet long, and used for repairing machinery and rolling-stock in use on defendant's road; that said round-house cost about $60,000, and said machine-shops about $80,000; that at said shops about sixty-five men were kept constantly employed, whose aggregate monthly pay was about $3,000. Plaintiff also called George A. Crawford, H. T. Wilson, James S. McCord, E. M. Hulett, C. F. Drake, B. P. McDonald, all for many years residents in the city of Fort Scott. Their testimony showed that the population of Fort Scott in 1870 was about 4,000; that it was upwards of 5,000 in 1872 and in 1873, and between 5,000 and 6,000 now, (time of trial, March, 1874;) that real estate was higher in Fort Scott in 1870 than in June, 1872, and about one-third higher in June, 1872, than in 1873; that defendant had built no machine-shops in Fort Scott; that it was known in July, 1872, that defendant had commenced building its machine-shops in the city of Parsons; that the depreciation in the value of property in Fort Scott commenced in 1872, and was from 25 to 50 per cent. lower, according to location; that the decline in property commenced before the panic which caused a depreciation in property in almost all the towns in this state since 1870 and 1872. All this testimony relating to shops and buildings and business at Parsons, and population and values in Fort Scott, was admitted over defendant's objection and exception. The record shows that "it was here admitted that these $25,000 in bonds were delivered to the defendant for the purchase of right of way and grounds, as provided in the ordinance of the city of Fort Scott of July 25, 1870, referred to in plaintiff's petition, and accepted by the defendant in full compliance with section 8 of that ordinance. It was also admitted by the defendant that the $75,000 in bonds first mentioned in *442 *plaintiff's petition have passed into the hands of innocent holders."

Defendant called Augustus Wilson and George W. Chess, residents in Parsons, who testified that the population of Parsons in 1872, and also at the time of the trial, was about 2,500, and that real estate in Parsons had depreciated generally from 25 to 35 per cent. as compared with the prices of June and July, 1872. O. B. Gunn, a witness called by defendant, testified that "the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, defendant, within six months from the date of election at which bonds were voted by the city of Fort Scott, constructed and put in practical operation a line of railway from Sedalia, Missouri, to the city of Fort Scott, and immediately thereafter extended the line in a south-westerly direction to the city of Parsons, where it joins another part of its road, called the Neosho Division, and which was formerly known as the Union Pacific Railway, Southern Branch. The company have made the railway from Sedalia the great through line by way of Fort Scott to the south-west and south, through the Indian Territory to Texas, and they have constructed no other road from Nevada, Missouri. The company have erected here at Fort Scott passenger-house, freight-house, and round-house. The freight-house cost $4,700; the passenger-house, $4,000, and the round-house, $3,000 or $3,500." "It was here admitted that the defendant had purchased the right of way through the city of Fort Scott, and between fifteen and twenty acres of land within the city for depot grounds, yard-room, and other purposes connected with its business."

H. C. Luey, another witness called by defendant, testified as follows: "I am the agent of the defendant at Fort Scott. The engines of all freight trains, going both ways, are changed at this point. At least three engines are always kept at Fort Scott."

The transcript does not contain the charge or instructions given by the court to the jury. The defendant's counsel asked the court to give the following instructions to the jury, to-wit:

*443 "(1) If the jury find from the evidence that real estate in the city of Fort Scott has depreciated in value since June, 1872, before they can take that matter into consideration in estimating the damages in this case, they must further find from the evidence that such depreciation was the natural and proximate consequence of the breach of the contract alleged in plaintiff's petition.

"(2) If the jury find from the evidence that such depreciation was the natural and proximate consequence of the acts complained of in the plaintiff's petition, the damages to the plaintiff are remote and speculative, and the plaintiff can only recover nominal damages.

"(3) Before the plaintiff can recover other than nominal damages, it is incumbent on it to show by competent testimony the amount and value of the real estate alleged to have been affected by a breach of the contract set forth in the petition. If the plaintiff has failed to do that, in substance, the jury have no data upon which to estimate the damages, and can render a verdict only for nominal damages.

"(4) While the law implies damages for the breach of every contract, if the plaintiff would recover more than nominal damages, it must prove such damages by competent testimony; and the jury cannot infer damages, but must find the same as a fact from the evidence.

"(5) The real question for the jury to determine is, what damages, if any, the plaintiff has sustained in not making the city of Fort Scott the end of a division, and in erecting engine-houses and machine-shops at other points south-west of Sedalia on the through line of railroad from Sedalia, by way of Fort Scott, to the Indian Territory and Texas, before erecting the same at or near Fort Scott,—said damages to be determined by the rules before stated."

The court refused to give the second and third instructions, and the record does not show whether the first, fourth, and fifth were given or refused. The defendant also submitted to the court in writing six special questions, and requested the court to direct the jury to find upon the particular questions of fact so stated, and to direct them to return a written finding thereon. Said questions, and the answers thereto, as returned by the jury, and their general verdict, are as follows:

"We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, and assess its damages at one hundred thousand dollars.

*444 "To the questions of fact submitted to them, the jury find as follows, to-wit:

"(1) Did the defendant construct its machine-shops and engine-houses at Parsons, before any were constructed at Fort Scott? Answer. Yes.

"(2) Has it erected any machine-shops or engine-houses at Fort Scott? Answer. No machine-shops; but one small engine or round house.

"(3) Has it made Fort Scott the end of a division? Answer. No.

"(4) If the defendant has failed to construct its machine-shops and engine-houses at Fort Scott, has the plaintiff sustained any damages thereby? Answer. Yes.

"(5) If the answer to the last-named question be 'Yea,' how much damage has the plaintiff sustained? Answer. One hundred thousand dollars.

"(6) If the jury find plaintiff sustained more than nominal damages, how are such damages made up, and from what data? Answer. From the evidence, and from breach of contract."

Upon the return of said jury, and the delivery to the clerk of the court of their written findings to said questions of fact so submitted to them, defendant objected to their answer to the sixth question submitted to them, and requested the court to resubmit that question to the jury, with the instruction to bring in a written finding responsive to the question; which the court refused to do, and defendant duly excepted. Afterwards, at the same term, and on the second of April, defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment was entered on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $100,000, and costs. And the record shows that on said second of April, "and by consent of parties, made in open court, it is ordered that said defendant have thirty days from the date of this entry in which to make a case and exceptions, which case so made shall be served upon plaintiff's attorneys at least five days before the same shall be submitted to the judge pro tem. of this court for allowance, settlement, and signature. And, by like consent of parties, it is ordered that execution be stayed for forty days from this date."

The transcript shows that defendant's attorney made a "case" *445 and served it on plaintiff's attorneys, April 21, 1874. *To the case so served are appended several papers, to-wit:

First. A protest by plaintiff's attorneys against the settlement of the case by the pro tem. judge, denying "the right and jurisdiction of said J. M. G. to sign, make, or allow said case after adjournment of the court sine die, and while the regular judge" was present in the county, and "because no copy of said case as presented was served upon the plaintiff, as required by the court;" to which protest were annexed three proposed amendments to the case. This "protest and amendments" was marked, "Filed with me, April 22, 1874;" which indorsement was signed by the pro tem. judge.

Second. A notice, which, after the title, is as follows:

"GENTLEMEN: Please take notice that on Friday, the first day of May, 1874, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, I shall present the case made in the above-entitled action, and served on you the twenty-first day of April, 1874, to the Hon. JOHN M. GALLOWAY, the trial judge of said case, at his office in the city of Fort Scott, Kansas, for signature and certification
"Yours, etc., T. C. SEARS, Attorney for Defendant."

—Which notice has this indorsement:

"We admit service of a copy of the within notice, this twenty-ninth day of April, 1874.

"McCOMAS & McKEIGHAN, Plaintiff's Attorneys."

Third. An affidavit which, after the title and venue, is as follows:

"T. C. Sears, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the attorney for the defendant in the above-entitled action; that on the twenty-first day of April, 1874, he served a copy of the annexed case upon McComas & McKeighan, attorneys for the plaintiff herein; that no amendments have been made, served, or suggested by or on behalf of said plaintiff; that, pursuant to the notice served on plaintiff's attorneys, April 29, 1874, this affiant went to the office of JOHN M. GALLOWAY, the trial judge of this action, at 10 minutes before 2 o'clock P. M. of May 1st, and remained there without leaving for a moment until half-past 6 o'clock; that said office was open, but neither the said GALLOWAY nor either of the plaintiff's attorneys appeared there, nor any one in their behalf; that deponent made inquiries as to their whereabouts, but could only learn that the *446 said GALLOWAY left his office about *noon of that day; that at half-past six deponent went to the residence of said GALLOWAY, and was then informed by his wife that she was not aware of his whereabouts, and that he had not been home since morning; that deponent again went to the residence of said GALLOWAY soon after 9 o'clock in the evening, but could not find him, or hear anything about him.

T. C. SEARS.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this first day of May, 1874.

"M. V. Voss, Judge Sixth Judicial District."

Fourth. A certificate made by the regular district judge, which, after the title, is as follows:

"And now, to-wit, May 1, 1874, it appearing to me that a copy of the foregoing case was served on Messrs. McComas & McKeighan, plaintiff's attorneys, on the twenty-first day of April 1874, and it further appearing from the notice and admission of service thereof, hereto attached, that the said foregoing case would be presented to the Hon. JOHN M. GALLOWAY (the pro tem. judge of this court who tried this cause) for signature and certification at his office at 2 o'clock P. M. of this day; and it further appearing from the affidavit of T. C. Sears, defendant's attorney, hereto attached, that he, the said Sears, attended at the office of said GALLOWAY at the hour mentioned in said notice, and remained there the whole time until half-past six P. M. of this day, and that said GALLOWAY was not there, and neither said McComas nor McKeighan, plaintiff's attorneys, came to said office during said time; and it further appearing from said affidavit (which is hereto attached, and made a part of this certificate) that no amendments to said case have been made or suggested, (wherefore said case is deemed and taken as true:) now, therefore, that the said case so as aforesaid made and served, and the several objections and exceptions therein stated and contained, may be entered and become a part of the record of this cause, I, M. V. Voss, Judge of the Sixth judicial district, at the instance and request of said defendant's attorney, and in the presence of W. C. Stewart, city attorney, and of counsel for said plaintiff, do hereby order and direct that the said case be filed and made a part of the record herein.

"Witness my hand at my office, in Fort Scott, at 10 o'clock P. M., May 1, 1874.

M. V. Voss, Judge."

A fifth paper attached to said case was the certificate of J. M. *447 G., the trial judge, made and dated May 4, 1874. *The petition in error and transcript being filed in this court, the defendant below, as plaintiff in error, filed in this court a motion, which is as follows:

"And now comes the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, plaintiff in error, and moves the court to strike from the record of said action filed in this court all that portion thereof purporting to be 'amendments,' and signed by McComas & McKeighan and Stewart, and purporting to have been filed with JOHN M. GALLOWAY, judge pro tem., on the twenty-second day of April, 1874, because (1) the same was not presented to the party making the case, nor his attorney; (2) the said paper, or so-called 'amendments,' were not made nor suggested until after the expiration of the time allowed by the statute. And the said plaintiff in error moves to strike out from the so-called certificate of JOHN M. GALLOWAY, pro tem. judge, all that portion of said certificate attached to the record herein commencing with the words, 'and at the same time and place,' and ending with the words, 'and does not contain the charge of the court;' and also, from the last clause of said certificate, the words, 'with amendments thereto,'—on the grounds (1) that the same and the whole thereof is surplusage; (2) that the statements therein contained are intentionally false, and were fraudulently incorporated. This motion is founded upon the record filed herein, and upon affidavits to be filed.

"T. C. SEARS, Attorney."

Subsequently, and on the twenty-seventh of October, 1874, this court made an order appointing A. A. Harris, of Fort Scott, as commissioner "to take depositions in this case in behalf of both said parties, and that he have power as such commissioner to issue subpoenas and bring before him at such time as he may designate, prior to January 1, 1875, any person or persons, and the same with books and papers, to testify what is known to them concerning the matters contained in said motion of plaintiff in error, and to reduce such testimony to writing, and transmit the same to this court on or before the first judicial day of the next (January, 1875) term of this court." Said commissioner thereupon took and filed the testimony of W. H.

Moore, T. C. Sears, W. C. Webb, John G. Stuart, Ira D. Bronson, and Wiley Anderson, on *the part of plaintiff in error, to sustain said motion, and of W. C. Stewart, J. H. Sallee, J. E. McKeighan, John M. Galloway, James F. Holt, and H. C. McComas, on the part of defendant in error, in opposition to the matters alleged in said motion. Said motion, and the case itself upon its merits, were heard and submitted together. Elaborate briefs were filed by both parties, mainly upon said motion, but as the court declined to pass upon the merits of the motion, beyond the question of power in the court to grant the motion, all those portions of the briefs addressed to the questions of fact alleged in said motion are omitted.

T. C. Sears, for plaintiff in error.

Section 547 of the Civil Code (Gen. St. p. 787) gives to a party desiring to have any judgment or order of the district court, or a judge thereof, reviewed by the supreme court, permission to "make a case, containing a statement of so much of the proceedings and evidence, or other matters in the action, as may be necessary to present the errors complained of, to the supreme court." Section 548, as amended, (Laws 1871, p. 274,) provides that "the case so made, or a copy thereof, shall, within three days after the judgment or order is entered, be served upon the opposite party, or his attorney, who may within three days thereafter suggest amendments thereto, in writing, and present the same to the party making the case, or his attorney." Section 549, as amended, (Laws 1870, p. 168,) provides "that the court or judge may, upon good cause shown, extend the time for making a case, and the time within which the case may be served; and may also direct notice to be given of the time when a case may be presented for settlement after the same has been made and served, and amendments suggested, which, when so made and presented, shall be settled, certified, and signed by the judge who tried the cause.

* * * If no amendments are suggested by the opposing party, as above provided, said case shall be taken as true, and containing a full record of the cause, and certified accordingly.

*449 *On the twenty-first of April, 1874, a copy of the proposed case was served on the attorneys of defendant in error. On the twenty-ninth of April a notice was served on the same attorneys that the case would be presented to the pro tem. judge on the first of May following, at 2 o'clock P. M., for signature and certification. This notice was quite unnecessary, as no amendments had been suggested, and the case was settled, as we claim, by law.

It is a conceded fact that no amendments in writing were "presented to the party making the case, or his attorney." Now, section 548 clearly governs when the case is made within the three days. It provides that "the case and amendments" shall be "submitted to the judge, who shall settle and sign the same." Section 549, as amended, after giving the court or judge power to extend the time for "making a case, and the time within which the case may be served," gives the court or judge the further power "to direct notice to be given of the time when a case may be presented for settlement after the same has been made and served, and amendments suggested," etc. So that the court or judge may direct within what time the defendant may "make a case." The court in this case gave the plaintiff in error "thirty days from the date of this entry in which to make a case." The only further order pertaining to the case was that it should "be served upon plaintiff's attorneys at least five days before the same shall be submitted to the judge pro tem. of this court for allowance, settlement, and signature." These provisions of the order were complied with literally. The statute then further provides that notice may be given of the time when the case may be presented for settlement "after the case has been made and served, and amendments suggested." It does not, by implication or otherwise, change or affect in any respect the provisions of section 548, that "the opposite party may, within three days thereafter, suggest amendments thereto in writing and present the same to the party making the case, or his attorney." Now comes the last clause of the section: "And if no amendments *450 are suggested by the *opposing party, as above provided,"— that is, in the previous section 548,—"said case shall be taken as true." Counsel for defendant in error claim that the force of this last clause is broken by pretended "amendments" alleged to have been filed with the pro tem. judge on the twenty-second of April, the day after the service of the case. Granting that the paper which GALLOWAY attached to the case was filed with him on the day it purports to have been, it is no compliance with the statute, and has no more significance than if counsel had filed it in their own office. The law only gave the opposite party the right, within three days after the service of the case, to suggest amendments, and directs the manner in which they shall be served. And these pretended amendments are no part of the record, and must be disregarded. It is palpable that no amendments were "presented to the opposite party or his attorney," and the right to make them was gone. If the statute of 1870 be construed to mean what it says, viz., that "if no amendments are suggested by the opposing party as above provided, said case shall be taken as true," then the right to suggest amendments was absolutely gone, and all that GALLOWAY had the power to do was to certify the case. Hence, the matters contained in his certificate, further than was necessary to certify that it might become a part of the record, are surplusage.

The powers and duties of a judge pro tem. are referred to by attorneys for defendant in error, and it is contended that they are restricted to the time while such judge is holding court. Such is not the meaning of the statute. The words "while holding court" are not a limitation, when taken in connection with the remaining part of the sentence: "The judge pro tem. shall have the same power as the regular judge while holding court, and in respect to cases tried before him, or in which he may be selected to act." If the construction sought to be established by counsel for defendant in error had been contemplated, it would have read, "while holding court in respect to cases tried before him." The word "and" clearly indicates that he is to have such *451 power "while holding court," and in respect to cases tried before him, or in which he may be selected to act; that is, when a case is tried before him his powers and duties to the end are the same as the regular judge. Such judge pro tem. is a trial judge, as contemplated in the amendment of 1870 made to section 549. The judge is not to determine whether any allegation is or is not proved, but to certify as a matter of fact what the rulings of the court were, and what the witnesses said. The legislature could have conferred this authority upon any other person, as well as the trial judge. The pretense that the act of 1870 is unconstitutional, as containing more than one subject, is hardly worthy of consideration.

The issues really made by the pleadings are: (1) That the railway company neglected and refused to make Fort Scott the end of a division, and neglected and refused to erect its machine-shops at Fort Scott, before it did so at any other point south-westwardly from Sedalia. (2) That by reason thereof the city of Fort Scott has been greatly damaged in this, viz.: "That if the defendant had complied with its said agreement, and made the city of Fort Scott the end of a division on the line of its road, and erected the said engine-houses and machine-shops at or near said city, the so doing would have greatly increased the business and augmented the population and wealth of the said city, and thereby decreased the rate of taxation necessary to pay the interest on said bonds so issued to the defendant."

The allegation in the petition that "the sole consideration of and for the said $25,000 in bonds was to enable the defendant to purchase grounds for said engine-houses and machine-shops, etc.," is flatly contradicted by ordinance No. 108, § 8. The averment "that the defendant received said bonds, negotiated them, and applied the proceeds to other and different purposes, and did not apply the proceeds thereof to the purposes aforesaid," (supposing that the "purposes aforesaid" refer to the matters mentioned in said section 8,) is disproved by the plaintiff's own admission on the trial, "that the defendants *452 had purchased the right of way through the city of *Fort Scott, and between fifteen and twenty acres of land within the city for depot-grounds, yard-room, and other purposes connected with its business."

The power of the city of Fort Scott to make the subscription to the capital stock of the defendant company, and to issue its bonds in payment therefor, is given in sections 51-53, c. 23, Gen. St. 1868. Section 51 provides that "the board of county commissioners of any county, the city council of any city, or the trustees of any incorporated town, may take stock for such county, city, or town in, or loan the credit thereof to, any railway company duly organized under this or any other law of the state." The remaining sections above cited provide for the manner in which such subscription can be made, and how it can be paid, but do not in terms make provision as to the method by which any of the corporations named might "loan its credit." The general powers of cities of the second class are found at section 4, c. 19, Gen. St. 1868, and are as follows, viz.: * * * Second. To purchase and hold real and personal property for the use of the city. * * * Fourth. To make all contracts and do all other acts in relation to the property and affairs of the city, necessary to the exercise of its corporate or administrative powers. * * * Section 5 then provides "that the powers hereby granted shall be exercised by the mayor and council of such cities, as are hereinafter provided." These statutes were passed by the legislature at the same session. It is clear from the provisions made for subscription to the capital stock of the company, and the payment thereof, that the legislature did not intend to confer that authority in the general powers delegated to cities of the second class. It is equally clear that the examination of those powers as enumerated demonstrates the fact that the legislature did not delegate any such powers. The only authority comes from sections 51-53, c. 28, Gen. St. What authority, then, did this latter statute confer? Simply to permit the city to subscribe to the capital stock of the railway company, and pay up such subscriptions in its bonds, or loan its credit to *453 *such company. No authority was given to enter into speculations in building machine-shops, engine-houses, speculating in real estate, or any such thing. If it had entered into a contract for such subscription or loan, with the conditions that are attached to the ordinances herein, it is barely possible it could enforce it in case of breach, by a recovery in damages,—but only such damages as would bear a pro rata proportion between those conditions performed, and those not performed. In other words, that it could only make such a contract as would itself furnish the measure of damages. It could take the necessary measures to protect itself in what it paid, but no further. Profits outside,—mere results,—disconnected with the consideration paid or received, although growing out of the contract, cannot inure to a municipal corporation. Individuals, or localities within the corporate limits, may be benefited, and make great gains, by the establishment and operation of machine-shops, the construction of engine-houses, depots, etc., that may have been secured by municipal liberality and expenditures; but the municipality, never. Its powers are restricted to purely municipal objects, and its property to municipal uses, only. This court has fully sustained this position in the case of the City of Leavenworth v. Norton, 1 Kan. *432. "All powers," says the court, "not expressly granted by the charter, or necessary to carry out the powers expressly granted, are denied. The corporation can take nothing by implication." The same doctrine is recognized in City of Leavenworth v. Rankin, 2 Kan. *357. But, independently of such restricted powers, I submit that the conditions upon which this subscription was made and paid, constitute such a contract, and only such an one, as furnishes its only measure of damages in case of breach. Sedg. Dam. 236. The only damages alleged in the petition are contained in the following paragraph, viz.: "The so doing would have greatly increased the business and augmented the population and wealth of said city, and thereby decreased the rate of taxation necessary to

*454 pay the interest on said bonds, so issued to pay said defendant." The "City of *Fort Scott" holds no legal relation whatever to the business, population, or wealth within its corporate limits. It has no title, legal or equitable, to any of the property of citizens within its jurisdiction, and can acquire none except for municipal purposes. Its citizens are in no sense stockholders, and the city is in no sense a trustee. If it may, under legislative permission, subscribe to the stock of railway companies, upon conditions providing for the construction of machine-shops, engine-houses, etc., it may, under the guise of such permission, by attaching the necessary conditions to such subscription, embark in speculative adventures ad libitum; thus calling into exercise corporate functions that are expressly prohibited. For the purposes of this argument I admit that it may enforce the performance of the conditions upon which the subscription was made, provided they are legal and mutually operative. But, in case of breach, it can only recover such damages as grow out of the contract, and then to be measured pro tanto. In the case at bar it is conceded that the railway company performed all the conditions except making Fort Scott the end of a division, and erecting at or near the city, machine-shops, etc., before doing so at any other point southwest from Sedalia. What proportion does the non-performance of these conditions bear to all the conditions attached to the subscription? That proportion ascertained, the measure of damage is easily fixed; and it is the only legal rule by which they can be fixed.

The damage alleged in the petition is too remote,—purely speculative. Who can say, or who can give an intelligent opinion, (which is not testimony,) that “the so doing would greatly have increased the business, and augmented the population and wealth, of said city?” The allegation of the petition attempts to make a statement of what can only be characterized as “loss of profits.” In this class of cases the contract furnishes the measure of damages by fixing data capable, by the aid of evidence aliunde, of reducing the damages to almost mathematical certainty. But in this class of cases there must *455 be proof,—conjecture will not do. Lentz v. Choteau, 42 *Pa.

St. 435; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489; Sedg. Dam. 72. The breach of every contract carries with it, ipso facto, the right to recover nominal damages. If a recovery is to be had beyond them, it can be sustained only by competent evidence. The petition in this case alleges a breach. The right to recover nominal damages follows as a matter of course; hence the defendant could not demur. Beyond this right to recover nominal damages upon the allegations of the petition, it is submitted that the petition states no cause of action whatever, nor one that could, by any proper amendment, be made sufficient. The contract between the defendant company and the city of Fort Scott was an entirety. Upon the face of the petition it is alleged that the city performed its part, and that the company did not perform all the conditions imposed upon it; thus admitting that it did perform all of its obligations except those specifically enumerated, viz., the failure to make Fort Scott the end of a division, and to construct engine-houses and machine-shops. Now, as the contract (as court of appeals in the case of Clark v. Norton, 49 N. Y. 246: "It is no answer to say that the plaintiff has sustained no injury. Courts cannot speculate as to probable or possible injury resulting from a departure from the statutory regulations touching the rights of person or property of others."

Plaintiff put to the witness William Fletcher the following question: "You may state, if you know, what amount the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad Company pay monthly to their employes at the machine-shops above spoken of,"—those at Parsons. The question was objected to by the defendant on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The court overruled the objection. The witness answered: "For the last two months it has been something over $3,000 per month." In any possible aspect, the question was incompetent for any purpose whatever. The only object counsel could have had in view was to furnish the jury some data upon which to estimate the damages the city of Fort Scott had sustained because the machine-shops were not located there. As I have argued before, the city of Fort Scott could not recover consequential damages, under the contract with the company, and the question was directed only to damages of that character. The money the company paid to its own employes for their service, if they had been residing at Fort

Scott, and the money paid them there, would have no effect in *559 **any way upon that city as a municipality.* The fact that this very money should be spent in that city, distributed among its different classes of trade, could in no possible legal sense affect the corporation of Fort Scott.

I have before referred to the fact that the contract between the city and the company failed to describe the character of the shops to be erected,—their extent and capacity. The contract would have been fulfilled by the erection of shops that might cost not to exceed one thousand dollars, and the employment of half a dozen operatives. The erection of shops of greater extent at Parsons, and the employment of a much greater operative force there, furnish no sort of evidence as to what the company ought to do under their contract with the city of Fort Scott. The necessities for extensive shops at Parsons might be apparent, while at Fort Scott those of much smaller capacity might supply the demands of the company. The assumption that the contract called for shops at Fort Scott similar to those at Parsons is unauthorized. Hence any evidence based upon it is clearly incompetent, and might mislead the jury. So, also, the assumption that the same number of hands ought to be employed at Fort Scott as at Parsons, receiving and paying out the same amount of money per week or per month, is equally unauthorized.

Plaintiff in error excepted to the introduction of testimony as to the comparative value of real estate in Fort Scott during the years 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, and 1874. The evidence on this point shows—First, that real estate in the city of Fort Scott had depreciated in value since July, 1872; and, second, that the fact became generally known in Fort Scott that the railway company had commenced the erection of shops at Parsons "sometime in July, 1872," from which it was claimed that the jury might infer that the latter fact caused the depreciation of real estate of sundry citizens of Fort Scott, and that thereby they might find that the city of Fort Scott had been damaged in the sum of one hundred thousand dollars! The *460 legal aspect of this kind of evidence had already been *discussed. It was incompetent in any and every view of the case. The jury, from these facts alone, had no right to draw such inference. If the people of the city of Fort Scott concede the fact that their prosperity and the value of their property depended upon so comparatively a trifling circumstance as the location of machine-shops "at or near their city," they admit what I, who have some knowledge of their business and resources, and the energy and enterprise of its leading citizens, do not believe.

But all this testimony is clearly improper for another reason. If the proposed evidence tended to prove anything in the way of damages, they were special damages. Special damages cannot be proved nor recovered without special allegations in the petition. The plaintiff's petition contains no allegations of that character, and none that can be construed as embracing them. As before shown, the only special damage alleged is that the "business would have been greatly increased," and the "population and wealth of the city greatly augmented." It cannot be pretended that such a plea justifies the introduction of evidence to show that there has been a depreciation of the real estate in the city. The one contemplates a "loss of profits" that would have accrued; the other, the loss of actual value of a thing already possessed. 1 Chit. Pl. 385; Butler v. Kent, 19 Johns. 228; Dumont v. Smith, 4 Denio, 319; Sedg. Dam. 67. Again, it is a fact well known to every intelligent citizen that there has been a general depreciation of real estate in every portion of the west,—in the towns and cities particularly; and it is a fact which constitutes a part of the experience and common knowledge of the day. Hence a fact of which the court will take judicial knowledge. Oppenheim v. Wolf, 3 Sandf. Ch. 571. Of facts that are "matters of public history, affecting the whole people," no proof is needed; courts take judicial notice of them. 1 Greenl. Ev. 8; Swinnerton v. Columbian Ins. Co., 37 N. Y. 174; Smith v. New York Cent. R. Co., 43 Barb. 225; U. S. v. Four Thousand American Gold Coin, 1 Woolw. 217; Buford v. Tucker, 44 Ala. 89; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220.

Thus, the evidence as to the depreciation of real estate in Fort *461 Scott proves nothing as to damages as resulting from *the failure of the company to erect their machine-shops at that point, because there was a general depreciation throughout the whole state.

It was error to refuse to give the special instructions asked for by plaintiff in error. The first instruction was based upon the theory that the jury would find any fact necessary to give a verdict against the defendant. The result showed the correctness of the theory. If given, it would have instructed them that if they found from the evidence that real estate in the city of Fort Scott had depreciated in value since June, 1872, before they could take that matter into consideration in estimating the damages in the case, they must further find from the evidence that such depreciation was the natural and proximate consequence of the breach of contract alleged in the plaintiff's petition. Of course the jury found the fact, and the further one that such depreciation was the natural and proximate consequence of the breach of the contract.

The second instruction asked was to the effect that, if the jury found from the evidence that such depreciation was the natural and proximate consequence of the acts complained of in plaintiff's petition, the damages to plaintiff are remote and speculative, and the plaintiff could only recover nominal damages. This instruction the court refused to give. The questions involved in this instruction and refusal have been considered in a previous portion of this argument. The proposition is too evident to require a word more of argument.

As to the whole case, upon the evidence submitted, I have a few words to say. The fact that machine-shops were constructed at Parsons before they were at Fort Scott is not denied. That such act on the part of the company is at least a technical violation of the contract is evident. I have no doubt the company had good and sufficient reason for such action. But if it is liable for such breach, such liability should be enforced in accordance with the rules the law has established, and not by dishonest, fraudulent means. There *462 *is absolutely no testimony tending to show any fact that can justify the verdict of the jury, and, under the allegations of the petition, none was admissible. Conceding every fact alleged in the petition to have been proved, the verdict could not be sustained. The contract between the city and the company was performed by the latter in the main. The railroad was constructed, depots built, right of way purchased, land bought for depots, engine-houses, yard-room, etc., and every real, substantial condition performed. The city has secured, for all time, its benefits for the purposes of business, convenience, and taxation. The great controlling object for which the subsidy was given has been obtained. But all this it ignores, and asks that it may recover back the full consideration it agreed to pay, because, forsooth, some portion of the contract has not been performed.

McComas & McKeighan, for defendant in error.

In respect to the motion in this case, which is in effect an effort to induce this court to change the certificate of the judge of the district court to a case made, we submit: First. This court possesses no power to grant such a motion. Second. The only thing the plaintiff in error can with any show of justice complain of, is the statement in the certificate that the "case" made does not contain all the evidence.

Upon the evidence taken under this commission, is this court satisfied that it does? If not, then the certificate is true, and to change the certificate would be compelling the district judge to certify to a falsehood. If this were an application to compel his signature to the certificate prepared by plaintiff in error, this court would say, "The decision of the trial judge that a bill of exceptions tendered him for his signature is untrue, is final and conclusive." Yet here the judge signs "the case made," and says in his certificate that it does not contain all the evidence, and the plaintiff in error asks that his certificate in this respect be modified. This is an attempt to do indirectly just what this court in Shepard v. Peyton, 12 Kan. *616, decides cannot be done. See, also, McClure v. Gulf R. Co., 9 Kan. *373.

*463 *The plaintiff in error alleges aggrievance by the statement of the judge in his certificate that the case made does not contain the charge of the court. It does not contain it. The case is before this court to speak for itself. Should the judge tell the truth, and say the case made did not contain the instructions, or sign a certificate which is not true? Section 275 of the Code provides: "When the argument is concluded the court shall give general instructions to the jury, which shall be in writing, and be numbered, and signed by the judge, if required by either party." Now, this record does not show, the pretended case made does not show, the plaintiff in error does not attempt by his depositions to show, that either party required the court to reduce its charge to writing, and number and sign the instructions. The most that is claimed is that the charge was in writing; that after it was delivered the judge pro tem. handed it to Sears; that he read it, handed it back to the judge, stating, "There are one or two points to which I wish to except." Is there any way for this court to find out what these points were, or did he inform the court below? Is it our fault that the error, if there was any, is not made affirmatively to appear? The most that can be claimed is that the judge made a written charge without being requested so to do; that it was not excepted to, except by the attorney stating to the court that there were "one or two points to which he wished to except," without stating what they were, or excepting to the asking, or that any specific exceptions be allowed, and noted on the record; and the said charge was lost or mislaid, and no copy has been supplied. These are the only material changes that the plaintiff in error seeks to make in the certificate by this motion; that is, the statement that the case made does not contain all the evidence, and does not contain the instructions of the court. To this modification we object, because (1) this court has no power or authority to change the certificate; (2) if it had, it will not do it, because the evidence shows that the certificate in this respect is true.

*464 The plaintiff in error claims that, under the statute of *1870, (Laws 1870, p. 168,) there could be no amendments to this case made, because no amendments were served upon the opposite party, or its counsel, and the judge was bound to sign it as it was. The material portion of said statute is as follows:

"Sec. 549. The court, or judge, may, upon good cause shown, extend the time for making a case, and the time within which the case may be served; and may also direct notice to be given of the time when a case may be presented for settlement after the same has been made and served, and amendments suggested, which, when so made and presented, shall be settled, certified, and signed by the judge who tried the cause. * * * And if no amendments are suggested by the opposing party, as above provided, said case shall be taken as true."

That is, when so presented to the judge within the time. Now, this statute will not bear the construction attempted to be given to it. Under the order in this case, made by consent, the plaintiff in error has thirty days in which to make a case. No time is fixed within which defendant in error was to suggest amendments. Such amendments could therefore be suggested at the time when the case was presented for settlement; this matter is governed by this consent order; this does not require that the amendments should be served upon any person. "If no amendments are suggested, etc., the case shall be taken as true." When shall it be taken as true? When the case is made and presented to the judge? And this case was not presented until the time had expired within which it was to be presented. Plaintiff in error had thirty days within which it might make and present to the judge for settlement a case. When the thirty days had expired, the power of the judge was exhausted. He could neither settle it nor certify it. At least, before they can get the technical advantage they claim under this statute, by reason of no amendments being properly served, a compliance with the order of the court must be shown on the part of plaintiff in error. But it is con-

*465 tended that the case was prepared, and on the afternoon *of the twenty-ninth day after the order of the court the attorney was at the office of the pro tem. judge, and the judge was not there; and also that the attorney called at the judge's office several times the next day, and did not find him. Suppose this case had been tried before the regular judge, and plaintiff in error had been given thirty days in which to make a case, and that he waited until the last day in the afternoon, or until the next to the last day, and then went to the office of the judge and found that he had left the county that morning, going perhaps to hold court in another county, and that he did not return until the time had expired,—whose fault would it be that no case could be settled? In this case the cause was tried before a judge pro tem. The plaintiff in error does not ask the court to charge the jury in writing; does not preserve or except to the charge of the court; files no bill of exceptions; takes thirty days to make a case; lets twenty-eight days of the time expire; comes to the law-office of the lawyer who acted as pro tem. judge, but serves no notice upon him to be at his office that day; finds him absent; spends the afternoon at such office; does not see the pro tem. judge until two days after the time has expired; then presents the case, not for "settlement," but for "signature and certification," and now claims that this court must change GALLOWAY's certificate so as to make it show a falsehood, because no amendments were served upon the opposite party or his attorney by the defendant in error. At most, such a "signature and certification" could only be made when the case is "presented to the judge." In law it was never presented, as the whole proceeding upon the fourth day of May was a nullity.

But if we take the transcript as it is, what does it show? It appears from this record that there is here what is claimed to be "a case made" under the provisions of the statutes, to which document there are two certificates,—one by the regular judge, who did not try the case, certifying that "the case" is correct, and another from the judge pro tem. who did try the case, certifying that such "case *466 made" is not correct. It *further appears from the record that the regular judge's certificate is based upon an affidavit filed before him by the attorney for the plaintiff in error, showing that upon one day he went with his case to the office of the judge pro tem. to have it settled and signed, and remained there from 12 o'clock M. to 6 o'clock P. M., without finding the judge pro tem., and not showing that he notified the judge pro tem. that he would be there on that day, or that he made any attempt on any day before or after that, within the thirty days he was given by the court to make a case, to see said judge pro tem., or to get him to settle and allow said case,—which affidavit is no part of the record or proceedings in this case, and can only be considered by the court as a matter of legal curiosity. It appears from the certificate of the regular judge that the sole ground upon which he certified to the correctness of the case made, was the statement in the said affidavit that no "amendments" were suggested to the case by the attorneys for the plaintiff below, while the certificate of the judge pro tem. shows that such amendments were suggested, and a copy thereof handed to him the day after the pretended case was served upon said plaintiff's attorneys, and he further certifies that said amendments were correct. "Under which king?" Whose certificate to the case are we to take? Who is to settle the case,—the judge who tried it, and who heard the evidence, or the judge who did not try the case, and who did not hear the evidence? The fact that the regular judge in his certificate professes to make it at the request of the attorney for plaintiff in error, and upon an ex parte affidavit, made not in the cause, but before him at chambers, of itself demonstrates his utter want of authority in the premises. It is the duty of the trial judge to settle the case. "The case and amendments shall be submitted to the judge, who shall settle and sign the same, and cause it to be attested by the clerk, and the seal of the court to be thereto attached." Laws 1871, p. 274. The attestation of the clerk and seal of the court are attached to the case as signed by the judge pro tem. on the fourth of May, and not *467 to the certificate *of the regular judge on the first of May.

We therefore contend that the certificate of the regular judge, appended to said supposed "case," is irregular, unauthorized, and void, and will be disregarded by this court. Hodgden v. Ellsworth Co., 10 Kan. *637.

In regard to the case settled and signed by the judge pro tem., we say that that also, and every part thereof, should be disregarded, and that none of the questions attempted to be thereby raised can be considered by the court, for the following reasons: First. This pretended case made is not a case, but simply a bill of exceptions. Bills of exceptions must be signed during the term. Code, § 300. "A case" is "so much of the proceedings and evidence or other matters in the action as may be necessary to present the errors complained of to the supreme court." Code, § 587. Second. The judge pro tem. was elected to hold the March term on account of the sickness of the regular judge. What are his powers and duties? These are prescribed in section 8, c. 28, Gen. St. p. 304: "The judge pro tem. shall have the same power as the regular judge while holding court, and in respect to cases tried before him, or in which he may be selected to act." "He shall have the same power as the regular judge," with this limitation, that such power is to be exercised "while holding court." The other two clauses being a further limitation of power, this power must not only be exercised while holding court, but it must be "in cases tried before him" while he is holding court, or in cases "in which he may be selected to act;" that is, cases on the docket of the term when he is elected. He has this power, "while holding court," as court, and not as a judge at chambers. The judge pro tem. has such power as is given by statute, and none other. This statute must be strictly construed, and the powers of the judge pro tem. cannot be extended by implication or construction. This is the general rule in respect to all bodies of limited or special jurisdiction. The judge pro tem. may be selected for two purposes: One is where the *468 disability of the judge extends to a particular case; there he would have authority, perhaps, over that case until it was ended; the other is where the disability of the judge extends to all the cases on the docket, as in case of the sickness of the judge. In the latter case his authority ends with the term. When court adjourns sine die, his official life is terminated; beyond that he has no power as judge or court, and no order he can make, by consent or otherwise, can confer power not given by statute, or extend his jurisdiction beyond the time when "he is holding court." His power is given "while holding court," and it dies with the term. Therefore, a judge pro tem., after the adjournment of the term for which he was elected, has no power or right to "settle" and "sign" a case, or cause "it to be attested by the clerk, and the seal of the court to be thereto attached." Section 1 of the act to amend the Code (Laws 1871, p. 168) does not apply to this class of cases: "Where the term of office of the trial judge shall have expired, or may hereafter expire, before the time fixed for making, settling, or signing a case, it shall be his duty to certify, sign, or settle the case in all respects the same as if his term had not expired." This language has no reference to a judge pro tem., but to the trial judge,—the regular judge who tried the case. The judge pro tem. has no "term of office" in the sense of the language used. This act is unconstitutional. Article 2, § 16. It contains more than one subject, in this, that it provides for the making and settling of a case, and also for extending the term of office of a district judge; and it repeals section 549 of the Code, to which it is an amendment. It attempts to extend the term of office of the district judge, which is fixed by the constitution. By section 5 of article 3 of the constitution the district judges hold their office for four years, and by section 12 until their "successors shall have been qualified." The term of office of a judge, therefore, cannot expire until the four years have expired, and until his successor "shall have been qualified." After "the term of office of the trial judge shall have expired," which can only be after his "successor shall have been qualified," he has no judicial power, and an act attempting to *469 *confer it upon him is unconstitutional and void,—would be, in effect, to have two district judges in one district exercising their several functions at the same time.

It is claimed by counsel for plaintiff in error that because notice of amendments to the case was not served upon him, but handed to the judge, the case should be considered correct. The provisions of section 1 of the Laws of 1871, p. 274, only apply when the time for making the case is not extended: "The case so made, or a copy thereof, shall, within three days after the judgment or order is entered, be served upon the opposite party, or his attorney, who may, within three days thereafter, suggest amendments thereto in writing, and present the same to the party making the case, or his attorney." Under this section the duty of the judge is to "settle the case," amendments or no amendments. It is not this section which provides if no amendments be suggested "the case shall be taken as true." This provision is section 1 of the Laws of 1870, p. 168, and is an amendment of section 549 of the Code, and contemplates cases only where the time for making the case is extended by the court, and this section is silent as to whether the amendments shall be suggested to the court. The order of the court gave the plaintiff in error thirty days from the date of the order to make a case, and afterwards, before the case was made, adjourned sine die. This was April 2, 1874. The order is as follows: "And by consent of parties, made in open court, it is ordered that said defendant have thirty days from the date of this entry in which to make a case and exceptions, which case so made shall be served upon the plaintiff's attorney at least five days before the same is presented to the judge pro tem. of this court for settlement, allowance, and signature." No time is given for amendments. Under this order we contend that it was the duty of the judge pro tem., if he had any authority in the premises, to settle the case if it was presented to him in thirty days. The case was not presented to the judge until thirty-two days had expired. It was then too late. The order giving the plaintiff in error thirty days in which to make *470 a case, does not mean thirty-two days. So, *in any view of the case, we maintain that the court can only consider such questions in this record as arise outside of the pretended case made.

The first error complained of is that the court refused to give special instructions asked for by the plaintiff in error. We answer: The record, outside of this pretended case made, does not show any such instructions were asked for. Neither the record, nor pretended case, shows what instructions the court did give, or that the court was asked by either party to instruct the jury in writing. It is not necessary for the court to repeat its instructions. Rice v. State, 3 Kan. *152; City of Topeka v. Tuttle, 5 Kan. *312; State v. Volmer, 6 Kan. *371. The instructions asked for by plaintiff in error might have been in the general charge. Error must be made to affirmatively appear. This is the settled doctrine of all appellate courts. Moore v. McIntosh, 6 Kan. *39; Hall v. Jennes, Id. *356; Woolledge v. Converse, 8 Kan. *473; Winsor v. Cole, 10 Kan. *620, *625. Equally universal is the presumption that the court below did its duty. Linton v. Housh, 4 Kan. *536. Where the charge of the court is omitted from the record, the supreme court will presume the proper instructions were given, and, on this presumption, will not examine instructions refused. Pacific R. Co. v. Nash, 7 Kan. *280. As a whole, the instructions asked for by the plaintiff in error are not law, and ought to have been refused. Douglas v. Wolf, 6 Kan. *88.

The second error complained of by plaintiff in error is that the facts set forth in the petition are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff in error to more than nominal damages. Why not? If, under any proof that could or might be offered, under the allegations of the petition, the plaintiff could show itself entitled to recover $100,000, then the petition states facts sufficient to justify the verdict. The amount of damage in actions of this character can only be ascertained from the evidence. Code, § 128. The "advantages" or "benefits" from a "public improvement," railroad, or machine-shops, are susceptible of being estimated by the jury under proper evidence and instructions. Miles v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 31 Mo. 407; State v. Evans, 2 Scam. 208, 210; State v. Wilson, Id. 226. Suppose the railway company had received and appropriated these bonds without *471 complying with any of the stipulations of its contract? The city could not defend against the bonds in the hands of innocent purchasers for value. Its only remedy would be to pay them, and sue upon the contract. Certainly, in such a case, the measure of damages would not be less than the amount of the bonds. Is this changed by the company performing a part of its contract, unless it could be at least shown that such part performance was of some benefit or advantage to the city? And is this not a subject of evidence? There is nothing in the petition to show that this part performance was of any benefit to the city. Suppose the company were suing on these bonds; would it not be a good defense in whole or part, depending on the evidence, to show that it had failed in whole or part to comply with its contract? To the same extent cannot an action be maintained against the company where it has sold the bonds to an innocent purchaser?

The next error complained of is that improper evidence was admitted. This assignment is disposed of by the argument made upon the fourth assignment, namely, none of the evidence is before the court for review.

The remaining error complained of by plaintiff in error is that the jury did not give a proper response to that part of the finding embraced in the words, "How are such damages made up, and from what data?" To answer the question, must the jury make an analysis of a general verdict, or must they explain all the mental processes by which they severally reached their conclusions? Courts sometimes give a bad reason for a good judgment. Juries would generally do so. If they in each case were required to state how their verdicts were "made up," and their verdicts set aside when any illogical steps in the process were detected, this statute would have a most benign effect in the administration of law and justice. And upon "what data." This is a Latin word, in the plural number, and to find the data upon which a verdict rests, would be to find all the facts, and not "a particular fact." The jury are to be governed by the evidence; and to ask them upon what data they found their verdict is *472 equivalent *to asking them upon what evidence? The court ought not to have propounded this question to the jury, but as it did so—at the instance of the plaintiff in error—it cannot complain, and the response of the jury was a wise answer to a foolish question.

As to what is the measure of the plaintiff's damages in this action, whether the amount of the bonds issued, or the injury which necessarily and proximately results from an admitted breach of the contract by the plaintiff in error, it may be somewhat difficult to say. The petition puts it in the alternative. If this is an entire contract, and the plaintiff in error is compelled to perform all its conditions, or return the consideration it receives, then, of course, there is no material error in respect to the admission of evidence on the subject of damages, as the jury only found the amount of the bonds given to the railroad company by the city. Baldwin v. Bennett, 4 Cal. 392; Hunt v. Test, 8 Ala. 713. Where it is impossible to estimate the damages, the consideration paid is the measure of damage. Coffee

v. Meiggs, 9 Cal. 363. Suppose that in the case at bar the railway company had complied with the contract in full, and the city had failed, or it had partially complied, and the city had prevented it from complying, can it be doubted that in such a case, in an action by the company against the city, the measure of damages, in the language of the California cases, would be "the price agreed to be paid," because, from the "nature of the contract," it would not be practicable to estimate the damages? Suppose the railway company had complied with the contract in every particular, what would be its damages upon a suit against the city for the breach of the contract? Manifestly the amount of the bonds. Here the city has paid the company in advance. It was to subscribe $75,000 to the capital stock of the company. It has done it. It was to assign that stock to the company, or a person by it named, for a nominal consideration. It has done that. It was then to donate $25,000 to *473 the company for grounds for machine-shops, etc. It *has done that,—which is all admitted in the answer of plaintiff in error. The railroad on its part was to build its through line via Fort Scott, and make Fort Scott the end of a division. This was an entire contract. The city advances the $100,000; the railroad company fails to perform its contract. Cannot the city recover it back? Was not the performance of all the stipulations of its contract a condition precedent to the right of the railroad company to demand the bonds? Having received and converted them without complying with its contract, does not the amount of the bonds furnish the measure of damages in an action by the city? Can the company be allowed to pocket the full consideration for its contract, and perform only in part, and then, because it is difficult or impracticable to assess the real damages sustained, say, in court of justice, that the plaintiff is only entitled to nominal damages? The principle may be further illustrated: If the railroad company had simply built the road, and had not made Fort Scott the end of a division, or erected its machine-shops there, it could not, in an action, compel the city to issue the bonds, or recover their value, because the contract is entire. It is only where the party agrees to receive a part performance that the other party can recover pro tanto, or where the law implies such an agreement. If A. make an absolute purchase of two hundred bushels of corn, at 25 cents per bushel, to be delivered in thirty days, and B., the vendor, delivers 100 bushels in ten days, but delivers no more, B. can recover, after the thirty days expire, for the 100 bushels delivered; because, by A.'s accepting the 100 bushels when he could have refused to accept it, and keeping it when he could have returned it, the law implies an agreement on his part to treat the contract as severable; but this implication arises only when a part performance is accepted, where it could be refused, or where the things delivered could be returned. This exception cannot apply to the city. It could not have refused to accept the advantages of this part performance; it could not have returned the advantages derived therefrom to the company. 1 Story, Cont. §§ 25-25d; 2 Pars. *474 *Cont. 658-560. Is not the converse of this proposition true also? Where the railway company has only performed part of an entire and indivisible contract, but has succeeded in getting the full consideration for its entire performance, cannot the city recover back the whole consideration? "A party is always entitled to recover on a breach of contract such damages as are the natural, direct, and proximate result of such breach, and such other damages as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time of the contract." Johnson v. Mathews, 5 Kan. *118. This is a general principle. It is to be presumed that the court so charged the jury in this case. It may be difficult to tell exactly what particular facts the jury ought to take into consideration in deciding upon the amount of damages the plaintiff should recover. The difficulty and delicacy of the question have nothing to do with the right of the plaintiff to recover, or else we would have a wrong without a remedy. "Where, from the nature of the case, damages cannot be estimated with certainty, all the facts and circumstances reasonably tending to show damages should be placed before the jury to enable them, in the exercise of good sense and judgment, to find such probable estimate as will produce adequate compensation." Gilbert v. Kennedy, 22 Mich. 117; Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542. The verdict can be sustained under proper evidence and instructions, upon the allegations of the petition, upon this theory. The petition, therefore, states facts sufficient to justify the verdict, and that is the only question which can be examined upon this record.

BREWER, J. At the March, 1874, term of the district court of Bourbon county, the city of Fort Scott, defendant in error, obtained a judgment against the plaintiff in error for the sum of $100,000, for an alleged breach of contract. To reverse that judgment *475 the railway company brings this proceeding *in error. At the outset we are met with an unpleasant controversy of a personal character. It is insisted by counsel for the city that no valid case made is here, and that we can only consider such questions as arise upon the pleadings and judgment. On the other hand, the counsel for the company moves to strike out certain portions of the certificate of the trial judge to the case made, on the ground that they are surplusage, and that they are "intentionally false, and were fraudulently incorporated," and charges a conspiracy between the counsel for the city and the trial judge to prevent the railway company from obtaining a case for review.

The case was tried before a judge pro tem., who, on the day of the rendition of the judgment, the second of April, gave thirty days in which to make and serve a case. The case was not signed by such judge until the fourth of May. It is insisted that upon the expiration of the term the powers of the judge pro tem. ceased, and that he could not thereafter do any act in the suit, not even to the extent of settling and authenticating a case made. The case was signed by the regular district judge on the first of May, and it is claimed that a judge has no power to settle and sign a case made, except in proceedings and actions regularly had and tried before him. In other words, the claim is that, upon the expiration of the term at which a case is tried, if tried before a judge pro tem., the power to obtain a case made ceases. It may be remarked that it does not distinctly appear that the term had expired at the time this case was signed by the judge pro tem. Nothing in the law prevented the continuance of the March term beyond the fourth of May. There is no positive affirmation in the record that the term had been adjourned. The counsel for the city objected, it is true, to any action of the judge, on the ground that the term had been adjourned; but the judge overruled the objection, and it may be that he so ruled because the fact was not as asserted, instead of because he deemed the law not to be as claimed. We do not, however, rest any decision upon this

*476 ground, for, while there is no positive assertion that the court was adjourned, it seems probable, from the ruling of the judge upon the objection of the city's counsel, as well as from the opening words of his certificate, that such was the fact. The certificate of the trial judge, although a judge pro tem., and made after the adjournment of the term at which the case is tried, is, if there be no other objection to it, sufficient. That the judge before whom a case is tried is the proper officer to settle the record of the proceeding upon such trial, is manifest. And the power of a judge to settle and sign a case, although his term of office has expired, and although there be no statutory authority therefor, has been affirmed by courts of the highest authority. Fellows v. Tait, 14 Wis. 156; Davis v. Village of Menasha, 20 Wis. 194; Hale v. Haselton, 21 Wis. 320. We have a statute bearing upon this question. In section 1 of chapter 85 of the Laws of 1870 it is provided that the case made, "when so made and presented, shall be settled, certified, and signed by the judge who tried the cause;" and, also, that "in all causes heretofore or hereafter tried, when the term of office of the trial judge shall have expired, or may hereafter expire, before the time fixed for making or settling and signing a case, it shall be his duty to certify, sign, or settle the case, in all respects as if his term had not expired." A statute like this is not to be construed in any restricted, technical manner, but liberally, in the ends of justice, that defeated litigants may have a full opportunity for the re-examination in the supreme court of the questions decided against them below. In Thurber v. Ryan, 12 Kan. *453, we held this statute applicable to a case where, before the time for settling and signing a case made, a law took effect detaching the county from one and transferring it to another judicial district, thus giving to the county a new district judge. It may be that it is, strictly speaking, hardly correct to speak of the "term of office" of a pro tem. judge. Perhaps he may not technically have a "term of office;" and yet such an expression does no great violence to language. It clearly comes within the spirit and *477 purpose of this statute, that whenever the judge before whom a case is tried shall, before the expiration of the time allowed for settling and signing the case made, have ceased to be judge, he shall nevertheless settle and sign the case made. His judicial life has ended, yet he may and must prepare for the review of the appellate court the record of the proceedings before him. We think, therefore, the certificate of the trial judge must be held good, notwithstanding this objection.

Again, it is insisted that the case made must be disregarded because it was not settled and signed until after the expiration of the time allowed therefor. This claim we think arises from a misapprehension of the statute,—a misapprehension evidently shared by counsel on both sides. On the second of April an order was made that the railroad company "have thirty days in which to make and serve a case." On the fourth of May the case was settled and signed. This, it is true, was more than thirty days after time of the order of extension. But that order did not fix the time for settling and signing the case, or direct notice to be given of the time for presenting the case for settlement. It simply extended the time for making and serving the case. The making and serving of a case are the acts of the plaintiff in error; the suggestion of amendments, the act of the defendant in error; and the settling and signing of the case, the duty of the judge. Section 547 of the Civil Code (Gen. St. 737) authorizes a party to make a case. Section 548 provides that he shall, within three days after the judgment or order is entered, serve such case made upon the opposite party, or his attorney, who may, within three days thereafter, suggest amendments, and present the same to the party making the case. "The case and amendments shall be submitted to the judge, who shall settle and sign the same; and the case so made shall thereupon be filed with the other papers in the action." Section 549, as amended in 1870, (Laws 1870, p. 168,) gives the court power to extend the time for making and serving a case, *478 and also to direct *notice to be given of the time when the case may be presented for settlement, after it has been made and served, and amendments suggested. Now, the extension of the time for making and serving a case does not take away the time for suggesting amendments. The three days thereafter, in which to suggest amendments, still remain. And where there is no order fixing the time for presenting the case for settlement, and only the simple order giving an extension of time for making and serving a case, the case is duly settled and signed, if settled and signed within three days after the time fixed for making and serving a case. It is true, the statute may be read so as to mean that the three days in which to suggest amendments shall be three days after the actual service of the case, and not after the time given in which to serve. Thus, in this case, the case was served on the twenty-first of April, several days before the expiration of the time granted. Upon such a construction, amendments would have been required by the 24th. But the other construction, that making the three days to commence upon the expiration of the time given for making and serving the case, while equally warranted by the language, is more in harmony with the definitions and regularity of judicial proceedings, and, therefore, to be preferred. A party whose adversary has taken time to make a case knows exactly when he must be ready with his amendments, and can arrange his business accordingly, while otherwise he must be in suspense waiting the action of his adversary, and ready to proceed immediately after such action. We conclude, then, that as the case was settled and signed within the three days after the expiration of the time given for making and serving it, it was settled and signed in time.

The certificate having been signed by the proper officer, by one having authority to sign, and within the legal time, we come to the motion of plaintiff in error to strike out a part of the certificate. We give the certificate in full. It is as follows:

*479 "I, JOHN M. GALLOWAY, being a practicing lawyer in the *city of Fort Scott, Kansas, and having held the March term, 1874, of said district court, within and for the county aforesaid, as judge pro tem., duly elected and qualified, because of the sickness and absence of the Hon. M. V. Voss, the regular judge of said district, and, as the said judge pro tem., having heard and tried the above-entitled cause at said March term, 1874, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing case made by defendant was presented to me by Wm. C. Webb,<sup>1</sup> attorney for the defendant, the M., K. & T. Railway Company, on this fourth day of May, 1874, for settling, signing, and allowing the same as of record. And at the same time and place appeared H. C. McComas, John E. McKeighan, and William C. Stewart, attorneys for the plaintiff, the city of Fort Scott. And the said attorneys for plaintiff objected to the said case presented being examined, settled, signed, or allowed by me, because the time for making, presenting, settling, and allowing said case had expired; and because a pro tem. judge, after the adjournment of the term of court which he held, has no further power to act as judge, and because the order herein made, by which the time was fixed for making, presenting, and

Although wholly immaterial to any question controverted or decided in this court, it is due to the "truth of (personal) history," to say that Mr. Webb was not then, or at any time, the attorney or an attorney for the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company in this action or proceeding; but, in presenting the case made to the trial judge, for his signature, Mr. W. was merely performing a friendly office for (and at the personal request of) Judge SEARS, the company's attorney, who was at that time absent.

allowing said case was a consent order, and could not be altered or extended by the court, which objection was by me overruled and denied, and to which ruling the plaintiff, by its attorneys, duly excepted. And I do hereby refuse to extend the time for making and presenting this case, and do find, as a matter of fact, at the request of the plaintiff, that the time for making, presenting, settling, and allowing said case has expired, and that no case made was presented to me within the time allowed the defendant by the order in said case made.

"I further certify that the foregoing case made, together with the amendments suggested by the plaintiff, and submitted to me in writing on the twenty-second of April, 1874, is correct, except that it does not contain all the evidence, and does not contain the charge of the court. It is therefore ordered and directed that the case as above made and presented, with amendments thereto, be filed with the clerk of said district court aforesaid, and made a part of the record."

*480 *The motion is to strike out that portion commencing with the words, "And at the same time and place," and ending with the words, "and does not contain the charge of the court," and also from the last clause the words, "with amendments thereto." Upon this motion a large amount of testimony has been taken in depositions before a commissioner heretofore appointed by this court. We forbear commenting upon this testimony, for it is conflicting as well as voluminous, and anything like a fair statement of it would require more space than we can afford to give. And besides, conceding that the charge were proven as fully and as broadly as it is made, that the facts were exactly as claimed by the plaintiff in error, that the statements objected to were intentionally false, and fraudulently incorporated, and that there was a conspiracy between the counsel for the city and the judge pro tem. to prevent the company from obtaining a case made, still we should be constrained to hold that the motion must be overruled. It involves the reformation of the certificate, and, in substance, asks this court to make a new certificate. The correction here sought is the striking out of a portion; but the principle would be the same if the application were to add something. In either case the effect is to set aside the certificate as made, and substitute a new one. It becomes really the certificate of this court, instead of the trial judge's. It may well be that if a certificate is shown to be intentionally false, and fraudulently prepared, this court should disregard it; but it should be wholly disregarded. The verdict of a jury may be shown to be willfully false to the evidence, and fraudulently prepared, but the court has no power to reform it by eliminating the false and adding the true. It must be rejected altogether. The statute we have quoted heretofore provides that the case should be settled and signed by the trial judge. If he has acted corruptly and fraudulently, the whole act of settling and signing the entire certificate is worthless. If the corruption is in favor of *481 the plaintiff in error, and to *secure a reversal, ordinarily the rights of the defendant in error will be protected in a new trial. If in favor of the defendant in error, and to prevent a reversal, cases may arise in which it will be the duty of the reviewing court to set aside the judgment and order a new trial, presuming, on account of such corruption in the preparation of the case, that the plaintiff in error was wronged in the trial, especially when this corruption involves a conspiracy between the judge and the defendant in error. But even in such a case we should not attempt to make, by addition or subtraction, a correct certificate, but should reject it altogether. For the correction of a certificate involves a determination of what actually took place,—of what is true, and what is false. This court, before it could make a correction, must determine, not merely that the trial judge acted corruptly, but that his certificate was false in fact. For if the certificate be in fact true, the plaintiff in error has suffered no wrong. And no matter how corrupt and bad the judge may have been, the party has no right to have anything but the truth in the case or certificate. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Simpson, 11 Kan. *494. And upon a motion like this, to inquire into what actually took place in the trial of a case in the district court,—a trial which may have been tedious and protracted,—and to settle, upon affidavits and depositions, a bill of exceptions or case made, is a proceeding not warranted by authority, nor likely to accomplish successfully the intended result. Suppose the judge had refused to sign the certificate prepared, claiming it to be untrue: Would this court, by mandamus, compel him to sign it, or hear evidence to show that it was true, or that the judge corruptly refused to sign it? Shepard v. Peyton, 12 Kan. *616. Take the case before us: To strike out the portions of the certificate objected to would leave the case made with a statement that it contained the entire testimony certified to be correct. With the certificate as it stands, it appears that other testimony was also admitted. Now, conceding the corrupt and fraudulent conspiracy, it does not follow that this particular statement in the certificate is untrue. The case as prepared *482 may *not in fact contain the entire testimony, and it would be wrong to leave it with such a certificate. And how can we determine its truth or falsity, except by a tedious and unsatisfactory inquiry as to what testimony was actually offered and received on the trial? Surely, such a proceeding is unreasonable, and would tend to error and injustice. The motion, therefore, to strike out must be overruled. The only substantial difference between the record with the certificate as it stands, and with it as sought to be corrected, is that in the one case it does not appear to contain the entire testimony, and in the other it does. For the record does not purport to contain the charge of the court; and one of the matters presented by plaintiff in error, on the hearing of its motion, is a claim that it could not obtain from the judge his charge.

Upon the case as it stands before us appear two principal questions; one involving the validity of the original contract between the parties, and the other the measure of damages for the breach of such contract. On the twenty-fifth of July, 1870, an ordinance was passed by the city council of the city of Fort Scott ordering an election on the thirtieth of August following, upon the question of subscribing to the stock of the corporation, plaintiff in error, and issuing the bonds of the city in payment therefor. The election was held, and resulted in favor of the subscription. The bonds were issued, and the subscription and bonds accepted by the company. For a breach of the terms of this subscription was this action brought. The first, fourth, fifth, and eighth sections of this ordinance are the only material ones, and read as follows:

"Section 1. That a special election be and the same is hereby ordered to be held in the several wards of the city of Fort Scott, on Tuesday, the thirtieth of August, 1870, for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of said city the question of subscribing, in the name of the city, and on the conditions hereinafter prescribed, for seventy-five thousand dollars of the capital stock of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and also the further question of authorizing the mayor and city council of said city to issue *483 *the bonds of the city in a sum not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars, for the purpose of procuring the right of way for the road of said company through the corporate limits of the city, and, in addition thereto, of purchasing grounds, as hereinafter provided, not exceeding in the aggregate twenty-eight acres, for depots, engine-houses, machine-shops, and yard-room, and donating the same to said company.

"Sec. 4. If, upon a canvass of the votes cast at said election, it shall be found that a majority of such votes are in favor of the stock and donation, the mayor and city council shall be authorized and required to subscribe, in the name of the city of Fort Scott, for seventy-five thousand dollars of the capital stock of said company, on the following fundamental conditions, to-wit:

"First. That the said company, their successors, or assigns, shall, within six months from the date of the election above provided for, construct, or cause to be constructed, and put in practical operation, a line of railway from Sedalia, in Missouri, to the city of Fort Scott, and shall extend the same, as soon thereafter as practicable, in a south-westerly direction, to a point on the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway, lately known as the Southern Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad, Eastern Division.

"Second. That said company shall make said line of railway from Sedalia, or from any point to the north-westwardly thereof, to which said company may hereafter extend its road, or cause the same to be made, the great through line by way of Fort Scott, to the south-west and south, through the Indian Territory, to Texas; and no other line of railway shall be constructed by said company, or its successors, from Nevada, in Missouri, south of Fort Scott, through Bourbon or Crawford counties, in Kansas.

"Third. Said company shall make or cause Fort Scott to be made the end of a division on said line of road, and shall erect engine-houses and machine-shops at or near said point, before doing so at any other point southwest of Sedalia, on the through line of railroad from Sedalia by way of Fort Scott to the Indian Territory and Texas, as soon as the business of said line shall, in the opinion of said company, render such shops necessary.

"Sec. 5. The mayor and city council shall be further authorized and required to issue the bonds of the city in payment for said stock, at par; that is, to the amount of seventy-five thousand dollars. Said bonds shall be issued in sums of not less than one thousand dollars each, shall bear interest at the rate of seven per centum per annum, payable semi-annually in the city of New York, where the principal shall also be payable, shall have interest coupons attached, shall be payable thirty years after the date thereof, and shall be executed in due form of law."

"Sec. 8. It shall also be the duty of the mayor and city council, in case the election hereinbefore provided for shall result in *484 favor of the stock and donation, to proceed forth*with to confer with the proper officers of said company, or its successors, and ascertain at the earliest possible moment the route selected by said company, or its successors, for the line of their road through the corporate limits of the city, and also the grounds chosen by them for depot and other purposes; and they are hereby authorized and required to proceed, in such manner as may be deemed most conducive to the interests of the city, to purchase so much land as may be necessary for the right of way through said city, and also twenty-five acres exclusive of the right way, at such point, convenient to the city limits, as the officers of said company may select, for depot, engine-houses, machine-shops and yard-room; and they are further authorized to issue bonds of the city, not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars in amount, for the purpose of raising funds to pay for the same: provided, however, that in case the mayor and city council shall be of the opinion that the interest of the city will be better subserved by purchasing eight acres within the city limits, and twenty acres outside the city, at some point to be designated by the proper officers of said company, for machine-shops, engine-houses, and yard-room, they shall be authorized, and hereby required, to do so, and to issue the bonds of the city in payment therefor, as above provided."

Section 10 provided for donating to the company the right of way and grounds, when purchased. By subsequent arrangement between the city and the company, the twenty-five thousand dollars of bonds were issued directly to the company, in lieu of the purchase by the city of the right of way and grounds. It appears that the company has complied with the first and second conditions of the subscription, but has broken the third, by building engine-houses and machine-shops at Parsons, and none at Fort Scott, and by making Parsons, and not Fort Scott, the end of a division. The petition, after the allegations necessary to show the breach of contract by the company, contains these, and only these, allegations as to damages:

"And the plaintiff charges that it has been greatly damaged by reason of the conduct of the defendant in this behalf; that if the defendant had complied with its said agreement, and made the city of Fort Scott the end of a division on the line of its road, and *485 erected the said engine-houses and *machine-shops at or near said city, the so doing would have greatly increased the business and augmented the population and wealth of the said city, and thereby decreased the rate of taxation necessary to pay the interest on said bonds so issued to the defendant. The plaintiff avers that the sole consideration of and for the said twenty-five thousand dollars in bonds was to enable the defendant to purchase grounds for said engine-houses and machine-shops, etc.; and that the defendant received said bonds, negotiated them, and applied the proceeds to other and different purposes, and did not apply the proceeds thereof to the purpose aforesaid."

In reference to the validity of the contract, so far as it involved the condition of locating the machine-shops, etc., at Fort Scott, it is hardly so presented by counsel as to justify us in deciding the question. Counsel for the city ignore it entirely, and assume, virtually, that there is no question of its validity. Counsel for the company do not directly attack its validity, nor discuss the power of the city to attach such a condition to its subscription. We quote the language of the brief. After referring to the act for the organization of cities of the second class, to show that no power is there delegated in reference to such a subscription or contract, and asserting that the only power given is that by sections 51, 52, and 53 of chapter 23 of the Laws of 1868, it says:

"What authority, then, did this latter statute confer? Simply to permit the city to subscribe to the capital stock of the railway company, and pay up such subscriptions in its bonds, or loan its credit to such company. No authority was given to enter into speculation in building machine-shops, engine-houses, speculating in real estate, or any such thing. If it had entered into a contract for such subscription, or loan, with the conditions that are attached to the ordinances herein, it is barely possible it could enforce it in case of breach, by a recovery in damages,—but only such damages as would bear a pro rata proportion between those conditions performed, and those not performed. In other words, that it could only make such a contract as would itself furnish the measure of damages. It could take the necessary measures to protect itself in what it paid, but no further.

* * * For the purpose of this argument, I admit that it may enforce the performance of the conditions upon which the subscription was made, provided they are legal and mutually operative. But in case of breach it can only recover such damages as grow out of the contract, and then to be measured pro tanto."

We shall therefore assume that the contract of subscription, with the conditions attached, was valid and binding. It is obvious that the question of power of a municipality, in this direction, may arise in at least two ways: First, where, without any subscription to the capital stock, a municipality makes a contract with a railroad company for the location by the latter of its engine-houses and machine-shops in consideration of municipal aid; and, second, where the location is made as a condition of a subscription to the stock. Chapter 29 of the Laws of 1869, amending the sections of the law of 1868 heretofore cited, provides in terms for subscriptions by municipalities "upon such condition or conditions as may be prescribed" by them. So that express statutory authority is given for a subscription upon conditions other than the mere cash or bond payment for the stocks.

We pass, then, to the remaining question as to the measure of damages. As the charge of the court is not in the record, we cannot say what rule was laid down by the court for the admeasurement of the damages, and can only inquire whether the testimony admitted, bearing upon the matter of damages, was properly admitted. While the certificate of the judge shows that the record does not contain all the testimony, yet as the amendment suggested by counsel for the city was to insert, in lieu of the statement that it contained the entire testimony, the statement that "the foregoing is the substance of the testimony taken upon said trial and submitted to the jury," we feel justified in assuming that we have in the record the main matters of evidence upon which the jury based their estimate of damages. Whether this be so or not, if matters improper for their consideration were submitted to them, we cannot say that such matters did not enter into and form a part of their estimate of damages, and so prejudice the rights of the plaintiff in error. Referring to the record, we *487 find that the court permitted testimony, over the objection of the defendant, tending to show the changes in the population and in the values of real estate in the city, the number of manufactories, dry-goods stores, etc., the price of fuel, etc., from the year prior to the subscription, and until after the building of the machine-shops and engine-houses at Parsons. And, so far as population and values are concerned, the inquiry was not directed to the number of hands which would be employed about the shops and engine-houses, nor to the value of shops and houses as taxable property, but to the general changes of population, and the depreciation generally through the city of the value of real estate. It also permitted, over like objection, testimony as to the amount paid monthly by the railroad company to their employes at the machine-shops at Parsons. It is obvious that this testimony had no bearing on the question of a breach of the contract, but must have been admitted as bearing upon the question of damages. These matters, therefore, were presented as tending to show how much the city had been damaged by the failure of the company to comply with its contract. In other words, if the city had lost in population since the building of the shops at Parsons, the jury might attribute the loss to that fact, and mulct the company in damages accordingly. If real estate had declined in value, if the number of stores, factories, etc., had decreased, the same fact might be taken as the cause, and the company held responsible therefor.

We are clearly of the opinion that this testimony was inadmissible, though we are not so clear as to what, in a case like this, is the proper rule for the measurement of damages. The testimony was inadmissible for two or three reasons.

First. It involves a mere speculation. There is no certain connection of cause and effect between the failure to build machine-shops and engine-houses, and the decline in population, or decrease in values. Granted that the failure may tend to produce the decline and the decrease, yet it is but one of many causes; and who can tell, or by what process can it be determined, how much of the result is *488 due to *this cause? A general or local financial depression, or failure of crops, the lack of business energy or tact on the part of the citizens, the jealousy of rival places, or the prejudice of the surrounding population, the superior activity and prosperity of adjacent cities, and many other causes, may all have been actively at work, and the main if not the sole causes of the depreciation. To prove the result, and permit the jury to attribute it wholly to the single cause, would often work the greatest injustice. To present all these phenomena, and ask them to determine the extent to which this single cause has contributed to the result, is to invite the jury to the wildest speculation. It is something beyond the power of human wisdom to determine.

Again, this is tantamount to an inquiry into profits,—and profits both remote and uncertain. The city seeks to recover, not what it has paid out, nor the value of that which the company agreed to build, nor the amount which it would be entitled to collect in the way of taxes off from such improvements, but rather what profits it would have made out of the shops and engine-houses if they had been built according to contract. For the results in the way of increase of population, values, and business are really nothing but the profits which might be expected to flow from the performance by the company of its contract. Now, while profits are sometimes a legitimate matter of inquiry in actions for damages on account of breach of contract, yet it is only when such profits are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract. The direct result of the performance of the contract would be the addition to the taxable property of the city of the value of the improvements made within the city. The indirect result might be the increase of the value of real estate generally through the city. And it was this indirect result to which the examination of witnesses was directed. Suppose that it were within the power of a city, as it is of a private corporation, to engage in manufacturing, and it had made a contract with an individual to build for it a factory: What, in case of a breach of such con-

*489 tract would be its measure of damages? Could it recover for the enhanced value of the real estate within the city which might be expected to result from the addition of such a manufacturing establishment? Clearly not. Such a result, while it might be termed the profits to flow from the enterprise, is a result too remote and uncertain to become a legitimate matter in the estimate of damages. Yet, wherein does the illustration differ from the case at bar?

Again, the theory of the law, in the matter of damages, is compensation. It aims at nothing more. Indeed, it is said by a leading writer on the subject that "the law in fact aims, not at the satisfaction, but at a division of the loss." Sedg. Dam. (3d Ed.) 35. It does not intend to so award damages that a plaintiff profits more by his adversary's breach than he would by his performance of his contract. In matters ex delicto the range of inquiry is wider than in actions ex contractu. Some reasons for this are well stated by Mr. Justice CHRISTIANCY in the case of Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 552, from whom we quote as follows: "There are some important considerations which tend to limit damages in an action upon contract which have no application to those purely of tort. Contracts are made only by the mutual consent of the respective parties; and each party, for a consideration, thereby consents that the other shall have certain rights as against him which he would not otherwise possess. In entering into the contract, the parties are supposed to understand its legal effect, and consequently the limitations which the law, for the sake of certainty, has fixed for the recovery of damages for its breach. If not satisfied with the risk which these rules impose, the parties may decline to enter into the contract, or may fix their own rule of damages when, in their nature, the amount must be uncertain. * * *

Again, in the majority of cases upon contract, there is little difficulty from the nature of the subject in finding a rule by which substantial compensation may be readily estimated; and it is only in those cases where this cannot be done, and where, from the nature of the *490 stipulations or the subject-matter, the actual damages resulting from a breach are more or less uncertain in their nature, or difficult to be shown with accuracy by the evidence, under any definite rule, that there can be any great failure of justice by adhering to such rule as will most nearly approximate the desired result. And it is precisely in these classes of cases that the parties have it in their power to protect themselves against any loss to arise from such uncertainty, by estimating their own damages in the contract itself, and providing for themselves the rules by which the amount shall be measured, in case of a breach; and if they neglect this, they may be presumed to have assented to such damages as may be measured by the rules which the law, for the sake of certainty, has adopted."

In Sedg. Dam. (3d Ed.) 34, the rule is thus stated: "In all cases growing out of the non-performance of contracts, and in those of infringement of rights, or non-performance of the duties imposed by the law, in which there is no element of fraud, willful negligence, or malice, the compensation recovered in damages consists solely of the direct pecuniary loss, which includes, in mere money demands, interest for the detention of the amount claimed, and the costs of the suit brought for the recovery of the demand. No indirect loss is accounted for."

Now, what was the direct pecuniary loss of the city in the case at bar? It paid $100,000 in bonds, and some subsequent interest, for the entire agreements of the company. Does not the amount paid fairly represent the direct pecuniary loss? and if that amount was returned to the city, would she not receive compensation? So that, if it could be ascertained what amount the city paid for this particular part of the company's agreements, and that were returned, would she not receive all to which she was entitled? Would she not be compensated? Wherever, therefore, in case of a subscription upon conditions by a city to the capital stock of a railroad company there has been a failure on the part of the company to comply with one or more of the conditions, and it can be shown by the *491 contract, or aliunde, what amount was *paid as a consideration for the condition or conditions broken, such amount and interest is the proper measure of damages. If in this case the allegations of the petition were sustained by the evidence, and it was shown "that the sole consideration of and for the said twenty-five thousand dollars in bonds was to enable the defendant to purchase grounds for said engine-houses and machine-shops, etc.," that amount at least, with interest, would be properly recoverable from the company. Or, if there were more than this one consideration for such bonds, and the value of the other could be determined, then the difference would be properly recoverable.

Again, where the unperformed condition is the erection within the city of buildings, or other improvements, another measure of damages may be accepted. The city, by the non-performance of the condition, loses the value of the improvements for purposes of taxation, and this is a direct pecuniary loss, and one susceptible of determination worth reasonable certainty. The average rates of taxation in the past—there being no exceptional causes of temporary excessive taxation—may fairly be accepted as the rate of the future. The value of the improvements being shown, the amount of the annual tax is a simple mathematical calculation. This annual tax may be considered in the nature of an annuity, whose present value is susceptible of exact determination by the ordinary tables. In a case like the present, where the size and value of the contemplated improvements are not fixed by the contract, the law implies that they shall be such as are reasonably suited to the purposes for which they are to be used. We suggest these measures of value as applicable, one or both, to the case at bar, though, at least for the latter, an amendment would have to be made to the petition. Cases may arise,—perhaps the case at bar (when all the facts are presented) may be found to be such an one,—in which the contract is an entirety, and there is in it no means of apportionment, and nothing can be shown aliunde to establish an apportionment, nor to *492 show the relative, or absolute *values of the conditions performed, and those broken. In such a case the rule of law we take to be that no action can be maintained to recover the consideration, nor upon a quantum meruit, until all the conditions are performed; and that in case the consideration be paid in advance, and only part of the conditions are performed, the entire consideration can be recovered. Yet to this conclusion, in any given case, the law reluctantly comes, and only when it is perfectly clear that, by no construction or evidence can there be any apportionment or determination of values. With these suggestions we conclude this opinion, fully aware that there may be difficulties in the further progress of this case which we have not guarded against. We are clear that the testimony was improperly admitted, and therefore the judgment must be reversed. We are satisfied that the rules we have laid down for the measurement of damages in this class of cases are correct; but how far either one of them may be found applicable in the future trial of this case we cannot now determine, the testimony on the trial already had having been turned in an entirely different direction.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

HOWE MACH. CO. v. JAMES H. CLARK.

July Term, 1875.

1. Principal and Agent: Proof of Agency: Declarations of Supposed Agent not Admissible. While it is competent to prove a parol agency, and its nature and scope, by the testimony of the person who claims to be the agent, and to prove any parol authority by the testimony of the person who claims to possess such authority, yet it is not competent to prove the supposed authority of an agent, for the purpose of binding his principal, by proving what the supposed agent has said at some previous

2. Witness: Impeaching: Foundation for. It is error for the court to allow one party to attempt to impeach the testimony of a witness of the other party by reading to the jury a portion of a deposition formerly taken of the witness, without having first called the attention of the witness to any portion of the deposition, and without having first given the witness any opportunity to explain.

session of two horses, one set of double harness, and one set of thills. The judgment in the court below was in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff brings the case to this court for review. The theory of the plaintiff with regard to such property is as follows: The plaintiff originally owned the property. It em-

*494 employed one H. E. Tracy to procure sales of its sewing-machines in Johnson county, and furnished him with an "outfit" for that purpose, consisting of said property, together with some other property. The property in controversy was hired to Tracy upon certain conditions, which conditions were immediately broken by Tracy, and the plaintiff, from that time, not only claims to have owned the property, but also claims to have had the right to the immediate possession thereof. Afterwards Tracy sold said horses and harness, and delivered the same, together with said thills, to the defendant Clark, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. The petition was an ordinary petition in replevin. The answer was a general denial, without any prayer for a return of the property, or for damages, or, indeed, for anything else. The action was tried upon these pleadings; and the plaintiff claims that many errors were committed during the trial. We think there were not as many errors committed as the plaintiff claims, and yet we think there was sufficient error committed to require a reversal of the judgment.

It was error for the court to permit defendant to prove the statements of Tracy formerly made by him concerning this and other property. The defendant claimed that Tracy had authority from the Howe Machine Company to sell this identical property; and, for the purpose of proving that Tracy had such authority, introduced evidence, over the objections of the plaintiff, but with the permission of the court, showing that Tracy had at different times stated that he had such authority, and that he had authority to sell, not only this, but other property belonging to the company. Now, it is competent to prove a parol agency, and its nature and scope, by the testimony of the person who claims to be the agent. It is competent to prove a parol authority of any person to act for another, and generally to prove any parol authority of any kind, by the testimony of the person who claims to possess such authority. But it is not competent to prove the supposed authority of an agent, for the purpose of binding his principal, by proving what the supposed agent has said at some previous time. Nor is it competent to prove a supposed author-*495 ity of any kind, as against the person from whom such authority is claimed to have been received, by proving the previous statements of the person who it is claimed had attained such authority.

It was also error for the court to allow the defendant to attempt to impeach the testimony of the witness Blackman, by reading to the jury a portion of a deposition formerly taken of Blackman, without having first called Blackman's attention to any portion of said deposition, and without having first given Blackman an opportunity to explain.

It is not necessary to consider any of the other alleged errors.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

JAMES CARLIN v. DANIEL F. DONEGAN.

July Term, 1875.

1. Trial: Mode of Accounting between Partners. In an action brought by one partner against his copartner for an accounting, in which the answer, while admitting the partnership, denies the terms as alleged in the petition, and as a second defense claims damages for certain breaches by the plaintiff of the partnership contract, it is not error for the court to submit to one jury the question of the terms and duration of the partnership, then to refer to a referee to state and report the account between the partners, and finally to submit to a second jury the claims for damages.<sup>1</sup>
2. ———: Sufficiency of Petition: Statement of Facts: Demurrer. A petition in an action by one partner against another, which alleges the partnership, gives a copy of the written contract therefor, alleges that the plaintiff at the outset paid in a certain specified amount, that the partnership was terminated, and that during its existence plaintiff had paid on account of debts and expenses a large sum, and that, upon a settlement of the partnership accounts which the plaintiff had vainly sought, a large sum would be found due the plaintiff, and which shows that the *496 partnership owned a large number of chattels, and involved a *series of transactions, states a cause of action, and must be held good as against any objection that can be raised by demurrer, notwithstanding it does not in terms allege that defendant had possession of any of the partnership property, or that he had any accounts to render.
3. Verdict: When Sufficient. An objection that the verdict of the jury to whom certain issues were submitted is incomplete, and fails to find all the facts established by the evidence, must be in this court disregarded, when the verdict responds to the questions submitted, and no application was made in the trial court to have a fuller response, or further facts found.
4. Partnership: Care and Diligence. The obligation of one partner to another, in the management of the partnership business, is the exercise of good faith, and of ordinary care and prudence; and if loss happens through the ordinary negligence of a partner, he must bear the loss.<sup>2</sup>

Error from Saline district court.

Donegan, as plaintiff, had judgment, at the March term, 1874, for $1,077.23 and costs, against Carlin, defendant.

T. F. Garver, for plaintiff in error.

Spivey & Wildman, for defendant in error.

BREWER, J. This was an action brought by the defendant in error in the district court of Saline county, to settle up a partnership between himself and Carlin. The history of the case is somewhat novel. First, a jury was impaneled to whose decision was referred the terms and duration of the partnership; then the matter was referred to a referee, to state the account between the partners; and, finally, a second jury was impaneled to pass upon certain claims of Carlin for damages resulting from breaches of the partnership contract. The novelty, or, perhaps more correctly, the rarity, of this triple proceeding, is no warrant for presuming it erroneous. Doubtless the *497 entire case might have been submitted *to a single jury, or referred to a single referee; and probably in most cases such is the better course to pursue. But still we think the course actually pursued fully warranted by the statute. Section 266 of the Code (Gen. St. 680) provides for the manner of trial of the issues in certain cases, not including, however, those like the one before us. Section 267 then declares that "all other issues of fact shall be tried by the court, subject to its power to order any issue or issues to be tried by a jury, or referred as provided in this Code." The court, under this section, could have tried the entire case, submitting all the issues, or any one of them, to a jury, or referred all or any one to a referee. When the case was called for trial, under the power thus granted, it submitted two of the issues to a jury, reserving the further disposition of the case for subsequent consideration. Plainly, whatever might transpire thereafter, there was no error in this. It was within the clearest letter of the statute. These issues having been settled by the verdict, there remained the accounting between the partners, and the claims for damages. The case stood for further consideration precisely as though the two issues had been settled by the pleadings, instead of by the verdict, and, thus standing, the court had power to refer any issue or issues to a referee. And the same may be said after the referee had disposed of the account between the partners.

It is insisted, however, that this case does not come within the purview of the section quoted; that, indeed, the petition fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that therefore the demurrer filed to it should have been sustained. Here, too, we must differ with counsel. The petition alleged in substance the partnership, giving a copy of the written contract therefor; that the plaintiff paid in as capital a certain sum; the time of the commencement of the partnership, and of its termination; that during its existence plaintiff paid in for expenses and debts a large sum of money and property; that he had often sought a settlement with defendant, but that defendant refused to come to any settlement; and that *498 upon such settlement a large balance would be found *due plaintiff on account of their partnership dealings. The written contract provided that the parties should enter into partnership in the stock business, to include all their property shown in their account books, and that once in three months the books should be posted, and the party having the most capital invested should receive interest on the excess at 10 per cent. The specific objection made is that "it does not appear that the defendant ever had one dollar of partnership funds, or possession of a hoof of the stock." And on the authority of Spear v. Newell, 2 Paine, C. C. 267, it is claimed that "the action of account does not lie in favor of one partner against another who is not shown to have received something, and have some accounts to render." It will be noticed that the objection is not that the petition is not definite and certain, which objection could only be reached by motion, but that, conceding the facts to be true, no matter how broadly and in general terms stated, no right to relief is shown. Here it appears that a partnership was formed; that the plaintiff contributed largely in money and property to it; that it was terminated; and that upon an adjustment of the partnership matters a large amount would be due the plaintiff from the defendant; and also by plain implication that the partnership was not simply a joint ownership of a single article, or a joint venture in a single transaction, but involved a number of chattels, and a series of transactions. If those be the facts, has the plaintiff no right to relief? We think the demurrer was properly overruled. It may be remarked that, when the question came before the court as to the manner of trial, it had the statements in the answer, as well as those in the petition, from which to determine the nature and extent of the issues, and from these it properly held that the case was one whose manner of trial it could order as it did.

A third matter of objection is that the verdict of the first jury was incomplete in not finding all the facts established by the evidence.

It is sufficient answer to this that it responded to the questions submitted to it by the court, and *499 that there was no application to have the jury respond more fully, or find any other or further facts.

Again, it is insisted that the court erred in its charge to the jury on the last trial. Counsel for Carlin thus state the question: "Then we have this state of facts: Donegan and Carlin were to keep 315 head of cattle on section 3, or that vicinity, in McPherson county; Donegan agreeing to furnish the means to carry on the business successfully. When the winter sets in, Donegan turns in 200 of his own cattle, and in February the hay gives out, and no means to furnish more. The cattle are moved 20 miles by Donegan, against the wish of Carlin, and the advice of the foreman. The move results in damage." Upon this the court charged, "But if you should believe that at the time the plaintiff, Donegan, determined upon the moving, and did move them, if he did so at all, there was such a condition of things and circumstances as would reasonably raise a question as to whether they ought to be removed or not, and that Donegan used his best judgment, in good faith, in deciding such question, then he would not be responsible, though loss might occur, unless such act should show gross negligence or ignorance." Again: "It is for you to say whether or not Donegan, in determining as to whether he should move the cattle or not upon any of the times mentioned in the testimony, was guilty of ignorance, as I have above defined it, and whether in the execution of the movement he was guilty of gross negligence." The use of the adjective "gross," in the last clause of these two instructions, is claimed to be erroneous. Donegan, it is insisted, is liable for all losses resulting from ordinary negligence in the management of the business of the partnership. The court followed this charge with a definition of gross negligence, and a correct one, too, so that the jury must have gathered that if Donegan acted in good faith, and upon his best judgment, in determining upon the removal, he would not be responsible for losses resulting therefrom, although, in carrying out such removal, he omitted the care and attention which men of ordinary prudence would exercise in such a case. We do not so understand the law. Nor do we think, from other portions of the charge, the court really intended to so inform the jury. Elsewhere the law was laid down correctly, and the jury were informed that each partner would be "held responsible for fraud, negligence," etc., and that "the degree of care and diligence that partners are generally held to between themselves is such care and diligence about any transaction as men generally of common or average care and prudence would exercise." Such we suppose to be a correct statement. Each partner must not only act in good faith, but must also exercise ordinary care and prudence. Pars. Partn. 223, 224. The omission of such ordinary care and prudence is ordinary negligence; and a partner is responsible for losses resulting from ordinary negligence. For this error the judgment must be reversed. It will be unnecessary to disturb the verdict of the first jury, or the report of the referee upon the account. No error is shown as to them, and they should stand; but the case will be remanded with instructions to set aside the judgment, and the verdict of the last jury, and to proceed further in accordance with the views herein expressed.

COUNTY-SEAT OF LINN Co.

July Term, 1875.

1. County-Seat Election: Powers of Commissioners: Limit to Inquiry.

Where a petition for the relocation of a county-seat has been presented to the county commissioners, and acted on by them, an election ordered, two elections had, the votes canvassed, and the place receiving the majority of the votes at the second election declared the county-seat, the courts, under the amendment of 1872 to the contest act, will not inquire into the sufficiency of the petition, and hear testimony to show that some of the names thereon were improperly there, and that therefore it did not contain the requisite number of petitioners.

*501 *2. Statutory Construction: Legislative Use of Words.

Whenever a legislature has used a word in a statute in one sense and with one meaning, and subsequently uses the same word in legislating on the same subject-matter, it will be understood as using it in the same sense, unless there be something in the context or the nature of things to indicate that it intended a different meaning thereby. [Prohibitory Amd. Cases, 24 Kan. 720.]

3. ———: Consent of Electors: How Ascertained.

Where the legislature has provided an "election" as the means of ascertaining the wishes of the electors of a county in reference to a change of the county-seat, and this question is the only one submitted to a vote, and has made no provision for a registration, and has designated no other list or roll as the evidence of the number of electors, it may provide that the place receiving a majority of the votes cast shall become the county-seat, notwithstanding the clause in the constitution, (article 9, § 1,) which reads that "no county-seat shall be changed without the consent of a majority of the electors of the county."

4. ———.

In such case the courts will not go behind the number of votes cast, and inquire whether, as a matter of fact, all legal electors voted, or whether those not voting consented to the change.<sup>1</sup>

5. ———.

While a legislature may not, by the mere machinery of rules of evidence, override and set at naught the restrictions of the constitution, or arbitrarily make conclusive evidence of a fact anything which, in the nature of things, has no connection with that fact, nor reasonably tends to prove it, yet it may make that which, according to the ordinary rules of human experience, reasonably tends to prove a fact conclusive evidence of it.<sup>2</sup>

6. County-Seat Act: Registration List: Assessment Rolls.
